9. Impenetrability. By this property of matter two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. If you immerse your hand in a bucket of water, you will displace some of the water and it will rise higher, but the space occupied by your hand will not also contain water at the same time; when you withdraw your hand, the water will fill the space again. By this method we can measure the volume or size of a body; the water is put into a graduated vessel and the body to be measured is then immersed in the water. The amount of water displaced may then be seen, and this is the same as the volume of the body. The experiment mentioned in Article 3 also illustrates the impenetrability of the air and water.

10. Compressibility. Compressibility is that property of matter by virtue of which it may be reduced in size by pressure. Gases such as air are most easily compressed, but all substances can be made smaller by pressure, however hard and rigid they seem to be.

11. Inertia. This is a very important, though purely negativ, property of matter. By virtue of this property, matter cannot of itself change its condition of motion or rest. In order to effect any change, it must be acted upon by some external force.

Stones cannot move around by themselvs; trees and houses remain where they are placed. This is simply because matter can not set itself in motion. The earth is turning round on its axis, and this rotation is what causes day and night. It keeps on turning simply because, by the property of inertia, it is unable to stop turning. In a similar manner, summer and winter are caused by the motion of the earth around the sun; the seasons succeed each other regularly because the earth is not capable of altering its condition of motion. When a ball is thrown through the air, it keeps on moving for a while and would never stop unless the air or some other thing resisted it. It would move on in a straight line forever if it were not drawn to the earth by gravitation (7).

Experiment.—Place a small smooth card upon the forefinger of the left hand, and a coin on the card, directly over the finger. Giv the card a blow with a lead pencil or with the nail of the forefinger of the right hand. The card will fly away and the coin will remain on the finger. It may be necessary to try the experiment several times before it will succeed; the card should be thin, smooth, and stiff, such as a visiting card.

12. Mobility. Mobility is that property of matter by virtue of which a body may be moved. Any body may be moved if sufficient force is applied to it.

13. Divisibility. By this property of matter, bodies may be separated into parts. Paper may be torn, water sprinkled around, wood cut into pieces, metals filed, and stones crushed. There are many other ways of separating matter into parts, but the above will do for examples. We know of no limit to the divisibility of matter; but when we come to study the molecular theory (No. 5 of this series), we will learn that there is supposed to be a limit by the adherents to this theory.

One of the best examples of the extent to which divisibility of matter may be carried is shown in the wearing away of coins. Coins after several years' use show signs of loss of metal; try to imagin the size of the particles lost each time the coin is handled!

14. Elasticity. Elasticity is that property of matter by virtue of which it resumes its original size or shape when the force which altered it is removed. There are several kinds of elasticity, according to the kind of force applied. Elasticity developed by pressure is the only kind that is a general property of matter; the other kinds are peculiar to solids, and will be considered when treating of them.

Experiment.—Take a rubber balloon filled with air, and press it between the hands. When the pressure is removed it will resume its original size and shape. This experiment illustrates both the elasticity and compressibility of the air.

15. Remarks.—We must always bear in mind that the laws of nature are the laws of the changes in matter, and that these laws are absolutely invariable and unchangeable. We cannot even think that they hav not always been the same, and that they will not always remain the same. There is no uncertainty about them, no irregularity, no perhaps, no sometimes; they are fixed and eternal.

All things that happen are natural. We know of no power superior to the laws of nature. There is no reliable case on record where the laws of nature were changed, suspended, or modified in the least.

Never regard anything as supernatural because you do not understand it. Examin it, investigate it, and you will often find that what at first appears strange, or even supernatural, is simply the result of nature's laws, and is what might hav been expected under the circumstances. If everyone regarded the unknown as supernatural and inexplicable, there would be no advancement, no study, no knowledge. Remember that everything which we now know we at one time did not know, but had to learn it by observation and study. G. G. GROWER.

QUESTIONS.

Note.—Always explain why you giv any answer. Some of the answers here given are only partial. See if you can answer the questions more completely.

1. Question. What property of matter causes b dies to fall to the earth? Answer. Gravitation.
2. Q. What general properties of matter are shown when a body falls to the earth? A. Gravitation and mobility.
3. Q. When a rubber ball is dropped on the floor, and bounces up again? A. Mobility, gravitation, elasticity, and impenetrability.
4. Q. When iron is filed? A. Divisibility, mobility, and gravitation.
5. Q. When the hand is dipped into a basin of water so that the water overflows? A. Mobility, extension, impenetrability, gravitation, and divisibility.
6. Q. When a window is broken by throwing a stone through it? A. Mobility, inertia, impenetrability, divisibility, gravitation.

SPIRITUALISM Sustained By the Bible.

BY COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

CONTENTS:

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—JOHN PECK.

At Thirty.

AN ODE.

'Twas yesterday I closed the thirtieth year
Of my existence. It seems but yesterday
That it began—as least, so those hav said
Who mind that interesting circumstance.
Though I was there, yet I hav slipped my hold
Upon the first impressions I received
Of this poor weary world of woe. I think
That later on a slipper helped me some
To get a notion of impressions

At four I was a boy at school, and there
I learned to say my letters, spell, and write,
To read the Testament, wherein it saith
That in the days of Herod, king, behold
There came out "seven wise men from the East;"
And I hav wondered from that day to this
How they got home again.
But I digress.
At five I said my prayers, as every night
I went to bed, and said them loud, because
They having charge of my religious welfare
Feared else I might deceive, and, full of sin,
Instead of praying God for grace and strength
Ask him for drums, and boots, and pocketknives.
So I became a miracle of grace,
And took my way on every Sunday morn
To Sabbath-school, stopping upon the way
Anon to throw a furtiv stone or two
At sundry cats; again, to lick a smaller boy
Who by his conduct had become unpopular.
At length, with growing age, I dropped upon
The Sunday-school; the cats went unmolested by,
And it is fifteen long and weary years
Since I hav had a fight. Ah, me! those days
Will come no more.

Then other years went by—years spent at school—
In which regarding schoolmarms I learned much.
The penalty for lessons badly said
Was staying after school the which I liked,
The teacher being young and favored well;
And so I missed my lessons purposely,
And I suspect she tumbled to the same.
Time after that, returning to the place—
The scene of youthful days and foolish dreams—
I met her on the street, 'long which she wheeled
A baby carriage canopied o'erhead.
I interviewed the occupant thereof at once,
And chucked the smiling cherub 'neath the chin,
It laughed, held out its hands, and crowed,
"Dad-dad."
Quoth I: "My smiling cherub, thou art off.
Yet who can tell us what I might hav been
Had chance not turned my steps a different way?
But this was years ago."
To-day I am
One score and ten. Full thirty times
My birthday hath occurred. Yet younger men
Can likewise look back on their lives and say,
"Full thirty times." Shall I feel cause to grieve
That they had better luck that way than I?
'Twere better had they been abstemious.
'Tis said that when a man has reached my age,
And still in lonely singleness abides,
He is before the law a bachelor.
Such is my own estate, and I belong
To that respectable minority.
And there are those who say a penal tax
Should be imposed on all unmarried men
Of thirty upward; against which, of course,
I kick, protest, and hold it most unfair
That my hard lines should be accounted guilt.
Is it my fault that, of the hundred girls
Whom I hav known, no one hath snared me yet?
I treated all alike, and gave them all
The same old yarn. If all said chestnut,
I ask again, is that my fault? Not so.
Theirs is the blame for sitting down on me
(I speak of "sitting down" in metaphor)
With such great force; it is discouraging.
They might hav waited till they'd married me,
And then in fact sat on me literally,
According to due process of the law.

So I remain a bachelor, and write
This jerky Ode. Friends of my youth grow up,
And wed, or die, or go out West; and I
Following the established precedent,
Am left. To all old Bachelors, old Maids,
Spinsters and Wallflowers, the whole Grand Army
Of the Left, I say, I'm with you—shake!

April 12th. MAN WITH A BADGEPIN.

La Roy Sunderland's Ideology.

The reason that Dr. Sunderland did not explain "how he possessed his remarkable power over the minds and bodies of some persons" was because he did not know. The reviewer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 26th says, "It was hoped that in 'Ideology,' his last and chief work, he had left his secret as a legacy to the world."

He had no "secret," for he did not know himself. I hav performed as remarkable cures as ever did La Roy Sunderland, but if you would giv me the universe I could not tell "how" I did them. I can relate the circumstances, describe my sensations, giv my opinion, and that is all.

The reason Bishop and Montague do not explain how they perform their wonders is because they cannot satisfactorily, for they do not know. I hav performed far more wonderful things than has ever been reported of either of them, for, unlike them, I am not led, I go myself; but if my life depended upon it, I could not tell "how" I do it; I only know that I hav a desire or impulse to do as I do, or say what I do say, and the result follows.

The primary cause is yet to be discovered, specifically detailed, and classified among the sciences. The ignorance of the past ascribed this power to gods, devils, angels, witches, and spirits, as it did every effect the cause of which could not be traced and comprehended.

The reason I never made public this wonderful power of mine is because I could not fully explain the cause. I thought in 1851, when it first developed so powerfully through me, that it was caused by spirits. When I ascertained that it was not, as I could not tell what it was, I preferred, rather than to be called a superstitious fanatic, to remain silent before the public; but often, in seclusion among friends and conscientious strangers, hav exercised this power, which persons who are living will testify to the truth of my statements.

Barre, Mass. ELLA E. GIBSON.

The Cathartic Creed.

Whosoever shall be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the Cathartic Faith.

Which Faith, except every one do keep in a hole or on file, without doubt he shall perish perpetually.

And the Cathartic Faith is this: that we conceive of a circular Triangle and a three-cornered Circle.

Neither rounding the angles nor dividing the circumference.

For there is one angle of the Barrel, one of the Bung, and another of the Bunghole.

But the head of the Barrel, of the Bung, and the Bunghole is all one, the hoops within, the staves external.

Such as the Barrel is, such is the Bung, and such is the Bunghole.

The Barrel is solid, the Bung solid, and the Bunghole solid.

The Barrel liquid, the Bung liquid, and the Bunghole liquid.

The Barrel gaseous, the Bung gaseous, and the Bunghole gaseous.

And yet there are not three gaseouses, but one gaseous.

As also there are not three liquids, nor three solids, but one liquid and one solid.

So likewise the Barrel is empty, the Bung empty, and the Bunghole empty.

And yet there are not three empties, but one half empty.

So the Barrel is full, the Bung full, and the Bunghole full.

And yet there are not three fulls, but a one little too full.

So likewise the Barrel is awful, the Bung very awful, and the Bunghole awfully awful.

And yet there are not three awfuls, but one rather queer-looking, nevertheless.

For likewise as we are compelled by geometrical verity to acknowledge every angle by itself to be both Bung and Hole,

So are we forbidden by the Cathartic religion to say there be three Bungs or three Holes.

The Barrel is made of staves, neither headed nor hooped up.

The Bung is of the Barrel alone, neither shaped nor fashioned, but somehow.

The Bunghole is of the Barrel and the Bung, neither bored nor cut nor punched, but extracted.

So there is one Barrel, not three Barrels; one Bung, not three Bungs; one Bunghole, not three Bungholes.

And in this trinity none is ahead nor astern nor abreast of another; nor as great nor as little as another.

But the whole three angles are mysteriously what-you-may-call-it.

So that in all things, as is aforesaid, the circular Triangle or the triangular Circle is to be worshiped.

He therefore that will be shaved must pay the barber.

Furthermore it is necessary to prevent salivation that he conceive rightly of the tripartite Bung.

For the truth is that we believe, or profess to believe, that the Bung is both Plug and Hole.

Plug, of the substance of the Barrel, which is within it, and Hole, of the substance of the Bunghole, which it surrounds.

Perfect Plug and perfect Hole, of a three-cornered square round shape, on pork and beans subsisting.

Equal to the Barrrel when touching the Barrel-head, and inferior to the Bunghole when touching its Bungholiness.

And although it be Plug and Hole, yet it is neither, but a veritable Bung.

Made, not by inserting the Barrel into the Bunghole, but by pulling the Bunghole out of the Barrel;

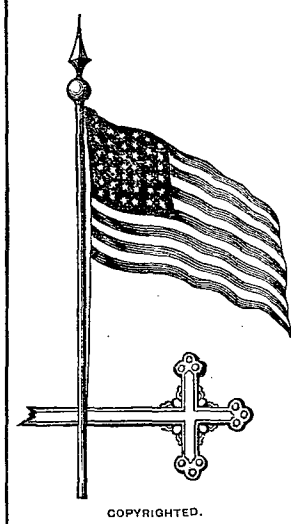
Not by desultory and spasmodic jerking, but by a union of persons, and a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether.

For as the reasonable cat and dog is one sausage, so Bung and Hole is one Barrel.

Which is used as an Ash-Barrel, descends into the cellar, and rises again to the third story.

It descends to the sidewalk, sitteth on the thumb-hand side of the lamp-post, whence it shall be dumped when the ash-cart cometh.

At whose coming all men shall close their eyes and take no account of the dust.



And the cinders shall be sifted, and those that are burnt shall be leached for lye, and the unburnt cinders shall make a rousing fire.

This is the Cathartic Faith, which unless a man believe ardently and enthusiastically he cannot be physicked.

Bully for the Barrel, for the Bung, and for the Bunghole;

For the hoops are off, the heads are gone, and 'tis a Barrel without ends. Amen. Hooray!

Orthodoxy. 56 pages, 12mo, paper, 10 cents. $1.00 per doz. post paid. Printed in large, clear type, and containing as much as could be delivered in two ordinary lectures. This makes a grand missionary document. Liberals should scatter it generously.

Ingersoll Catechised: His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the editor of the San Franiscan. 5 cents; 50 cents per dozen; 25 copies, $1; 100 copies, $3. Millions of these should be circulated.

Vindication of Thomas Paine from the attacks of the New York Observer, by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price, 15 cents.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill. Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

News of the Week.

UNDER the recently amended marriage law of this state a marriage performed by a Jewish rabbi is not legal, and the authorities hav refused to register such marriages. The law will hav to be changed or rabbis must be classed as "ministers of the gospel."

THE body of the young woman murdered in Rahway, N. J., a month ago was buried Sunday unidentified.

DR. LYMAN ABBOTT preached in Plymouth church last Sunday. The seats were not so full as when Beecher occupied the pulpit.

THE local authorities at Washington revived an ancient Sunday law and put it in force last Sunday, closing all stores, saloons, and other places of business.

IN the case of John Arensdorf, charged with the murder of the Rev. Geo. C. Haddock, of Sioux City, Iowa, the jury disagreed, standing eleven for acquittal and one for conviction.

A FIRE of incendiary origin on the 17th burnt out the New Yorker Zeitung, part of the Morning Journal, and several offices in the Tribune building. The proprietors of the Zeitung think that the Anarchists set the fire.

NEW YORK liquor-dealers who kept their places open last Sunday did so at the imminent risk of being arrested. One hundred and fifty-six arrests were made, including Justus Schwab, the Socialist. This unwonted activity of the police comes from Mayor Hewitt's orders to hav the Sunday law enforced. A repeal of the law is likely to follow its strict enforcement.

AFTER a few days of spring weather, New York had a snowstorm last Monday.

A FRENCH steamship company brings Italian immigrants from Naples to this port for $12 per head.

HIGH license has been lost to New York by Governor Hill's veto of the bill, which passed both houses of the legislature.

IT is reported that Andrew Carnegie, the millionaire Socialist, is shortly to be married to an estimable young lady of this city.

MRS. SARAH E. HOWE, of the woman's bank in Boston, has run away with from $50,000 to $75,000. This is not Mrs. Howe's first decation.

MAYOR HEWITT has decided that Sunday is a secular day of rest, and that therefore the keeping of other days as Sabbaths does not giv any person the right to do business on Sunday.

THE Rev. Justin D. Fulton said in a lecture last Sunday that he believed the words "rum, Romanism, and rebellion," were put into Burchard's mouth by God to defeat Blaine who, if elected, would hav been a tool of the Catholic church.

A GUN larger than any hitherto produced is now under construction by Krupp, of Germany. It is 52½ feet long, and weighs 315,000 pounds. Its lightest projectils will weigh 1,632 pounds, and will be propelled by 1,070 pounds of prismatic brown powder.

WALT WHITMAN, the poet, lectured in New York on the 14th. His subject was "Abraham Lincoln." The lecture netted him nearly $200. In the evening he held a reception at the Westminster Hotel, which many literary people attended. Whitman is 67 years old, and not in vigorous health.

THE remains of President Lincoln and Mrs. Lincoln were last week removed from their resting-place in the cemetery at Springfield, Ill., and interred in Oak Ridge cemetery outside the city. The coffin of Mr. Lincoln was opened, and those who knew him in life said that the features were readily recognizable. It is twenty-two years since Lincoln was buried.

ABRAM AND HIS SON ISHMAEL.

Gems of Thought.

THE more orthodox the church the more zealously it defended slavery, and the more heterodox the sect the more it has been in favor of human freedom, and the more persistently it has contended against the fell and inhuman institution. —D. M. Bennett.

IN all the sports of children, were it only in their wanton breakages and defacements, you shall discern a creativ instinct. The manikin feels that he is a born man, that his vocation is to work. The choicest present you make him is a tool, be it knife or pen-gun, for construction or destruction, either way it is for work, for change. In gregarious sports of skill or strength the boy trains himself to co-operation, for war or peace, as governor or governed. The little maid, again, provident, of her domestic destiny, takes with preference to dolls.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

THE orthodox system, as interpreted by Mr. Moody and most evangelical preachers, teaches that "conversion" blots out the penalty of a life of sin, that the blood of Christ cleanses from all sin, so that the convert, thongh made such in the last hour of a sinful life, goes to heaven. In short, that no matter what the life has been, he may be converted and go to heaven. Now the practical result of this teaching is that many persons, believing it, are content to liv on in sin and gratify their evil desires, connting upon escaping the penalty by a late conversion. We all know this is so, and we know that snch persons answer their anxious friends by saying, "Oh, I mean to be converted before I die." This doctrin is a palpable encouragement for continuance in evil doing, and thousands of persons sin on under the impression that they will repent in time to save themselvs from perdition.—Rev. W. L. Chaffin.

WHEN astronomy was young "the morning stars sang together for joy," and the planets were guided in their courses by celestial hands. Now, the harmony of the stars has resolved itself into gravitation according to the inverse squares of the distances, and the orbits of the planets are deducible from the laws of the forces which allow a schoolboy's stone to break a window. The lightning was the angel of the Lord, but it has pleased providence, in these modern times. that science should make it the humble messenger of man, and we know that every flash that shimmers about the horizon on a summer's evening is determined by ascertainable conditions, and that its direction and brightness might, if our knowledge of them were great enough, hav been calculated.—Huxley's Origin of Species.

"YOU believe that your God is to be propitiated or thanked, or whatever you like to call it, by a few apples and pears, and a bunch or two of corn and hops? Hermione, my wife, what has come to your reasoning facultities?" said Richard "What it wonld be as well if it came to yours, Richard—a little humility and a little faith," she answered tartly. "If you are humble, dear, what is that which pretends to teach you?" he said. "A body of men declaring themselvs infallible—the possessors of eternal and immutable truth, affirming an intimate acquaintance with the secret counsels of God, to use their own phraseology—and the mappers out of heaven and hell, as if they had been over all with a measuring tape, and all quarreling among themselvs, and none of them knowing so much as we others of the world around them in which they liv. Do you not see that you are being traded on through your very virtues? that your humility is the pabulum of their insolence? Your faith bolsters up their presumptuous assertions and makes their monstrous falsehood possible.—Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord.

I BELIEVE in the gospel of cheerfulness, the gospel of good nature, the gospel of good health. Let us pay some attention to our bodies. Take care of our bodies and our souls will take care of themselvs. Good health! And I believe the time will come when the public thought will be so great and grand that it will be looked upon as infamous to perpetuate disease. I believe the time will come when man will not fill the future with consumption and insanity. I believe the time will come when we will study ourselvs, and understand the laws of health, and then we will say we are under obligation to put the flags of health upon the cheeks of our children. Even if I got to heaven, and had a harp, I would hate to look back upon my children and grandchildren and see them diseased, deformed, crazed—all suffering the penalties of crimes I had committed.—Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

NEBRASKA deacon (to minister): "There is considerable talk of putting pennies in circulation, as many think we ought to hav a smaller coin than a nickel." Minister: "Is that the sense of the business community?' Deacon: "I know very little about the business community, but it seems to be the sense of the congregation."

"THE ills we hav in this world, my dear friend," said the minister at the bedside of a sick man, "are largely due to ourselvs. We hav no more right to defy the laws of nature than those of divine providence. To what do you attribute your present illness?" "I caught cold while being immersed in the river," replied the sick man feebly.

"PRAY read my hand," he said, with a smile,
As they sat in the parlor bright,
"And I will read yours; it will serve to while
The moments away to night."

She took his hand, and its lines she scanned,
Then wide she opened her eyes:
"You're in love, I see, with a girl," said she,
"About my age and size.

"You've loved her long, and your love is strong,
The lines of your hand disclose,
And you'd ask her to be your wife, but I see
That you're afraid to propose.

"But you need not fear, for 'tis written here,"
The maiden fair went on.
As the palm she scanned, "to ask her hand,
For her heart is already won."

Then the youth proposed, and with cheek rose hued,
She answered, "Yes," with a smile,
And a season of osculation ensued
In regular Down East style. —Boston Courier.

THE following story is contributed to our column of "Odds and Ends" by an esteemed correspondent: One evening, not long since, Uncle John D. got off the following: "In the early days of this country (northern Indiana) the settlers hereabouts made logging-bees for the purpose of rolling and carrying the logs together in great heaps, preparatory to burning and clearing off the land. At such times the settler would invite fifteen or twenty hands, and they would usually hav a lively time. Once, when I was a lad about fifteen years old, my father had a logging-bee. I guess he had about twenty hands. Everything went off in good shape, and at noon, when dinner was announced, we all made a rush for the house. Uncle Dave Martin (who, by the way, was a saving kind of man) had put a fresh chew of tobacco in his mouth just before dinner was called, and, not wishing to throw it away, he walked to one of the rear corners of the house, and taking out his quid he carefully laid it on the end of one of the logs. Then he proceeded to the front of the house to prepare for dinner. Some of the men noticed him lay his tobacco up, and, thinking to hav a joke on Uncle Dave, they each walked up and added their 'cud' to his, which increased it in bulk till it was half as large as a man's fist. After dinner Uncle Dave walked out and, proceeding to where he had laid his tobacco, was about to pick it up when he noticed its enormous growth. He divined the joke at once, and, finally taking it up between his thumb and finger, he looked at it in a peculiar manner and exclaimed, 'Gracious! how my terbacker has growed!'"

A DISCOURAGED PREACHER.

"If there ain't a change in the religions world pretty soon, I'm going to throw down the gospel and take up the grubbing-hoe," remarked an old man yesterday. "I hav rid a circuit for forty odd years, and I'm treated worse now than when I first began."

"What is your cause of complaint, parson?" asked a bystander.

"My recent cause is one what flakes all others," answered the circuit rider, wiping a drop of water from the end of his peaked nose with the sleeve of his brown jeans coat. "I hav preached a good deal here in Little Rock, and until recently it had allers been my belief that if a man could pull through here he could pull through anywhere. But I was blind wrong. Yesterday I went in the Gum Lick district, where I had an appointment to preach in the school-house. When I got there I fonnd old man Wiggles, a hardshell Baptist, had got in ahead of me. I went in without any ill feeling, intending to wait until he got through, when I would muster my congregation and take the field. After a while he got through preaching and annonnced that sacrament would be taken when the boy got back from the still house. 'My congregation use whisky instead of wine,' he went on, 'and Arkinsaw corn bread instead of your wheat fixens.' Just then the boy arrived and the old man took the cob stopper from the black chunk bottle, and began to pour out the whisky. Now if there is anything that strikes me natural it is whisky, and thinking that I could preach better after being warmed up a little, I went up to the table and reached out for the bottle, when the old man looked at me and said:

"'Ain't you a Methodist?'

"'Yes, sir.'

"'Don't you know that we don't allow the Methodists to commune with us? Do you take this place for a free lunch counter, eh? No, sir, if you are not a customer of the Lord you cannot eat and drink here.'

"'I've got a right to the table,' I said, 'and I'll help myself.'

"'Tech that bottle and I'll lift you.'

"'I grabbed the bottle, and the old man struck me with a pone of corn bread and knocked me down. Then somebody kicked me, and all hands drug me out."

"You got into a nest of close communionists, did you?" asked the bystanders.

"Ruther like it. Why, them fellers would snatch a piece of bread from Jabob and tear the bosom outer Abraham's shirt. No, sir; until there is more freedom in church I shan't renew my connections. Where can a fellow get a two pound hoe?"—Little Rock, Ark., Gazette.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 14. No. 18. } PUBLISHED WEEKLY. } New York, Saturday, April 30, 1887. } 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

MASSACHUSETTS has a high license bill pending in her legislature. Last week it passed to a third reading in the House by a two-thirds vote.

THE Pennsylvania Railroad Company hav adopted what are called vestibule cars to be run as a limited train between here and Chicago. The vestibule is a sort of hood built over the platform in such a way that the cars are connected so as to form a continuous apartment.

A LETTER from Rudolph Schnaubelt, the alleged thrower of the Haymarket bomb, has been received in Chicago. It is dated, "Christiana, Norway, March, 1887." The fugitiv denies throwing the bomb, but intimates that he is sorry he did not do it, and that he only left because he knew it was not safe for him in Chicago.

SOME of the Knights of Labor wish to boycott the New York Sun because of its utterances on the labor question. Typographical Union No. 6 declines to concur, and holds that so long as the Sun pays the union scale of wages the union can hav no quarrel with it, liberty of the press being something which labor is not organized to suppress.

THE editor of a friendly paper recently proposed that a testimonial should be raised for John Swinton by all his acquaintances in the journalistic ranks subscribing a dollar. Mr. Swinton declines to receive any money so contributed, as whenever his paper fails to remunerate him he can earn money elsewhere with his pen. John Swinton's is the best of the labor journals.

TOWARD the support of St. Catherine's hospital the city has for some time past contributed $3,000 a year. In 1886 the amount was increased by the legislature to $4,000, but the board of estimate, forgetting this, appropriated only $3,000. The hospital will sue for the balance of $1,000. This is a clear case of a beggar suing his benefactor because the annual contribution was scant.

AN evangelist named Forrest has been making things lively in San Francisco, says the Herald. He uses the vocabulary of his former profession, that of a gambler, to express the charms of religion withal, and if his language lacks grace, it certainly has force. He declares that the Lord has "dealt him a full hand," and believes that by means of it he "can win every time." The Episcopalians are the people who "do the prayer act," and the clergymen who are given to a white necktie are stigmatized as "fine-haired ducks." The Christian religion has sunk very low in making use of a tool like Forrest.

"Do you know young man," he said, solemnly, "that the constant use of whisky eventually destroys the will power?" "No sir," replied the youth, incredulously, "it increases the will power. I heard a man say last Sunday morning, as he found a side door locked, that he proposed to hav a drink if he had to try every saloon from Harlem Bridge to Sandy Hook, and he meant it, too. Talk about will power!"

IT is said that the finances of Dr. McGlynn's old church are almost hopelessly in arrears, and many of the parishioners vow they will never put their hands into their pockets until Dr. McGlynn is reinstated.

PRESIDENT BAYLES of the Board of Health has decided to record marriages performed by Jewish rabbis, although the statute does not include rabbis among those authorized to officiate at weddings. He argues that the record of the health department is statistical rather than legal, and that therefore all marriages should be recorded.

SAID Dr. John Hall last Sunday: "It is claimed by some men that man has risen from a state of savagery. There is not one atom of scientific evidence to justify such a belief. There never was a barbarous race which raised itself. Others think that man is a development from lower orders of life. We hav no proof of such development." Yet Dr. John Hall stands in the front row of Christian teachers!

A SPECIAL meeting of Protestant ministers was held in Montreal on the 19th to protest against the bill now before the Quebec legislature proposing to place crucifixes in all courts of law for the purpose of strengthening the oaths of witnesses. A petition was drafted, to be presented to the legislativ council, protesting against the bill because it is a serious outrage upon the religious convictions of Protestants If the Protestants were consistent, they would affix also to their petition a protest against the presence of the Bible in the courts as a serious outrage upon the religious convictions of Freethinkers.

A VISITOR FROM ROME. SHALL WE LET HIM IN?

A DAILY paper says: "Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, president of the Nineteenth Century Club, will be on his nativ heath again within two or three weeks, and will officiate as chairman at the next meeting of the club, relieving Mr. Daniel G. Thompson, who has done such excellent service as acting president during the winter. The Nineteenth Century is a great and useful institution, and accomplishes many good things both for society and literature. Ten years ago one could not find, either in New York or Boston, or in any other American city, such a gathering of people eminent in society, in business, the learned professions, and the fine arts, as that which assembled last Wednesday evening at the American Art Galleries to listen to Col. F. W. Higginson's address on 'The Position of Literature in a Republic.' Colonel Higginson took an optimistic view of the influence of republics on literature, and Mr. Brander Matthews agreed with him in the main. Mr. Lathrop took the opposit view, and, as Mr. Matthews remarked, it was lucky that Colonel Higginson divided his subject into heads, because this enabled his disputant to follow the old Irish rule, 'Wherever you see a head, hit it!'" The Society of Humanity has recently heard from Mr. Palmer in a way agreeable to its treasurer.

THE South Carolina supreme court has filed a decision to the effect that a married woman cannot mortgage her separate estate for the debts of her husband or any other person.

Tales Told Out of School.

THE REV. DR. JONES'S REPORT CONTINUED.—REVIVALISMS; MOODY AND SANKEY.

II.

When a congregation loses its interest in divine things, and begins to disintegrate and scatter, some of the members, who do not understand the reason why, start the project of a revival, and Moody and Sankey, perhaps, are called in to work a miracle of grace by their peculiar method of anecdotes and singing. After they finish their engagement, and receive their pay, the congregation relapses into its former indifference and spiritual deadness, only intensified. Moody has told his stories, and Sankey has sung his songs, for the hundredth time, and they need no study to bring out of their treasury things new as well as old. But the regular pastor, who studies laboriously and conscientiously year in and year out to build up his people in their most holy faith, does not, and cannot, preach sensational sermons like the evangelistic knights errant who go prancing around in their heavenly armor among the churches, and make the house of God a circus for their evening performances at so much money a week, or a month, or by the job. These extemporaneous, thunder-storm revivals of religion are like the excitement produced on a laboring man in the harvest field by drinking liquor—it raises his physical energy above par, and enables him to do more work for the time being; but when the effect is over, and by the eternal law of action and reaction, he must go down as much below par as the liquor had raised him above it, and so nothing is gained in the long run.

At a private conference of ministers, which I was invited to attend, called to consider the whole subject of revivalism, and to solve the question whether they were of any permanent value to the church, I was impressed by the remarks of the venerable Dr. M., whose praise is in all the churches as a man of deep piety and wisdom. He directed the attention of the brethren to the notorious and suspicious fact, commented on and joked about by the secular and Infidel papers, that all the revivalists become rich in their vocation. "Mr. Moody," said he, "who began his career comparativly penniless, has become wealthy. Sankey, his alter ego, is rich. The Salvation Army in England is rich, made so by the gifts of churchmen who would scorn to be seen at one of their meetings, but who hav a secret hope that the Salvationist converts from among the masses may ultimately be brought into the congregations of the established church in such numbers as to justify its claim to be the church of the great majority of the English people, instead of a minority, as is now the case. Booth, the leader of that movement, during his late visit to this country, received—so the papers say—a donation of more than seven thousand dollars—of course from a woman—to erect salvation barracks, and promote the cause generally in England. See how the churches in Chicago, and other cities, giv money and presents without stint to those religious mountebanks, Sam Jones and Sam Small! All these men, like the priest and Levite of old, pass by on the other side of the country congregations, whose pastors preach the gospel on starvation wages, as if the souls of the rustics were not as worthy of salvation as the souls of those who crowd into large cities. The reason is there is no money, but only souls, to be found in the rural districts. The women preachers, too, all, of course, revivalists, find that it pays them to leave their husbands and families at home in the care of other people, and devote themselvs to the profitable business of revivalism. The life of a pastor, especially in the country, is rather monotonous and humdrum, but the revivalist is in a constant state of pleasurable change and excitement, going from field to field as the bee goes from flower to flower in quest of honey, admired, worshiped by the women, and treated by all as if they were embassadors extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary from the court of heaven, sent to perform miracles of grace among mortals. Their discourses, although to themselvs as stale and tasteless as a thrice-chewed quid of tobacco, are new and fresh to their constantly changing audiences, and under the magnetic influences which any large crowd imparts to a speaker, they say their pieces over, dwelling on the emphatic parts, and thus produce the desired effect.

"There is an important lesson in these facts, my brethren," continued the venerable sage, "although I must confess that it seems to enure to the benefit of the Infidels. It is that religion, in what is considered by so many superficial thinkers as its best form, revivalism, consists simply in emotion; that it has no relationship whatever either to sound morals, sound doctrins, or to reason; that it flourishes best among the ignorant and impulsiv class, like the negroes of of the South; and that under its abnormal excitement Christian people are willing to contribute liberally of their time and money in order to enjoy it. Settle Moody, or any of the rest of the genus, which has so many species, over an intelligent congregation, and in six months, after he had preached over all his commonplace exhortations—I will not call them sermons—he would become like an old thread-bare coat, and be requested to leave for a new field of effort. Brethren, we hav entirely too much of what is called preaching. One good sermon on the Sabbath, full of instruction, and such as an intelligent pastor can prepare in a week, is as much as any man ought to preach, or any congregation can digest and assimilate. All over one acts on the mind of an audience like a new wad in a boy's pop-gun, it drives out the last, and leaves the gun empty. Ask an intelligent church-goer, I will not say on Thursday, but on Monday morning, before the rush and roar of the world's business has begun, to giv you the text of either sermon heard on the preceding Sabbath, with some of the ideas elaborated in them, and the failure to answer would satisfy you that the sermons had no more effect than is produced by throwing water on a duck's back. No; as a person, to enjoy bodily health, must hav regular and moderate habits of eating, sleeping, and laboring, so a Christian must be fed moderately and statedly so that the spiritual food imparted can be digested and distributed to every part of the spiritual being. Gormandizers all over the country allow their morbid appetites to make them swallow three times as much food as the stomach can possibly dispose of. The consequence is, that, in due time, the powers of digestion rebel against the outrage practiced on them, and when the man drops into a premature grave, the doctors smooth the case over by saying that the victim of folly has died of heart trouble, or Bright's disease of the kidneys, instead of saying the truth, that he gormandized himself to death. Now this excess of preaching and praying, and the exhausting labors of the Sunday-school, are religious gormandizing, and instead of making the Sabbath a day of rest and profit to all, make it a day of the hardest and most unprofitable kind of work. My idea of religion, formed after a long life of experience and observation, is that it is a steady and gradual growth of knowledge concerning the relations we sustain to the universe, showing itself in a consistent life; and although revivalism is popular, and I fear will be, for the same reason that people love intoxicating liquor, it does the church no permanent good, but harm.

"The fact ought to stamp these red-hot revivals of religion as suspicious, that, during what seem to be the most wonderful outpourings of the holy spirit, and displays of religious zeal and devotion, the very leaders, who are envied by the common Christian for the intensity of their piety, and the closeness of their walk with God, may be living in fornication and adultery, and be concocting and committing the most atrocious crimes. This was proved last year by the great revivalist woman-preacher, Mrs. Molloy, who, with her adopted daughter, was living in concubinage with Graham, a convict, whom she got pardoned out of the penitentiary because he was good-looking, and who was ultimately taken from prison and lynched, by the people of Missouri, for having murdered his wife, and pitched her body into an unused well on Mrs. Molloy's farm. That sentiment which we call religion, both in its origin, its definition, and in the way it allows its possessors to act in life, seems, increasingly, to me, to be a profound mystery. Mrs. Molloy had the confidence of Brother Colfax, who, you know, was a very pious man. She had been the means of converting hundreds of sinners, thus strengthening many of the churches in the West; and at no time in her career was she more zealous and successful in the work of saving souls than when the curtain was drawn aside and exhibited her and Cora Lee as joint paramours of Graham, and accomplices with him in the murder of Mrs. Graham! Cluverius, who was hanged at Richmond for murdering his own cousin, whom he had seduced under promis of marriage, was a pious and devoted member of the Baptist church, who was continually singing evangelical hymns during the whole of his imprisonment, and before. But his religion, glowing as it was, had no effect in making him a just and honorable man. Titus, also, the janitor of the Methodist college in New Jersey, who was convicted of the murder of Tillie Smith, and sentenced to be hung, was a member in full communion of the Methodist church, and, like Cluverius, was fond of singing devotional hymns; but his religion had no effect at all in preventing him from being a rapist and a murderer. It is argued by the Infidels, and, I admit, fairly, too, that such facts as these prove that the sentiment of religion, in itself considered, is a dangerous one to society; and unless we Christians can giv some rule, or standard, by which the public, who are so liable to be deceived, can tell the genuin from the counterfeit thing, the assertion of the Infidels will be taken as true. But, as Paul says, 'we are in a strait betwixt two.' If we make religion to consist in zeal and emotion, we are confronted by the historical fact that the bloodiest persecutors were the most religious; and that the intensest revivalism, and the most glowing individual piety, may consist with fornication, adultery, rape, and murder. If we repudiate this definition, and make religion to contist only in a good moral life, this is the very ground that Infidels take when they advocate their plausible doctrin of natural morality; but it is not the doctrin of the New Testament. Paul's doctrin is that we are justified before God, and saved, not by good works, but by faith in Jesus Christ." These remarks, which were all that my memory could retain, were weighty, to say the least, and seemed to be listened to by the brethren with marked attention, as if they were well worth pondering.

MR. BEECHER.

Everywhere I went on my mission of observation I saw the slimy trail of Mr. Beecher's teaching and example. He has the finest talent for blending the false with the true in the compromise with error, so as to deceive the very elect of God, of any man in modern times. This is seen in his great effort, by a series of sermons, to make the new doctrin of evolution, which is really but a vamping up of the old theory announced in the "Vestiges of Creation," thirty years ago, consistent with the Christian religion. Mr. Beecher knows that the belief which of all others is most fundamentally essential to the revealed scheme of salvation by Christ is the belief that God created man upright; and that man, instead of proceeding onward and upward from this high and fair beginning to a yet higher and fairer standing, fell, and sank into a morally lost and degraded condition; and that out of this arose the necessity for the dispensation of the recovery and restoration which forms the entire burden of God's revealed message to man in the Bible. If, according to the evolution theory, man began his existence at the lowest rung of the ladder, and has ever since been slowly climbing upward, the advent of Christ as the second Adam to restore man from the ruins of the first, is simply a meaningless anomaly. The whole scheme of the gospel is unnecessary and absurd; for man is not a fallen creature, but is better off in every respect to-day than he was in the Garden of Eden. There is no use of blinking the fact that by this theory our ancestors, remote to be sure, before they rose to the dignity of the quadrumana, were androgynous, and monotrematous, with tails a yard long, roosting in trees; and that from this low condition they gradually emerged, through the slow lapse of thousands of years, till they assumed the human form. If there be an inherent power in the principle of evolution to produce such results as we see embodied in the character of a Newton, or a Bacon, what is the use of the gospel, of the church, and of the means of grace? Let us abolish the whole of them as superfluous, and appropriate the millions of money which they cost to other and wiser purposes, and trust to nature for further progress. Let us remove the pulpits from our churches, and quit the nonsense of preaching Christ and him crucified; put platforms in their places, where the scientists will lecture on a universe without a creator and governor, and teach the people that all religion is superstition; that matter, the earth, is full of the leaven of creation, and works like it, in producing all the phenomena we see. Mr. Beecher, whatever else we must say of him, is a man of mind, and knows that the evolution hypothesis, although dressed up in saintly verbiage, is as deadly in its opposition to the gospel as fire is to water. And as it is the waters of the ocean flowing down through the crevices of the earth to the fires beneath that produce earthquakes and cataclysms which overthrow cities in swift destruction, so this Darwinian epidemic among the scientists, and among the clergy who are fascinated by their specious arguments, is bound to produce terrible results. The loose, slipshod disciplin of Congregationalism has no net with meshes small enough to catch such a heretic as Beecher. But our Southern brethren, with their superior system of Presbyterianism, foresaw the danger when Professor Woodrow began to poison his theological students by familiarizing them with the a b c of evolutionism, and nipped the heresy in the bud by decapitating the teacher.

Mr. Beecher's example in the department of morals is as injurious as his public teaching in the pulpit. A clergyman's character must be above suspicion if he would command the confidence of the people and do good. When the Beecher-Tilton scandal broke out, and ultimated in a court trial, the religious community was shocked, for Mr. Beecher occupied a larger space in the public eye than any other pastor in the country. To say nothing of the proof adduced on the trial, the confessions of guilt, though not pro forma, were so strong that no person in the whole country, if he went by his judgment, could entertain the least doubt on the subject. The terms of that confession—"living on the ragged edge," to "step down and out"—hav become incorporated into the common speech, and are in all men's mouths. The jury in the case failing to agree on a verdict, there was only one course for Mr. Beecher to pursue, and that was to retire from the ministry. If he were conscious of guilt, he would at least save his own self-respect by such a course; and if he were conscious of innocence, he could wait for the providence of God to clear him of the charge. But the Christian public, feeling the weight of the blow given to religion by such a man's misconduct, with an insanity unprecedented, concluded that the best way was to maintain his innocence, and swear him through in defiance of all the evidence, legal and moral; and Mr. Beecher took the advice of his false friends, and persisted in preaching. No arithmetic can calculate the damage done by this policy; in the first place, to Mr. Beecher himself, for, when the New York Sun contemptuously and savagely hurls its javelin into one side, and Archbishop Corrigan sends a poisoned arrow into the other, Beecher takes it as if he felt he deserved it. Had he acknowledged his fault at the first like a man, and retired from the pulpit, as his best friends advised, all generous persons, admiring his honesty, would hav condoned his offense. King David, in morals, would hav shared the ignominy of Judas Iscariot in treachery had he not succumbed to the preaching of Nathan, the prophet, and confessed his sin. And the American people would hav listened to Beecher as a lecturer on literary and scientific subjects, and made his vocation as such as profitable as a pastor's salary, had he set the example of manliness, and left the pulpit forever; because, right or wrong, men and women are disposed to be merciful in all affairs of the heart, while they will not tolerate a man in the pulpit who rebukes others for sins which he himself commits. Then, in the second place, his exemption from punishment has emboldened other clergymen of strong amatory propensities to avail themselvs of the chances which the weakness of so many church women afford, to do as Mr. Beecher did, with the expectation that when detected and proved guilty, they will be treated by their congregations and the religious public as if such offenses were mere peccadilloes, and not worth making a fuss about. We hav a glaring illustration of this in the case of the Rev. Mr. Downes, of Boston, who, although universally believed to be an adulterer, still preaches the gospel to Christian people, while hundreds of the unconverted would flock to his church on the Sabbath, not to be edified by his godly instructions, but to see how he gets along in carrying such a load of sin and shame as he does. Thus religion receives a deadly wound in the house of its friends.

Michael Servetus, M.D.

From the Iowa State Medical Reporter.

In the annals of the Christian church and in the history of our art, the name of Michael Servetus occupies a place of equal prominence but not of equal respect. By the ecclesiastical historian, he is still regarded as a mocking blasphemer whose chief crime was a denial of the triune God; by the historian of medicin he is looked upon as a great scientific discoverer who opened a path for progress in medicin which previously, although not entirely unexplored, was but little understood. The former can see in him only a fierce heretic, while the latter views him as a martyr to the cause of science and the victim of the religious fanaticism of the age. It is more than probable that the truth lies between these two extremes, and it will be my endeavor to giv in this article a candid and impartial account of the life, discovery, and fate of this unfortunate man. My materials hav been drawn mainly from foreign authors, and necessarily so, since, up to the present time, no complete history of medicin has appeared in our language. The discovery which has rendered the name of Servetus immortal was that of the lesser circulation, and in order the better to appreciate his contribution to science it will be well to review the doctrins of the movement of the blood which were held previous to his time.

Among the ancient schools of medicin, the Alexandrian University was the most important. The warrior whose name it bears conceived, in the year 332 B.C., the grand idea of founding a city upon the banks of the Nile which should be a model of architectural beauty, a center of intellectual life, and a lasting monument to his own greatness and magnificence. Connected with this school was a library of seven hundred thousand volumes, a botanical and zoölogical garden, an astronomical observatory, a chemical laboratory, and a room for the dissection of the dead. It was here that those great anatomists of antiquity, Erasistratus and Herophilus, taught the science of organization from actual dissections. It has even been asserted that one of them, Herophilus, did not scruple to employ his scalpel upon the bodies of living criminals, but this tradition, which was believed by the fathers of the church, is not alluded to by any contemporary writer, and Celsus, who is the first to mention it, speaks of it as a doubtful fact. It is not impossible to believe, however, as Renouard remarks, that men hav occasionally lived who were so lost to the sentiments of humanity as to be willing to deliver into the hands of the anatomists living criminals, in the vain hope that among the bleeding entrails and in the heaving thorax they might find the secret of life.

Erasistratus gave names to the auricles of the heart, named the tricuspid valve, recognized the use of the trachea as the tube which conveys air to the lungs, declared that the veins are blood-vessels and that the arteries were air-vessels. He believed that the purpose of respiration was to fill the arteries with air; the air distended the arteries, made them beat, and in this manner the pulse was produced. When once the air gained entrance to the left ventricle, it became the vital spirits. The function of the veins was to carry blood to the extremities.

The errors of Erasistratus were left unrefuted until the time of Galen (A.D. 131-200), who, in turn, held many erroneous views regarding the circulation. Galen proved that the arteries are blood vessels, and to do this he resorted to vivisections. We will ask him to speak for himself. He says:

> There are certain persons who offer to prove that the arteries do not contain blood, yet never test their assertion by vivisections. A teacher of this sort having asserted his ability to show that the aorta is always empty, and not demonstrating the fact, was exhorted to do so by a number of ambitious young men who had provided animals for the purpose. At first he refused to comply with their request unless suitably rewarded, whereupon they placed before him a thousand denarii as an inducement to prove his assertion. After much prevarication, when urged to proceed by all present, he took the scalpel and began by making an incision in the left side of the chest, where he imagined the artery could be exposed; but such was his want of anatomical skill that he cut directly down upon the bone. One of his associates, however, having opened through the intercostal spaces, he, again proceeding, injured in the first place the artery and afterward the vein. The young men who had deposited the money with the spectators, now laughing at him, undertook the experiment themselvs. They dissected through the intercostal spaces, as they had been previously taught by me, in such a way as not to injure the vessels; and without delay surrounded the artery with two ligatures; one at its point of departure from the heart and the other where it rests upon the spine, just as these boastful teachers had promised to do, in order that when the animal was dead one might see, from so much of the vessel as lay between the ligatures, whether or not the artery was empty of blood. But when it was found not to be empty, they declared that an incision must hav been made in it at the time of applying the ligature, as if some other individual, and not the teachers themselvs, had promised the demonstration.

Galen declared that the pulse was the dilation of the artery caused by the contraction of the heart. He erroneously taught that the purpose of respiration was to allow the air to enter the lungs, where it cooled the blood. This theory was held even as late as the last century by the so-called father of modern physiology, Albrecht von Haller. Galen also taught that foramina existed in the inter-ventricular septum of the heart, that the arterial blood nourished organs of a delicate texture such as the lungs, while the venous blood nourished the grosser organs such as the liver.

Another of the ancients, although not properly a physician, who seems to hav had an obscure view of the circulation, was Nemesius, who was bishop of Emissa, a Syrian city, at the end of the fourth century. He lived during the reign of Theodosius and wrote his work "De Natura Hominis," in which a curious passage occurs which would indicate that he possessed some knowledge of the circulation. This is the more noteworthy since Bishop Fell, the editor of the Oxford edition of that work, was a bitter enemy of William Harvey, whose great discovery he attempted to show was anticipated by Nemesius. Following is the passage which has been translated by Freind:

> The motion of the pulse takes its rise from the heart, and chiefly from the left ventricle of it; the artery is with great vehemence dilated and contracted, by a sort of constant harmony and order. While it is dilated, it draws the thinner part of the blood from the next veins, the exhalation or vapor of which blood is made the aliment for the vital spirit. But, while it is contracted, it exhales whatever fumes it has through the whole body, and by secret passages. So that the heart throws out whatever is fuliginous, through the mouth and nose by expiration.

Upon this single slender proof does Fell attribute the great discovery of the circulation to Nemesius, and although it may be allowed that the latter had a little insight into the circulation fifteen hundred years ago, yet it was so imperfect that he neither comprehended it himself nor made it understood by any who followed him.

The man who above all others destroyed the anatomical errors of the ancients was Andreas Vesalius, of Brussels. This wonderful anatomist, before he attained the age of thirty, had written the most complete, accurate, and the best illustrated work upon anatomy that had ever been seen. The illustrations were designed by Stephan van Calcar, and the best engravers cut them in wood to adorn that massiv old folio which was published in Basle in the year 1543. Vesalius in the "Corporis Humani Fabrica" declares that no apertures exist in the interventricular septum, and, in this manner, the greatest of Galen's errors was corrected and a long step was taken toward the discovery of the circulation. Such, then, is a resumé of the knowledge of the ancients upon this subject, and now we must turn to the subject of this sketch.

Servetus, whose Spanish name was Miguel Servede, was born in the year 1509 at Villanueva in Arragon. But little is known of his early life; it is certain, however, that he was educated in jurisprudence and theology at the University of Toulouse. He made the scriptures and the fathers of the church his principal study, and it was at this time that a foundation was laid for the heresy which, in later years, was to cost him his life.

In his twenty-sixth year we find him in Paris engaged in the study of medicin; in two years he was lecturing to the students, and in a short time he published a work on syrups and their medicinal uses. In this book, which refuted many of the cherished statements of the Greek and Arab writers, the spirit of a bold reformer can be plainly discerned. Previous to this time, in 1530, he traveled to Italy in company with Quintaine, father confessor to Charles V., and here, associating with anti-trinitarians, he was strengthened in his doubts regarding the orthodox teaching. On his return he took the liberty to visit Oecolampadius, a Swiss reformer living in Basle, and Bucer, of Strasburg, to whom he communicated his scruples. These Protestants, however, instead of refuting his arguments, denounced him as a heretic, loaded him with insults and ignominy, and warned all Christian teachers to shun him as a dangerous foe. Hated by both religious parties, and misrepresented by officious enemies, Servetus decided to proclaim his views to the world, and, accordingly, in 1531, published his work, "De Erroribus Trinitatibus." After many persecutions he issued, in 1553, another theological work with the title, "De Christianisimi Restitutio." Servetus was now in great danger, and the feeling against him was so strong that seven years previous to this time, Calvin, when writing to his friend Viret, threatened the heretic with death.* Tired of persecution and weary of life, Servetus unsuspectingly entered Geneva, where he hoped, among the independent Swiss, to find a refuge and pass his days in peace. He was immediately apprehended, and, at the instigation of Calvin, thirty-eight articles of accusation were drawn up against him; he was tried before a council of sixty; the trial lasted three days, and the verdict was that of guilt. The sentence was a heavy fine and death by slow torturing fires. On the twenty-seventh day of October, 1553, an anxious and excited mob might hav been seen passing out of the old Swiss city of Geneva. At the head of the procession, and securely placed between files of armed men, stood a scholar past forty years of age who was soon to be offered as a living sacrifice to the fanaticism of the time. A neighboring hill was soon reached, and here the excited populace halted; a stake was planted firmly in the ground, and to this the victim was securely fastened; fagots were placed around his feet, and on these were piled all the copies of his works which could be collected; the torch was then applied, and the soul of Michael Servetus went up in agony to its maker amid the ribald jests and blasphemy of the people of that wicked city. After reflecting on this horrible sin, it is edifying to turn to a recent theological work and read the following:

> On the twenty-seventh of October, 1853, Servetus had been dead three hundred years. The people of Geneva went up to Chappel, the hillside where the ashes of Servetus had been strewn, and observed the day before the Lord, honoring Christian toleration and liberty of conscience, and begging forgivness, in the name of the old council, respecting Servetus, even though he was guilty of transgression. But to Calvin . . . was decreed a statue before the cathedral of St. Peter's" (Piper, Lives of the Leaders of Our Church Universal).

In the book of Servetus, "The Restitution of Christianity," is contained the first account of the lesser circulation; it states in plain and unmistakable language that the blood is sent by the contraction of the heart from the right ventricle through the pulmonary artery to the lungs, where it is changed in color from dark to red, and is thence returned to the left side of the heart. Contrary to the teaching of Galen, it declared the lungs, and not the liver, to be the seat of sanguification. Such was the discovery made by this unfortunate heretic.

Detroit Aldermen Discuss Church Taxation.

From the Detroit, Mich., Free Press.

Alderman Amos introduced a resolution setting forth that the Prohibitory amendment, if adopted, would curtail a large amount of taxes and destroy a large amount of taxable property, and as the church property in Detroit is valued at upward of $3,000,000 and pays no taxes, the representativs of Detroit in the legislature should be requested to vote for the passage of the Grenell bill, repealing the law exempting church property from taxation. Alderman Amos spoke at considerable length in behalf of his resolution, and was followed by Alderman McIntyre, who said there were churches which did not altogether favor the Prohibitory amendment, and that the resolution would be unjust. He hoped it would be indefinitly postponed. Alderman Jacob favored the resolution. Alderman Frank Smith denounced it as an Infidel measure and said Alderman Amos would do well to attend to his bar and not meddle with affairs he knew nothing about. Alderman Gilmore favored the resolution. He said he had always been a church-going man and was willing to pay his share of the taxes on the church he attends. Alderman Amos claimed that the taxation of churches would be a good thing for them; that it would infuse new life and energy into the work of the churches and place them upon a business basis.

The resolution was defeated on a vote of 12 to 11, adjournment following.

News and Notes.

Sunday, April 10th, after the storm, was a bright and blustering day. They do hav winds here in California, and one, and even two overcoats do not come amiss. However, you get used to a high breeze on the Pacific coast, and enjoys it placidly. My friend Karl Broneer took me over the Piedmont hills on Sunday morning. The view of San Francisco, the Golden Gates, the distant sea, the bay, the islands, the fields and mountains, is magnificent. Oakland, the Athens of the Pacific shore, is at your feet, elegant and delightful, while the queenly city against the sun bright sky looks forth from her hights over the immensity of waters that from far and near bring to her riches. The throne of this fair metropolis is secure. She rules the Pacific, and all its waves bring wealth and splendor to her gates.

In the afternoon, my genial hosts, Mr. and Mrs. Schow, made arrangements with a few friends for a picnic on the shores of Lake Merrit, which is one of the pleasure resorts of the people of Oakland on Sunday, and it presents quite a gala appearance, with a hundred boats skimming over its bosom. It is a beautiful sheet of water, just on the verge of the city, flowing from the sea, and encircled by picturesque scenery of hill and wood and stately villas. I suppose our pious Christian friends don't like to hav so much fun a-going outside the churches as there is on this lake, but they can't help themselvs. The world moves. They hav no Sunday laws in California, and one can take all the comfort he desires in the open air. So we had an attractiv Liberal assembly, with the good things of this world for sacrament. We had our pictures taken, and without doubt the counterfeit presentment will go down to posterity. Mr. and Mrs. Karl Broneer, Mr. Thomas Arper, whose contributions are sometimes in THE TRUTH SEEKER columns, Miss Lily Arper, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Arper, George Arper, Marius Dahlgren, who has painted some lovely pictures of California scenery, Mr. Merts, Mr. and Mrs. Brown, and Mrs. Reguin, of San Francisco, and others, together with the little folk, Enna, Carl, and Dolly Jane Broneer, and Alice and Mabel Carpenter, etc., constituted our independent church, with "sermons in stones, and good in everything." A sail on the lake, with a spanking breeze that sent us twelve knots an hour, added to the refreshing exercises of the day, and gave good momentum for our evening's work. Homeward from nature's feast, we took a good square meal at friend Healke's, who, with all his family, Mrs. Healke and the daughters Miss Clara and Miss Laura, and the twins, whose names, Theodore Ingersoll and Albert Paine, show under what good stars they hav been born, belongs to the front ranks of our grand army. We were pleased to meet at the festival board Mr. Henry Krause, who winged the happy hours with merry music. Thus we had cheerful impulse for our second lecture.

We were greeted by a much larger audience than at our first lecture, and therefore we hav good hopes for the future. But the battle at this point is by no means an easy one. There is much indifference. Oakland is a city of churches. Wealth and fashion side with the orthodox party. Money-making is the chief thing. But few are stanch enough to stand by their colors. But we hav found enough who hav made our way bright with their enthusiasm and devotion, who, seeing something of the grandeur of Liberal thought, are willing to labor for it, although the reward is but small, as the world goes. I feel at home amid such comradeship. The generous hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Schow has given me a place of rest that makes patience for all the ills of an unfavorable campaign. The flowers are in front of my window, the lilies and the roses, and the palm-tree over them. The face of Ingersoll looks at me from the wall, and the monument of Bennett. There are beautiful pictures, and elegant books that contain the jewels of Freethought, and so I hav those surroundings which giv the best of life and infuse glory into our work. Mrs. Broneer is a granddaughter of Abner Kneeland, and has all his ardor for reform, and memories of his heroic life. Also, Wallace Hughan is of the chivalry of the Secular hosts from across the waters, where he has been with Holyoake, Bradlaugh, Southwell, etc.; and it was a delight indeed to strike hands with so gallant a soldier

> In the world's broad field of battle,
> In the bivouac of life.

So the bow of promis shines over Oakland, mingling with the luster of its hills, its thousand flowers, and glittering waters that bring music from the golden Orient.

Monday and Wednesday evening we continued the campaign in San Francisco with fair results, much better than I expected in the beginning. On Monday I had the pleasure of a lunch with Mr. A. T. Dewey, of the Pacific Rural Press, who is inclined to look at theology from a business point of view, and judge its merits by its results; W. W. McKaig, formerly a Presbyterian clergyman, and not altogether alienated from metaphysical ideas, but progressiv withal; N. E. Boyd, a Unitarian minister, who broke with his so called liberal sect because he could not call himself a Christian, being of the Radical and Free Religious order; Mr. Vander Naillen, a Theosophist, who sees good in everything, a transcendentalist in every fiber of his body, who interprets all phenomena by the "wisdom of God;" Mr. Evans, Mr. Schow, and others. And it will thus be seen that we had quite a varied intellectual affair, as well as bodily entertainment, and for an hour or two we put the universe through all sorts of transformations that the alembic of human thought can shape. It was a tussle between logic and imagination. The logic was invincible, but the imagination was unconquerable, and so "the conflict of ages" was not over when the material repast came to an end—and I guess it will continue so long as the heart and brain of man come in contact with reality by profound differences of temperament. Only we hope that all will eat as peaceably at the same table as we did and not burn each other at the stake by way of argument.

A fair audience was present in the evening, and I discussed the labor problem from the standpoint of Freethought, showing the relation of political affairs to the matter, and that first of all, before anything really useful could be accomplished, the state must be secularized. The functions of the state must be strictly limited in order that political machinery may be used for the benefit of labor. Only a little could be done, but that little should be well done. Dr. York was present, and added greatly to the interest of the meeting by his dramatic eloquence. He is a live speaker, just the one our Eastern friends need to stir them up, so that feeling may prevail as well as thought. Dr. York has by no means lost his Methodist momentum. In it, however, shines the clear thought, and logic triumphs while fancy glows. I want all Liberal friends to make arrangements to secure the services of Dr. York. He will stir their heart and pulses to nobler endeavor.

My friend T. F. Haggerty, of the Tucker-Anarchist school, wanted to reply to some of my assertions on the uses of the state, and so it was arranged to hav a discussion on Wednesday evening, in connection with my lecture on "The Ideal Republic." An audience of several hundred was present on that occasion. I stated the Secular position, and the political doctrin of Spencer—that the state was primarily a police force and therefore must be limited in its functions and use. It must be separated from religion and theology, and all ecclesiastical influence, and stand simply for equal rights and impartial liberty. Mr. Haggerty's main assumption in opposition to my affirmation of the benefit of a Secular state was that the state is the source of all crime; therefore if the state ceased to be, crime will cease to be, and there will remain no justification for the existence of a state. I denied Mr. Haggerty's statement. I admitted that the state, at present, was the source of much crime because of its ecclesiastical and religious character. Make the state secular and it would no longer, as now, be the source of crime. I also affirmed that much of crime finds its source in the individual. Its motiv is entirely personal, and therefore a just and well administered state is necessary to repress these crimes. Crime is and, so far as we can see, always will be in human society, and it must be punished, not by mob law, but by the orderly action of the community. As crime decreases, the function of the state decreases. When crime is at an end, the state is at an end. Persuasion takes the place of force. All government is attractiv and moral. Coöperation is voluntary. The individual is supreme, but fraternity flows in deeper, grander tides than ever. All for each—each for all—this will be the mighty principle of human progress. The discussion was attentivly listened to, and the exposition of Secular politics as opposed to "Christian" was received with warm approval. Dr. York closed with a brilliant plea for this world, for all the knowledge and hope that is possible to man in the exercise of his complete faculties. Miss Florence May Smith and Mrs. Jennie Clark furnished excellent music for the occasion and received a cordial welcome.

So the meeting was a good success. Some advance was made. But San Francisco, like New York, is a difficult point. It is a commercial city. There is a constant struggle for wealth and position. There is a whirl of excitement. To reach a people in a metropolis like this requires large advertising. We had not the sinews of war. Our means were small, but they were used to the best extent, and there were four times as many present at the last lecture as at the first. One thing, however, excites my indignation—the unjust and incorrect reports of the daily press, which are unworthy the dignity of a great newspaper. We do not ask the advocacy of our cause by the press, which is for a miscellaneous people, but we do ask fairness; that what we say shall be rightly given; that competent reporters shall be sent to our meetings, and not those whose lack of justice or reason makes them a disgrace to journalism, who seek to curry favor with the powers that be by detestable lying. In many a newspaper office the priest is rampant still.

I am indebted to our Spiritualist friend, Miss Frost, for her earnest efforts in behalf of the lectures. She believes in two worlds, but with plenty of emphasis on this, for reform and humanity.

I was pleased to meet with H. L. Knight, one of our old workers on the Pacific coast, and who still keeps in the harness with undaunted zeal. Also M. S. Wahrhaftig, editor of The People, a lively little sheet for reform, that dares to be true, and seeks not ecclesiastical favor.

I had a pleasant call and chat at the office of the Golden Gate, which, taking in all worlds, makes a good fight for this. I was at the office of the Jewish Times, and was sorry not to catch the editor in, Samuel Kats, who is a liberal-minded man, and his paper is a fine exponent of radical Jewish thought and of Secularism.

Many thanks are due our friend, H. W. Taust, who did such hard work for the success of our meetings, and without his earnestness and perseverance the main elements of the enterprise would hav been lacking.

R. R. Swain is one of the old and prosperous citizens of San Francisco, but he has not lost the spirit of humanity in the rush of business. His generous contribution of nearly a third of the expenses was the solid material without which our flag must hav dropped its colors. W. H. Eastman and W. H. Ray also aided by their contributions, and hav always been ready to do their share in the work of Liberalism. A few more such and we would hav a splendid Secular Union in this city.

Dr. G. C. Hoadly is another veteran campaigner who is not afraid to be in the van of the fight.

John Beaumont, Silas Savern, J. N. Johnson, from sixty to a hundred miles away, came to the lectures; also J. B. Nunneley, of Temple, Texas, and A. S. Blair, of Galveston, gave us a good shake of the hand, and thus we felt the electric thrill of lands afar where the torch of freedom burns. So we turn to other fields with fresh hope. The world must advance by Freethought, and so we bide our time. The heaven of humanity only comes by strenuous toil.

To-day we go to San José, and a happy time we expect in that beautiful valley, where our banners hav so often floated, and our friends gathered. We shall lecture at San José April 17th and 24th; at Livermore, April 21st and 22d; at Petaluma and Ukiah, but the dates are not yet fixed; at Stockton, May 1st and 8th; at Napa City, May 3d, 4th, and 5th; at Sacramento, May 15th and 22d; and I hope to lecture in Merced, Modesto, Chico, etc., and Grass Valley, if time permits. I expect to be at Ashland, Oregon, about June 5th, and Talent, June 12th; and Jacksonville, Eugene, Portland, Salem, Silverton, Astoria, Corvallis, Forest Grove, etc., etc., during June and part of July, and then push on to Seattle, Victoria, etc., and from thence eastward by way of Pendleton, Baker City, Emmettsville, Boise City, Salt Lake City, etc. I expect to find a grand Liberal host along this line. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Mr. Reynolds in Michigan.

BELDING, April 3.—On my arrival here, I found that most energetic young couple, Mr. and Mrs. S. F. Webster, who in heart, mind, soul, and spirit are united in self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of Liberalism, had made all arrangements for eight lectures—three in Belding, two in Saranac, one in Grattan, and two in Greenville.

To accomplish this, Mr. Webster being station agent, his wife performed all his duties—telegraph operator, express agent, ticket agent; received and delivered freight, and performed all the responsible and arduous labors pertaining to station masters, besides looking after her home and the wants of her two little children, so that her husband could go away and make the necessary arrangements for the lectures.

My good friend the president of the Belding Liberal Society, Mr. Wm. Knott, was absent on a tour West, but his good wife and son Willie gave me royal entertainment. It makes life worth living to find young men like Willie Knott, reared by Infidel parents, doing justice to their instructions; honest, faithful, temperate, industrious, of bright intelligence; an earnest worker for Liberalism, and the fearless, outspoken opponent of superstition, by all beloved and respected. What a glorious reputation such young men giv to the silly falsehood that "Infidelity inculcates vice and crime, and there is no virtue only as combined with Christianity!"

I had large and enthusiastic crowds at each of the three lectures at Belding, the largest crowd of all at the last lecture. This is very discouraging to our Christian friends, their largest attendance amounting to only a corporal's guard. The Belding Liberal Society has made steady advancement during the year of its organization, and the impetus received by the lectures will enable it to continue to gain in numbers, strength, any influence.

GRATTAN, the home of Converse Close.—I had the honor of a brief interview with the heroic representativ Liberal, Converse Close, who for nigh fifteen years has been an invalid, confined to his room, every few days suffering terribly—scarce a month that he is not brought face to face with death, so that his friends think the end has come—yet ever cheerful, calm, resigned. During the little, brief intervals between paroxysms of pain he has done very effectiv work in writing for the Liberal press, and to individuals, in behalf of the gospel of humanity, seeking to pluck hate and fear from the human heart and in their stead impart some of the love, gentleness, and hope of his own. No man in the county is more highly respected, or possesses to an equal degree the love and confidence of the entire community. He has proved that the truths of Secularism that hav embellished his life are amply sufficient to rob death and the grave of all terror. If he were a Christian, the religious papers would teem with accounts of his wondrous fortitude and serenity under such long-continued affliction, and claim it was possible only through the especial sustaining power of Jesus. Converse Close knows nor needs a savior. He livs a life of justice and benevolence, and, although an invalid, he makes opportunities to help promote the happiness of others. And his brave and noble wife, whose whole life is devoted to ministering to him in his afflictions, shares the joys of Liberalism with him. I had good attendance at the church at Grattan, and hope the effort will expedite the formation of a Liberal society there. C. B. REYNOLDS.

That Visitor from Rome.

From the Commercial Advertiser.

There is a bill pending in the legislature which ought to receive earnest attention, lest it become law. It authorizes the court of sessions to send truants, etc., of fourteen years or under to the Catholic protectory, and provides that the schools of that institution "shall participate in the distribution of the common school fund in the same manner and degree as the common schools of the city and county of New York."

The schools to which it is thus proposed to giv a part of the common school fund are Roman Catholic schools, intended, as all sectarian schools, whether Protestant or Catholic, are, to promote the teaching of the dogmas and practices of the sect maintaining them and to strengthen that sect. The purpose is innocent enough so long as the schools are maintained at the private charge of those who desire to promote such teaching, but it is as far as possible from innocence when it is proposed to devote moneys raised by taxation to their support.

Under our system church and state are separate and distinct entities, having nothing whatever to do with each other. The state with us is absolutely secular and must be so if we are to enforce in practice the root principle of popular self-government, namely the absolute equality of all citizens before the law. Our population consists of Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Agnostics, Atheists, and men representing all other forms of thinking. All these are equally citizens; all hav an equal part and right in government, and it is of the essence of the system that the state shall recognize no differences between them and shall favor none more than the others.

We raise the school fund by taxing Jews, Catholics, Agnostics, Methodists, Atheists, and all the rest equally; we hav no more right or business to tax the Jew to support a Christian school, or the Methodist to support a Catholic school, or the Catholic to support a Presbyterian school, than to reverse all these processes, or to build churches at state expense, or to pay priests and clergy out of the public treasury, or to force a religion upon the people by statute. If the common school fund or any other fund raised by taxation may rightfully be applied to the maintenance of Catholic schools, due proportions of the same fund may be justly claimed for like purposes by Atheists, or Jews, or Presbyterians.

The absolute and complete separation of state funds and functions from all connection with ecclesiastical uses and practices, is both a logical necessity under our system of government and a condition of justice. All this is the a b c of the American system, but it is sometimes necessary to restate even the simplest of first principles.

Unfortunately, there are in our practice certain survivals from earlier and less republican times, which encourage unsound thinking on this subject. We follow traditions, in certain respects, which lead us astray, and so long as we do so the instinct of self-interest will continue to prompt attempts like the one under consideration, to divert public moneys to sectarian uses.

It should be the care of Americans of every name and class to make the separation between state and church affairs complete; to enforce the rule of separation in every instance, even though temporary inconvenience should result. We should first of all cease to exempt church property from taxation. Such property shares equally with all other property in the protection which the taxes pay for, and it should bear its equitable proportion of the burdens of government. On that point the most enlightened clergymen are of one mind. They see clearly that the exemption of church property is to that extent the maintenance of the churches out of the public purse, which can never be just, or equitable, or in accordance with American ideas. We should next repeal all those parts of our Sunday laws which are founded in the dogma that Sunday is a holy Sabbath, because, whether that dogma is true or not, the state has no business to enforce it, and in doing so it wrongs all that large class who do not accept the doctrin, or whose construction of it differs from that commonly accepted. The state rightly makes Sunday a legal holiday, because the people generally desire to cease from work on that day; it rightfully enacts laws to protect the people from unnecessary disturbance in their observance of the day; it rightfully seeks to close liquor shops on Sunday, as it does also on election day, because the public peace requires that; but beyond these bounds the state cannot go without invading personal liberty.

The churches of every kind are entitled to the same protection and liberty that other lawful associations of citizens are, and no more. It is their best interest, as well as that of the community as a whole, that the state should keep its hands off, that it should be rigidly confined to the duty of affording such protection, and that the separation of secular from ecclesiastical functions should be made as complete as logic and the spirit of our system require. Meantime it will be well to look out for the bill which forms the text of this article.

Gagging the Press.

From Henry George's Standard.

The following interesting and characteristic document by a strange series of accidents, unnecessary to describe, came into our hands. Its publication will surprise no one more than the gentlemen to whom it is addressed. We do not feel bound by the obligation of secrecy which the writer seeks to impose on those gentlemen. We sincerely hope that he will not excommunicate the editor and the proprietor of the Catholic Herald for our publication of the letter, and we hardly think he will deem it worth his while to excommunicate us:

452 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, April 13, 1887.

To the Editor and Proprietor of the Catholic Herald,

GENTLEMEN: By this note, which is entirely private and not to be published, I wish to call your attention to the fact that the third plenary council of Baltimore, following the leadership of Pope Leo XIII., has pointed out the duties of the Catholic press, and denounced the abuses of which journals styling themselvs Catholic are sometimes guilty. "That paper alone," says the council (decree No. 228), "is to be regarded as Catholic that is prepared to submit in all things to ecclesiastical authority." Later on it warns all Catholic writers against presuming to attack publicly the manner in which a bishop rulcs his diocese, affirming that those who so presume, as well as their approvers and abettors, are not only guilty of very grievous scandals, but deserve, moreover, to be dealt with by canonical censures.

For some time past the utterances of the Catholic Herald hav been shockingly scandalous. As this newspaper is published in this diocese, I hereby warn you that if you continue in this course of conduct, it will be at your peril. I am, gentlemen, Yours truly, M. A. CORRIGAN,
Archbishop of New York.

Our London Letter.

I notice by a paragraph in the National Reformer, date March 13th, that Mr. Bradlaugh takes exception to an opinion expressed by me in your issue of February 26th, though I fail to see what there was in the extract given to cause him to take such umbrage. You did not print the whole of my letter, or he would hav seen there was a fair set-off to the criticism to which he so strongly objects. As I hav always had considerable admiration for him, and hav openly expressed it, even when sometimes it would hav been more to my personal advantage to hav kept my views in the background. I will willingly express my regret at having misunderstood him, if such be the case; though I should hav been more likely to believe I was mistaken, if he had simply pointed out that such was the case, and wherein I was wrong. To state that I write falsehoods with "some object to gain," is no answer, and does not affect my position in the slightest. I invariably express my honest belief regarding the subject I am writing, but being far, very far, from infallible, it is quite likely I may often be wrong in the estimates I form, and am duly grateful for correction, which surely can be done without imputations of base motivs.

The new Freethought paper of Charles Watts at Toronto favorably impresses by its appearance. It is after the same style as the Secular Review he edited in London, though a decided improvement thereon. I trust he will be as successful as he desires, and will be able to promote the good work of mental emancipation in Canada.

"Saladin" has, I believe, had a good call for his recent work, "God and His Book." It contains a quantity of information which should be very useful to students of the "holy scriptures," if they get a chance of reading it—though, with due submission, I think it might hav been somewhat condensed with advantage. For my own part, I prefer his style of writing as shown in the articles now publishing in his paper on "Christianity and Woman."

Mr. H. L. Hastings, having vanquished all the "Infidels" in his own country (or is it that no one pays any attention to him?), is now favoring us with his presence, and on his return will no doubt declare he has completely demolished Freethought here. His chairman at Exeter Hall, a day or two back, stated that he had devoted more time than any other person in the States to the study of "Christian Evidence," and was fully able to satisfactorily answer any and all objections to the truth of the Bible statements or evidence regarding the same, but as he is careful to lecture only to those who believe all he has to say beforehand, he is not likely to hav occasion to show his powers in this direction. Judging from a newspaper report of a recent address he gave, I should imagin any skeptic of ordinary intelligence would be easily able to nonplus him, though no doubt he would manage to wriggle out of his difficulty on the principles adopted by the rest of his clan. He has been challenged to hold a public debate with G. W. Foote, and it is scarcely necessary to say he very readily declined; and I don't blame him. J. D.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON has just given a second course of lectures in Burnett, Nebraska. He gave three lectures also in Neligh and two in Clearwater, Neb. Address him at Longmont, Colorado.

C. B. REYNOLDS will lecture for Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia, Sunday, May 8th, afternoon and evening, at Broad and Wood streets. Subject at 2:30 P.M., "The Bible—From Whence It Came and What It Really Teaches;" 7:30 P.M., subject, "Religious Persecution of the Nineteenth Century." Seats are free. Liberals throughout the state are cordially invited by the secretary to come and giv our Brother Reynolds a rousing reception.

L. K. WASHBURN will lecture for the Society of Humanity of this city, at 28 Lafayette place, May 1st and 8th, at 8 P.M., subjects, "Religious Problems," and "Something Beyond." At 3 P.M. of the same days he will speak in Newark. May 15th he will be heard in Philadelphia before the Friendship Liberal League at its hall, Broad and Wood streets, at 2:30 and 7:30 P.M. May 28th he will be at Jobstown, N. J.; May 22d at Boonton, and if the New Jersey Christians do not lock him up, he will go from there wherever called. He is desirous of finding several engagement for week evenings near New York.

AN eager audience packed the court-house to its utmost capacity to listen to the talented Mrs. Juliet H. Severance, of Milwaukee. "Doc." Severance, as she is called in Milwaukee, is a cousin of Frank Bigelow, the Union Labor candidate for comptroler of this city. Mrs. Severance is beyond doubt one of the ablest women in America. She was a bright figure in the Cincinnati convention. Mrs. Severance has perhaps devoted as much time to the study of the labor question as any person in America, and the result of her study has given her a storehouse of knowledge which enables her to interest an audience in a high degree. The lecture lasted nearly two hours, and nobody seemed tired when it ended. The entire discourse was seasoned with good argument and delivered with no small degree of force and enthusiasm. At times the doctor grew very eloquent, especially when she referred to the degraded condition of the industrial classes. Mrs. Severance is a practicing physician and a noble woman. Should she ever visit this city again, there will not be hall-room to hold the audience that would turn out to hear her. She left for Milwaukee on the 2 o'clock train this morning.—La Crosse Labor Advocate.

Bad Pictures.

From the Winsted, Conn., Press.

Watson Heston's cartoon in the New York TRUTH SEEKER of April 16th is a railroad scene at the boundary line between this state and New York. The time is Sunday. A locomotiv, "Progress," has come up to the state line on the New York side, but there it encounters a pile of Bibles and Blue Laws, a pulpit built across the track, and a holy preacher in the pulpit. Behind the preacher is a jackass marked, "Puritanism," bearing on its back the Connecticut legislature, and over them the inscription, "Be it enacted that no railway trains shall run in this state on Sunday, as their steam whistles make so much noise that the Lord can't hear our prayers and therefore may forget all about this insignificant commonwealth."

What the consequence will be to the preacher and his little pulpit, and the jackass on the track, when the engineer of the locomotiv puts on steam and moves forward, we are left to imagin, but it is wickedly suggested that the gentlemen and their animal will get out of the way speedily and then claim great credit for having clearcd the track.

Pictures of animals and machinery, pumpkins and young people on their way reverently to meeting with books in their hands, are pure and elevating, but pictures of the Connecticut legislature astride of a jackass tend to bring the Christian religion into contempt. Such pictures should never be printed in papers that may chance to fall into the hands of women and children.

A MEDICAL society of Fredericton, Nova Scotia, has sued a woman for practicing medicin without a license. In her defense a witness averred that the only treatment received was a kiss, and the only payment made was a pair of hose. The kiss effected a perfect cure. Another witness, who had been treated by prayer, was not healed. Since her method of treatment has become known, the lady's practice has largely increased, and her patients do not care to be prayed with.

What Objections to Christianity?

For about eighteen centuries a large portion of the world hav been taught to believe in the doctrins of Christianity. We hav been taught that Christianity has been the cause of all moral and intellectual progress; that Christianity is the embodiment of truth, love, purity, and perfection, and without this religion were sin, ruin, and no salvation for mankind. We hav been taught that to doubt the divine origin of the Bible and the divinity of Christ was the vilest crime of which one could be guilty. But in spite of all the sermons, homilies, and efforts put forth for propagating this faith, doubts hav arisen, and many well-meaning and honest people hav the audacity to criticise this faith which is held so sacred by many of our fellow-men.

So far as I understand Christianity, its principal tenets are as follows: That about six thousand years ago God created the universe; that he fitted this world for man's abode; that man was made from the dust of the earth and woman from one of the man's ribs; that this pair was placed in a garden and allowed to eat of all the fruit excepting of the tree of knowledge; that the woman was tempted by a serpent to eat of the forbidden fruit, and that the woman persuaded the man to eat, and that for this act of disobedience they were cursed and driven from the garden, and all posterity shared alike in their sin and their fall; that this pair began to multiply, and mankind grew so wicked that in about sixteen hundred years God, in hope of rectifying his blunder, was compelled to drown all his creatures, excepting Noah and his family and a pair of animals of every kind; but that this proved ineffectual, and in about two thousand years after the flood it was necessary that God should beget a son who should be sacrificed as an atonement for the sins of the people; that this father, son, and Holy Ghost are one, and that a belief in these doctrins and the inspiration of the Bible is absolutely necessary to save us from eternal punishment. And as a necessary consequence Christianity claims to hav been, and to now be, the source from which has sprung all law, order, arts, science, and philosophy.

Now, I object to these doctrins because they are not founded on fact. It is not true, as the Bible asserts, and as the church has taught, that the earth was made only six thousand years ago, for there is ample evidence to show that the earth has existed for many millions of years. The time required for a globe the size of the earth to cool from 2,000 degrees, when everything was in a state of fusion, to 212 degrees was, according to the lowest estimate, three hundred and fifty millions of years, and since life has appeared there hav been more than sixteen millions of years.

There are stars so far distant that for their rays of light to reach us, traveling at the enormous rate of one hundred and eighty-five miles a second, required the lapse of more than a million years to span the gulf that intervenes. Man, also, made his appearance many centuries before the popularly received chronology. There are remains of men found in the valley of the Somne, in France, that must hav lain buried in the earth for at least fifty thousand years. In some of the caves of Europe there are found remains of man contemporaneous with the amphibious hippopotamus and cave bear. And instead of these remains bearing evidence of a state of civilization, and a high estate, and that man subsequently "fell," the evidence shows them to hav been but little removed from the animals among whom they dwelt—simply a race of marrow-sucking men. Draper says that we cannot assign a shorter date for the last glacialization of Europe than a quarter of a million of years, and human existence antedates that. The monuments of Egypt bear evidence of a high state of civilization more than six thousand years ago. Man did not first exist in a state of moral perfection, but as a low savage, and has been slowly and gradually rising in the scale of civilization.

But it is not my purpose to dwell upon the scientific phase of the question, but rather upon that of the logical and historical.

For the sake of the argument, admitting that man and woman were created but six thousand years ago, and placed in Eden, as narrated in Genesis, did not God know when he made man and placed him in the garden that he would transgress the law? God must certainly hav known this if he is omniscient, for to be omniscient he must hav foreknown everything, then he must hav worked according to a preconceived plan; for to deny the design would be denying the omniscience of God, and to deny omniscience would be equivalent to denying the existence of God. Christians cannot suppose their God was ignorant of what he was doing.

Who then was to blame for this great blunder? Who should suffer for the transgression in Eden? Certainly the creator, not the creatures who were beguiled into sinning. He made man with all his weaknesses, and beset him with temptations to sin. To say that man was made a free-will being is contrary to the argument of design, and the story such, when brought to its logical conclusion is, that the whole plan was so laid that Jehovah might gratify a stretch of despotic power. If God intended mankind to hav always remained in ignorance, why hav made the tree of knowledge? And why hav made the serpent purposely to tempt them to eat thereof? Why create a devil? And now, seeing how much difficulty devils hav made, why not exercise his omnipotence and eliminate the whole race of devils?

Mankind now becomes so wicked that God "repents having made man," and in order to correct his mistake, concludes to drown the world. I suppose that God thought he could not a second time create animal life, so in order to repeople the earth he orders Noah to build an ark, which should be five hundred cubits long, fifty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high, in which to preserve himself and family, and a pair of all living creatures, during the great rain storm.

There are two accounts, however, of the number of animals to be taken into the ark. The sixth chapter of Genesis says a pair of each kind; the seventh chapter says seven of the clean animals and fowls and two of the unclean.

How anyone can believe this absurd story is more than I can understand. The idea of such a tale being true is so preposterous and silly that it would be unworthy of any thoughtful person to discuss it were it not that so many people yet cling so tenaciously to these old legends, and vilify those who disbelieve them. A school-boy ought to know that the dimensions of the ark would not admit a pair of all animals, much less seven of part of them. Then, there must be food provided for all these animals—hay and grain for ruminants, flesh for the carnivora—food sufficient to last many thousands of animals, birds, reptils, and insects for more than a year.

The writer certainly knew nothing of the immense number of animals existing on the earth, and about the same of their habits of life.

How could the animals of the frigid zones hav endured the torrid heat? A pair of polar bears would hav been in a sorry plight migrating to the tropics looking for Noah. How did the American animals find their way to Asia to take refuge with Noah. Just imagin our grizzly bear in the ark among the kids and goats. The writer certainly could hav known nothing of the American skunk, or he would not hav been cruel enough to shut up Noah and his family with a pair of them, with only one small window in the top of the ark for ventilation. Did Noah also take a pair of all fishes and marine animals into the ark with him? God's vengeance must hav extended to them as well as to the land animals. Perhaps there was a pair of each of these appointed to stay under the keel of Noah's boat to keep out of the wet.

Not only is this story absurd and silly, but it is actually impossible that such an event could ever hav taken place. For we all know that rain is caused by the evaporation of water from the earth's surface; that when the atmosphere becomes saturated with vapor, and the vapor becomes condensed, it falls to the earth in drops of rain.

Let us suppose that all the water on the surface of the earth could at one time be evaporated and held in the clouds—which is impossible—then, when it came again in the form of rain, there could only be the same amount of water on the earth as before. Where, then, did the water come from that covered the tops of the highest mountains? and where could it go when dried up by the east wind? How could the water get beyond the influence of the earth's attractiv force?

But after the flood it seems that mankind was just as bad as before. And how could God hav expected a good harvest from bad seed? As all mankind was so wicked, Noah must hav been tainted also with "original sin," for how could he hav escaped the penalty of the transgression in Eden? Did God expect to sow tares and reap wheat? He must hav learned by dear experience that "we shall reap as we sow."

But men grew continually worse, and in spite of all the sacrificial offerings to propitiate an an angry God, in about two thousand four hundred years after the flood it was necessary to offer Christ, the "only begotten of the father," as a sacrifice—as an atonement for the sins of the people.

The doctrin of the atonement has been and yet is the curse of the Christian religion. It is the legitimate outgrowth of the dogma that by Adam's sin all posterity shared alike in his sin and curse.

If a man commits a crime, how is it possible that his child can be held guilty? How can we be held accountable for something that was done without our knowledge or consent? Such a doctrin subverts every idea of justice and outrages common sense. And how can the innocent atone for the crimes of the guilty? Is it possible that a just, true, and loving God, such as Christians describe, can be satisfied—is it possible that the majesty of the law has been vindicated—by the execution of a substitute? If we are guilty, Christ cannot bear our iniquity for us, and no man of honor would be willing to be saved in that way. If I commit a crime, the law demands my punishment, not that of another.

To teach such a doctrin must be immoral in its tendencies; but when the dogma is added that the vilest, wickedest persons can be saved from punishment by merely believing certain dogmas; that between the last vile crime and the last breath we can repent and reap a rich reward, is absolutely degrading. That doctrin pays a commission on crime, and has filled the Christian world with the basest of criminals.

A man may lead a just and virtuous life, love his family and deal honestly with his fellow-men, and yet if he fails to believe the absurdities of the Christian religion he must suffer eternal torment; yet the thief, the adulterer, or murderer, by simply repenting and believing, takes his place among the redeemed!

GEORGE H. DAWES.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

The next meeting which we held was more turbulent even than this. The demonstrations were so violent, and seemed so murderous, that the gentleman who had kindly taken us in his carriage to the place of meeting became so thoroughly alarmed that he begged me to escape with him from the window back of the platform. I said, "No; I came to speak, and these are the people that need the word. I will not ask you to remain." He said, "If you are so foolhardy, you mustn't blame me if I leave you." I said, "Not at all; go," and looking as white as a reputed ghost, he let himself out of the window, and was gone. I hav never seen him since, nor do I even remember his name. If you think he was cowardly, remember a mob is not a pleasant thing to face. I was more safe without him than with him, and, as the sequel proved, went away unharmed. The tar-kettle was there, and the feathers, but they were not used, though the three professional men of the village, the reverend, the doctor, and the lawyer, tried their best to spur others on to the sport. My voice did good service that evening in soothing the boisterous spirits. I obtained three subscribers to the Liberator (Mr. Garrison's paper), made friends kind enough to take me home with them and care for me until the time came for me to leave the place. I did not suffer very much in those dreadful times; at least I did not realize the suffering. But to-day, when I feel my nerves so shattered that to speak a half hour I am obliged to occupy a chair, or to walk half a mile I must hav the strong arm of some friend, I know that such excitement is always paid for at last. But I am not sorry for the work done, even though I feel the cost. A race redeemed, even the little I did toward it, is a memory like a benediction. It is not always what we accomplish that is the personal blessing. It is what we tried to do. About this time there was appointed by the American Society a man who evidently felt that he should be able by his extreme watchfulness to guard against any vulgar gossip or libelous report, such as some of the agents had been obliged to encounter. This man was a good man, no better than the other men who were employed, but he had the faculty of making those with whom he was associated feel very uncomfortable. He was appointed to travel and hold meetings with me, and the most uncomfortable six weeks I spent that year were while with him. He seemed to hav no idea of propriety in regard to the treatment of the people who opened their houses to us, without charge. He commanded them as he would a servant in a hotel where he would be required to pay largely for attention. I hav as yet said nothing of the homes in the West thirty and forty years ago, but I am now where it will be quite in order to describe some of them in connection with my traveling associate.

The houses were many of them log, some of them having no partition, a loft reached by a ladder, and a "bed sink" curtained to make it a little private. Other houses a little larger would hav a board partition dividing the large room, and making one or two small rooms for bed-rooms. One would hardly expect to find many of the luxuries or even necessities of modern life, as furniture, in such houses. A washbowl and pitcher had never been seen in many of them, and towels were indeed a luxury. I was a guest in one house where the children, some of them twelve years of age, had never seen a mirror. Our Eastern friend, the new agent, when shown his resting-place, always informed the host that he must hav water in his room and two towels. A woman's consternation at such a demand can be imagined, but I could hav forgiven him even the demand for two towels if only he would hav gotten up in the morning and eaten his breakfast with the family in season, so that the father of the family could hav taken his children to school, and gone about his business. I tried to call him till I learned better, for his invariable answer was, when I told him breakfast was ready, "eat it, then." I hav seen the wife and mother break down and cry with perplexity. In one of our first meetings together I said, in referring to something this man had said in his speech preceding, "My brother told you so," he immediately announced to the audience that he was not my brother, a fact I never forgot, but when referring to his words always spoke of him as Mr. ——— of ———. He did not mean any insult by this statement, but he was to be circumspect in word and in deed. In the anecdote which I hav made this long preparation to relate, you will see that circumspection will not always keep one's name from libelous reports, as in all my public life no libel was ever quite as infamous as the one connecting my name and this same person's together.

We had a meeting appointed five miles from where we had made our home (this was in Ashtabula county); a two days' meeting, Saturday and Sunday. Our host had a horse and an open wagon, the use of which he tendered us for our ride. But when the morning came, there came with it one of the most disagreeable storms of the season. The heavy rain became sleet in falling, and the wind was piercing. Our host had neither buffalo nor robes of any kind. When we had taken our seats in the wagon, the wife of our host, seeing how unprotected I was, said, "Mrs. Colman will perish; stop a minute." She went to her bed, and took from it a home-made counterpane, which the husband brought out and spread over us. The storm was so fierce that the circumspect agent could not resist the protection it afforded. In going to our meeting we passed the post-office, and Mr. ——— got out of the wagon and went in. I discovered standing in the office one of the important men of the town, a man of wealth and the deacon of the church. He had persistently denied us the use of the church, and we had found it very difficult to find a place for a meeting in his neighborhood.

We went on to our appointment, neither of us speaking to the other for the entire five miles. I was not to be outdone in circumspection; after the close of the meeting we returned, stopping again at the post-office. We had the bed-spread over our laps, as when we went. The same good deacon was at the office. A short time after this we were separated. I was sent into another county, and the gentleman into still another.

In some two weeks I received a letter from a good Abolitionist who livs very near this deacon, in which were these words: "Mrs. Colman, what does it mean? Deacon ——— is circulating a story saying that you and Mr. D. were found under the same bed-cover twice, and he can prove it?" I was too much amused for the moment to be angry. Here was my immaculate friend, who had avoided even being polite to me, accused of very strange conduct for a moral man, and with me whom he had told repeatedly that the agents were so careless in their conduct that they gave cause for talk. I immediately wrote to the writer of the doleful letter: "'Tis true; nevertheless because true the greater libel. Get a hall by paying largely if necessary, and appoint a meeting for me next Sunday; advertise so thoroughly that all who hav heard the slander shall know that I am coming." He did so, and the crowd was so great that the friends thought it best to put braces under the floor lest it should yield to the weight.

When I reached the place on Saturday, I sent a letter to the deacon saying that if he wished to avoid a lawsuit he would come to my meeting the following day and settle the matter, or I would carry the case immediately to the court and let the law settle it. He came. I had sent to another part of the state, asking A. T. Foss, with whom I had traveled a good deal in the work, and who was a very Boanerges, to come and help me. He answered by his presence promptly. We had a meeting that all who attended will, I am sure, always remember, and the contemptible Christian man attempted to excuse himself by saying that he said it for a joke. He said, "How will you settle?" I said, "You will put your name to that paper, saying that you will never again speak evil of a woman whom you know nothing evil of. I want none of your money; there are wrongs that money cannot redress. Your money perish with you!"

This was the only slander I ever paid any attention to; it was too good a chance to humiliate the author to let pass. The above are some of the experiences of an Abolitionist woman trying to work for a race who were suffering the horrors of chattel slavery. Christian people of all sects were making special efforts to raise money to send missionaries to convert the heathen to Christianity, while in several states in our Union it was a crime punishable with death for a woman with African blood to raise her hand against her Christian master, even in defense of her own chastity; and in our Northern states, like Ohio, all manner of indignities were put upon us; but when a person is fully baptized into a work for humanity, indignities are of no avail. LUCY N. COLMAN.

Syracuse, 287.

BISHOP ALEXANDER W. WAYMAN, the great leader of the colored Methodists, asked the other day why the colored people of the South increased so much more rapidly than the white, answered: "We draw from three sources, while the white people only draw from one—every colored woman whose husband is white, the children are set down on our side; every white woman whose husband is colored, which condition exists in the North, the children are set down on our side; every offspring of pure African blood, of course, is set down on our side; while the white people only draw from one source, themselvs."

Converting the Christians.

From the San Francisco Jewish Times.

The world has heard much about "converting the Jews," and little or nothing about "converting the Christians." As to the latter, let us inquire into the work accomplished toward their conversion. We propose to show that this work has been undertaken in real earnest, that the spirit of propaganda is indomitable, and that, numbers relativly considered, a thousand Christians hav been converted to Agnosticism where one Jew has been converted to Christianity. We use the term Agnosticism because it more fully than any other word expresses the opinions and views of that vast body of Rationalists or non-Christians known under various names, such as Free Religionists, Freethinkers, Infidels, Pantheists of the Spinoza school, Utilitarians, Transcendentalists, and a multiplicity of other schools of thought. The term Agnosticism was first applied by the learned Professor Huxley, and he is recognized as its author. He calls himself an Agnostic, as was Darwin, the proof of which is in a letter addressed by the great scientist to a German student. The eminent Roman Catholic prelate, Mgr. Capel, recognizes the term, and admits that it is an able and dangerous foe of the Christian religion. Good authority, the Catholic News, of New York, recognizes Agnosticism, and, as may be seen by a dispatch published in the Daily Examiner of the 2d inst., the journal first named says that the estimated Agnostics in the United States number 30,000,000. Taking this Catholic estimate as correct, and we believe to all intents and purposes it is, is it not safe to say there are 100,000,000 Agnostics in France, Germany, Italy, and other European countries, though to a lesser extent, in Canada, the Australian colonies, and elsewhere? Now, what are the means by which this vast body of 130,000,000 of educated men and women seek to convert the Christians? By purely peaceful means—through education and scientific instruction.

Think of the thousands and hundreds of thousands of intelligent Christians who hav been converted to the views of Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel, Tyndall, Prof. John W. Draper, author of that remarkable work, "The Intellectual Development of Europe;" converted to the views of Voltaire, Paine, Ingersoll, D. M. Bennett, and a host of other scientists, authors, and orators. Besides, owing to the fact that there is a great deal of intellectual dishonesty in this world, there are thousands of professing Christians so Liberalized that they are Agnostics at heart. Through business, social, and domestic influences, they conceal their honest opinions. In the United States alone there are twelve Agnostic journals, and one—a very able ally—was recently started in Canada, the Secular Thought, of Toronto. Two of the oldest non-Christian journals in America are THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, and the Boston Investigator, which has been published for more than half a century, and whose founder was an ex-Christian minister, Abner Kneeland, a Protestant before his renunciation. There is an organization known as the American Secular Union, whose avowed purpose it is to divorce from the statutes of the various states of the republic every vestige of law which in any way recognizes Christianity or the fatal alliance of church and state, and the recognition is very strong in some states, as may be known by the efforts made to enforce the Puritan Sunday and the Blue laws of Connecticut. As to the Union named, Col. R. G. Ingersoll has served as its president for two successiv years, and its present president is Courtlandt Palmer, a well-known capitalist of New York, and a gentleman of the highest culture. The Union employs a secretary at a salary of $1,500 a year, who is constantly in the field as an Agnostic "missionary." The secretary is Mr. S. P. Putnam, formerly a prominent Protestant clergyman. He is reputed to be an eloquent speaker, and is the author of several excellent works, both prose and poetry, and all fired with a burning zeal for the doctrins he has espoused. As independent lecturers and "missionaries" of the modern propaganda of Agnosticism, we may mention Charles Watts, editor of the Secular Thought, and second only to Ingersoll in ability; John E. Remsburg, a very able man; C. B. Reynolds, formerly a well-known Protestant minister, and a brilliant speaker; Jamieson, Washburn, Dr. York of this state, formerly a Methodist minister, and many others. The Canadian Secular Union is an ally of the American Secular Union. Agnostic lecturers are numerous in England and Australia, and a few in Canada, "a country that is almost hopelessly given over to superstition." There are three Agnostic journals published in Australia, and two in England, with a monthly review and the "Agnostic Annual." There are also published in India two journals which proclaim the same faith to "the mild-eyed Hindoo."

We will further inquire from another and very different point of view as to what has been accomplished toward "converting Christians." Within the memory of man, and not a very long time ago, two young girls—the Fox sisters—residing in the state of New York, one evening while at home imagined that they heard "tiny raps" on the wall, and upon listening they were repeated. In some account it is stated that one of the girls, in a girlish way, asked if there were any "spirits" there, when the tiny taps became "raps," strong and distinct. The Fox sisters were "mediums," and Spiritualism sprang into power with extraordinary rapidity, and all through "tiny, tiny" tips that from the moment first heard to this hour hav been so successful in "converting the Christians" that we hav now from five to six millions of ardent Spiritualists, all of whom before their conversion were zealous Christians. The discovery of the Fox sisters played sad havoc among the Methodists, Baptists, and other sects. Another such discovery, on some new basis, would absolutely annihilate Protestant Christianity in the United States. "Converting the Christians" by the Foxonian method was accomplished so quietly and gently that the Spiritualists called their new religion the Harmonial Philosophy.

Among all the Christians converted to Agnosticism and Spiritualism, the conversions hav been free and voluntary. There hav been no stakes, thumbscrews, no fagots, no weapons of torture of any kind, employed by the Agnostics and Spiritualists to make converts. Such inhuman means to subjugate and terrify the human conscience could not in this, as in former ages, be a complete and ghastly success, even if it were triple branded with that ominous word "infallibility"—a word full of terrible meaning to every lover of a free conscience and a free mind.

There is still another, and what promises to be a very important factor in the propaganda against Christianity. In a recent editorial in the New York Sun it was stated that the good Christians of Brooklyn and New York would be astonished if they knew the progress that Buddhism was making in their midst. It was also stated these American Buddhists had in Brooklyn alone two temples of worship. Some few years ago a very learned Buddhist priest was the guest of a wealthy lady in Brooklyn, and to his visit and her zeal in the new faith is to be attributed the result stated. A paragraph is going the rounds of the press to the effect that there is a revival of Buddhism in New York city; that is, for curios and works of art from Buddhist countries, and that it would not be strange if this were followed by the erection of Buddhist temples in the commercial metropolis of the republic. Every one thousand Buddhists means one thousand Christians absorbed into an earthly "Nirvana."

Again, we know that the great and world-wide Masonic brotherhood—its Christian branch, the Knights Templars excepted—is a faithful, unflinching advocate of civil and religious liberty, and the opponent of all ecclesiastical tyranny. This greater branch, or rather the real tree of Masonry, has undoubtedly checked and curbed the tyranny of the papal hierarchy. It has taken from Christianity many, many of the ablest minds of this and former ages.

Further, having disposed of the Protestant form of Christianity, what, we ask, has been done toward converting its older, more compact, and powerful form, the Roman Catholic? In one sense not much, and yet, in another, the forces arrayed against the mighty and despotic papal power hav gained a tremendous and lasting victory. If, in the first sense, much has not been accomplished, an opening has been made in the granit-bound masses of Catholicism. In reading the Agnostic journals—particularly our Boston and New York contemporaries—you will frequently see articles signed "Ex-Catholic." In nearly every instance the writer names his nationality, and joyfully proclaims his emancipation from mental slavery. This is a mere shadow, but it is a shadow of significance. Three-fourths of their countrymen are the religious serfs of the Roman pontiff, and that even a few of those should break their chains is a cause for congratulation. In the slow process of time may not the few be followed by the many? That would be the real redemption of their nativ land, and until it is accomplished that people must remain prostrate under two forms of despotism—the political, represented in her majesty, and the ecclesiastical, represented in his holiness.

As to the tremendous and lasting victory of which we hav spoken, it is this—the imperious and "infallible" pope of Rome is a prisoner in the Vatican. How are the mighty fallen! As the poet, Gerald Massey, says, "Ever in time is justice done." In former centuries it happened that the crowned kings of Europe who had offended the pontiff were compelled to present themselvs before the Vatican in a position the most servile and humiliating.

Who ordered the pope to his present exile? The Agnostics of Italy. The ignorant and popular idea is that there are no Agnostics in that sunny land. If you will take time to read Italian newspapers and Italian history from the days of the triumvirate, with Mazzini at its head, to the present time, you will be enlightened. The hosts who followed Mazzini and Garibaldi scorned papal power, as does the victorious New Italy party of to-day.

In this review it is not designed to discuss the merits or demerits of Buddhism, Spiritualism, or Agnosticism. We simply wish to clearly and distinctly show that three such powerful forces exist, and that their object is to extirpate Christianity.

A Presidential Candidate.

There is a good deal of talk in the labor press at present about nominating a candidate for president in the 1888 election. Shall it be done? and who shall he be? are the queries.

There is one man in the country who would honor the party nominating him; honor the office if elected—a big, broad, humane man, always in sympathy with the unfortunate and the slave industrial, as well as the slave chattel; who always errs, if at all, on the side of mercy and generosity; one with the elements

"So mixed in him that Nature might stand up,
And say to all the world, This is a man."

Of course everybody knows that his name is ROBERT G. INGERSOLL. It is by no means certain that he would allow his name to be used, for he despises the slavery of office; but if he could be induced to run, what a campaign it would be! It is cyclones to zephyrs that such another canvass never would be known.

A Mayor with Ideas.

Mayor Hewitt evidently desires to make his government of New York a lawful one, and if in his enforcement of foolish laws there is a Mephistophelian squint toward their repeal, he will all the more readily be forgiven. Under his instructions a good many store-keepers are being arrested, a large portion of whom are Jews, who, having kept their own religious day, use Sunday for commercial purposes. The editor of the Hebrew Standard protests that the closing of the Jewish stores on Sunday is unfair, and has directed to the mayor a communication upon the matter. Mr. Hewitt replies:

"I hav read with care the communication you hav addressed to me in regard to the position of my fellow-citizens of the Jewish persuasion, under the law which requires the suspension of business on Sunday. The arguments which you advance would be very proper, and doubtless very effectiv, with the law-making power. As you very well know, I do not make the laws, but I am sworn to see them executed. The Sunday law has been the subject of judicial construction, and it has been decided that it is not based upon religious principles, but upon public policy, and that it is to be observed by all citizens without regard to condition or religious belief. It does not deny to any portion of our citizens the right to observe the Sabbath day, and it does not compel them to do so. It merely provides that one day in seven shall be a day of rest, and, inasmuch as that day cannot be made to suit everybody, a day is selected which suits the majority. Doubtless this inflicts a hardship upon the minority, but under our theory of government it is a hardship which cannot be avoided. If you can suggest any method by which the law can be amended, so as to relieve citizens of the Jewish persuasion from the practical hardship of the existing law, without destroying the very object for which the law is framed, it will receive my heartiest support.

"I notice that you protest against the arrest of unoffending citizens who conscientiously observe the seventh day, and placing them 'in cells filled with the vilest of the vile.' It seems to me you beg the whole question when you use the words, 'unoffending citizens.' The simple fact is that they violate the law, and the police hav no discretion whatever as between transgressors, but must take them all to the same tribunal and punish them in the same way. The remedy is for these citizens whom you regard as unoffending to obey the law, which will giv them immunity from arrest.

"I can assure you, in conclusion, that I hav a great respect for the rights of conscience, but if the doctrin were once admitted that the law is to giv way to every man who puts in the plea of conscience, the law would become a nullity."

This letter places Mr. Hewitt squarely upon the secular basis for a rest day, and it only remains for him to take another step and advocate the repeal of the laws making it criminal to work on Sunday. It is quite within the province of the state to create holidays, and the weekly holiday should be precisely the same as the holidays now known as secular—the Fourth of July, Washington's Birthday, etc. Our present Sabbatarian legislation violates the Constitution because it rests upon religion. The Fourth of July, for instance, is a legal holiday. No employee can be forced to include that day in the week he givs to his employer. Drafts, notes, etc., due on that day are legally payable the day before, and in this country July 4th is in all respects a legal blank. Sunday should be of the same character—a legal holiday, but with no laws enforcing its observance. People should be free to do as they please with it without fear of a policeman.

We are inclined to believe that this is really the view Mayor Hewitt takes of it, and that his vigorous enforcement of the Sunday law is upon the principle of the late U. S. Grant—the best way to repeal a bad law is to enforce it. If we are correct in this view, we shall abide with patience the outcome, even if we hav to sit in the house all day Sunday for fear that some zealous policeman will "take us in" as we stroll over to our office.

"Gagging the Press."

Archbishop Corrigan's letter to the editor and proprietor of the Catholic Herald, printed in another column, is no surprise to those familiar with the arrogance of the Roman Catholic church. As the pope claims the empire of the world, so his lieutenants claim in his name the absolute right to rule their little corners of the universe. We hav known priests who interfered in the most trivial affairs of their parishes, and we hav known parishioners who would not decide upon a line of conduct until the priest had been consulted.

This despotic rule is logical enough if the claims of the church are once admitted. If Christ once lived and possessed the power of salvation and damnation, if he gave the keys of heaven and hell to Peter, with power to loose and unloose; if this power has been unbrokenly and divinely transmitted, then the pope must be obeyed in all things. He certainly has the right to say what affects faith, and must be allowed to define true Catholic doctrin. Granted all this, he can decide what Catholics may be allowed to read, and any paper displeasing him can be interdicted. And he has ordered all Catholic journals not to discuss the attitude of his church toward organized labor.

The position which Mr. Daniel O'Loughlin, the editor of the Catholic Herald, has seen fit to assume in regard to the order of Archbishop Corrigan, therefore, is illogical and subversiv of faith and ecclesiastical disciplin, for he stoutly declares that he will not obey it. "My paper," he says, "will continue to espouse the cause of Dr. McGlynn as heretofore. I recognize the authority of no man in my business matters. I am not prepared to admit that the phrase, 'In all things,' in the decree is to hav its widest interpretation. That would simply put a newspaper at the mercy of every ruler of a diocese. No council has the right to devise laws for the regulation of my business conduct. Independent of the McGlynn matter, I would not be willing to submit in all things to ecclesiastical authority."

This is brave talk for a slave, and indicates his intention of shattering his shackles. But can he do it? Archbishop Corrigan may not be able to imprison Mr. O'Loughlin for his contumacy, nor pi his type or destroy his presses, but he can forbid all Catholics, under penalty of excommunication, to read the Catholic Herald, and that would just as effectually suppress the paper's influence. He can tell the Herald advertisers of Catholic furniture and books that if they do not withdraw their favors from Mr. O'Loughlin's journal, no church in the diocese shall purchase a penny's worth of goods from them, and this would hurt Mr. O'Loughlin in the tender point of his pocket. We do not see how, under present circumstances, Dr. McGlynn's friend can successfully contest the rule of Mr. Corrigan. He talks very bravely, indeed, but the proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Who is the Deceiver?

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 2d we quoted the opinion of Mayor Hewitt, given to the reporter of a daily paper, that the museums of this city would soon be open on Sundays. "At the meeting of the trustees," said Mr. Hewitt, "there was a large preponderance of opinion in favor of opening the museums, but the trustees want to know where the money is to come from. No action was taken, as there was none to take, but I think it is certain now that as soon as arrangements can be made the museums will be opened Sundays."

Tuesday, the 19th instant, at Albany, Assemblyman Langbien's bill, giving the museums $20,000 annually on condition that the buildings were opened on Sundays, was taken up, and opposed by Assemblyman Platt, on behalf of the trustees, who said that they did not want the money on these terms. This is substantially the same bill which passed the Assembly last year, and was defeated by the influence of the trustees in the Senate. Notwithstanding Mr. Platt's opposition, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Who has been telling falsehoods in this matter? We cannot think it is Mayor Hewitt, but if the trustees assured him that they were in favor of Sunday opening of the museums, and then wrote to Albany asking Mr. Platt to oppose the bill in their behalf, their course is far from honorable. They will win more respect by pigheadedly adhering to their religious objections than by resorting to tricks to keep the doors shut.

It is very probable that the bill will pass the Assembly, but, judging from its fate in the Senate last year, its progress through that body is attended with danger. The victory which we presaged is still afar off.

The Last Word.

Were it not that the subjects discussed are of great public interest, of importance to all advocates of freedom, and very essential to Freethinkers—inasmuch as they of all men should keep the goal of absolute and impartial justice ever in view—we should print the two following letters without a word of comment. The first, from Mr. Foss, reveals an unflattering fact to us—that the gentleman has not carefully read THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"DANSVILLE, N. Y., April 9, 1887.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: My subscription to your paper expired Jan. 1, 1887. I hav been considering whether it was best to renew my subscription or not. The only reason for any hesitation on my part is the attitude of THE TRUTH SEEKER on the questions of Anarchy and Socialism. I do not deny the right of any man to free speech, or his right to advocate Anarchy or any other doctrin at all times and places. But when the direct result of such advocacy is bloodshed and murder, or crime of any kind, then the advocate should be held responsible. Neither do I deny your right to hold views different from mine on this subject, but I do not care to lend my support to any paper holding such views. So long a time, however, has elapsed since my subscription expired, that I inclose $1.50 to renew for six months.

"Yours truly, B. G. Foss."

Our friend does not like the "attitude of THE TRUTH SEEKER on the question of Anarchy and Socialism." But Mr. Foss is evidently opposed to those two philosophies, and why he should write thus passes our comprehension. Whenever we hav discussed Anarchy, we hav opposed it, and the Anarchists of the country recognize us as their opponent. The same may be said of Socialism. We forget just how many times we hav said this, but if he had read THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Foss would not hav written to us that he "did not care to lend my support to any paper holding" the views of the Anarchists.

Again. Mr. Foss would punish the advocacy of anything when such advocacy leads to murder and bloodshed, or crime of any kind. September 25, 1886, we printed these words: "If the traitor who threw the bomb that killed the policemen of Chicago could be found, we should advocate his punishment. Or if any of the condemned men had been shown to hav urged him to throw the bomb, then would their conviction hav been just." January 22, 1887, we said: "The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has stated in the clearest way possible that he is not an Anarchist. He has devoted time and space to showing why the Anarchistic philosophy is all wrong. He has said that if these men [the Chicago Anarchists] had been fairly and convincingly convicted of murder, they should meet the penalty." We hav also said, in so many words, that we do not believe in Socialism nor in Communism.

Yet Mr. Foss does not take the same view of Anarchy and Socialism that we do, and hesitates about taking the paper because of our published opinions! We wonder what his opinions are upon these subjects.

What we hav said in the foregoing will apply to a good portion of the following:

"SIR: You hav not on your books a more thorough Freethinker than I hav been all my life, and most of the time I hav stood alone in the fight with superstition and intolerance. I will add that I am patriotic, and it grieves me to see the leading Freethought paper of the country throwing its influence in favor of Anarchy. When, about a year ago, I commenced taking your paper, I took special pains to put them into circulation with all who would read them. But after those Chicago riots they would say to me, 'Do you take a paper that advocates Anarchy?' which I would at first deny. They would say, 'But it does—at least indirectly,' and I was forced finally to admit that it did and does. I am ashamed to recommend a paper that apologizes for men who labor, directly or indirectly, to destroy the best government on earth, and almost everything else of good to men they avow it and try to practice it too. It is the worst thing possible that could happen, in my opinion, and they are the worst class possible, take their own word for it. They are vipers that we hav warmed to life to sting us to death for our liberality and kindness in this land of the free and home of the oppressed of all nations. Talk of impudence or lunacy!

"I know that you deny it and say that you are not an Anarchist; but, Mr. Editor, you might as well be as to take the the course you do, in assuming that the rioters in many instances were in the right, and that the officers of the law were in the wrong. I hold it to be the duty of all good citizens to sustain all in office in their efforts to enforce the laws and to punish disturbers of the peace, for they are supposed to represent and act for the people, and they do come as near to it as we hav been able to get. We might as well hav no law and no officers if they are not to be sustained. The Copperheads during the war took a similar course, called the soldiers 'Lincoln's hirelings,' and did what they could to hinder the Union cause indirectly. All that I hav talked with (a great many) on the subject, and whether Christians or Infidels, all agree that the tone of THE TRUTH SEEKER, when it has anything to say on the subject, is always to pettifog their cause (the cause of crime); and in doing so you disgrace all Liberals. And the most of the articles you publish from correspondents on the (I think at one time it was as many as two-thirds of them) subject of Anarchy were Anarchical. Do the majority of your correspondents hold such views, or do loyal articles—the law and order articles—go into the waste basket? You, of course, hav a right to. I only tell of the straws that show which way the wind blows. I would like to know what the majority of your subscribers think on the subject.

"You say, in defense of your position as to the Chicago Anarchists, that your information comes from reliable sources, and mention Mr. E. A. Stevens as one, and add that if it had not been for him the Liberal societies there, one and all, would hav gone over to the Anarchists. Well, that is saying something for him, but not much for the intelligence or loyalty of Chicago Freethinkers! It looks as if about all of your correspondents in Chicago and Milwaukee were of that class, as their writings show. Even Mr. S. P. Putnam says, in his letter from Chicago, 'that they (the Anarchists) seem not to hav had a fair trial.' But then he speaks of being in E. A. Stevens's company, which might account for it, though in the letter to the Investigator he does not seem to be so sure of it.

"So much has been said on the subject of those riot trials that I wrote to an old friend in Chicago, who is well known as an Infidel and a prominent lawyer, for his opinion. He says, 'I gave close attention to the evidence and rulings of the court, all of which were printed from day to day, and my judgment is that those men were fairly tried and rightfully convicted, and that the safety of the people requires that the sentence of the court be carried out.' And further on he says, 'I believe them to be morally as well as legally responsible. I believe those are the views of the intelligent and order-loving people of this city.'

"Mr. Editor, you are seriously damaging our cause, and on the whole you are not losing subscribers by it, you are trading off good citizens for the criminal class. You might as well say that none of a party of railroad wreckers should be hanged because the one of the lot could not be identified that drew the spike or moved the rail by which the train was wrecked. Or that eminent Anarchist, Geronimo; perhaps none of his murders could be proved on him, and yet he is held a prisoner contrary to law, you may say, by a tyrannical government—at least it don't say by what law it holds him. I think it proper and right for you to occasionally put in an able article on the wrong side of all questions, but when you put in more than half the matter on the subject, editorials and all, on the wrong side, I think it can be said with truth that you are siding with the enemies of good government.

"And now, Mr. Editor, I hav said some unpleasant things, but I am a member of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, and in families they think they hav a right to talk plain; that is my excuse on account of my interest in it. I hav said, or written rather, all I shall on the subject of Anarchy, and will now talk of the good things. I consider W. Heston a brilliant success, so are Putnam, Remsburg, Reynolds, and, generally, John Peck. Your editorial about Beecher was first-rate, my opinion of the man on most points.

"I will send in the money for a renewal before the time expires, and expect to send with it a new subscriber. I would like to get a great deal of the literature you hav for sale, but Florida is under a cloud at present, and money too scarce. With no oranges to sell for one year and a half from now, the prospect is not flattering.

"Hoping you may see the error of your ways, and refrain from a course seeming to encourage wrong-doing,

"I remain, Yours truly, N. S. HAZEN."

When Mr. Hazen says that THE TRUTH SEEKER throws its influence in favor or Anarchy, or that it directly or indirectly advocates that impracticable philosophy, or that we seek to destroy the government, he says what he cannot prove. January 22, 1887, we made this proposition to a Western gentleman who had said substantially the same thing that Mr. Hazen now repeats: "We will pay him one hundred dollars for every editorial he can find in THE TRUTH SEEKER advocating the destruction of either law, order, or society." The same proposition is made to Mr. Hazen, for we are getting a little impatient with those good folks who make charges that they do not offer to prove.

Mr. Hazen's opinion of the Anarchists is not flattering to those men, but as it is probably drawn from long and intimate knowledge of them we cannot, from insufficiency of evidential experience, deny its justness. Every Anarchist in the country may, for all we care, be a viper walking around on the point of his tail; it has nothing to do with the case at present. But this "land of the free and home of the oppressed of all nations" talk is the spread-eagle buncombe of the country crossroads Fourth of July orator. Well-informed people do not talk that way at present, because they remember the slaves of the sunny South, and the thousands of unemployed and starving white men now tramping the country or sleeping in the station houses of the cities. Our law-making forces do many righteous acts, and many infamous deeds. We would never support an officer in doing wrong, and the penitentiaries of the country afford positiv evidence that the people of the country agree with us.

That the Anarchists had a fair trial (which is the only point really in dispute between the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and his critics) Mr. Hazen brings the opinion of a Chicago lawyer. Let us see. Take the case of Mr. Neebe, for instance, who was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. The only proved connection between him and the Anarchists was that some time, several years ago, he owned stock in the Arbeiter Zeitung. He was not at the Haymarket meeting at all. Neither was Schwab, who was sentenced to be hanged. And there is no pretense from any one that any of the convicted men threw the bomb which killed Policeman Deegan and others. If a trial, resulting as that did, when such facts are undisputed, is a fair trial, then we want the definition of an unfair trial.

In Florida, for whose laws Mr. Hazen has, of course, infinit and unbounded respect, it is a misdemeanor to follow any pursuit on Sunday. Supposing some Christian asserted that he had seen Mr. Hazen cultivating his orange field on that day, and the grand jury should indict the Infidel. When Mr. Hazen goes to court he proves that he was miles away from his home on Sunday, and could not possibly be guilty. "Well," says the Christian, "some one was working on your place, and as you are known to be an Infidel, and to sympathize with men when arrested for Sabbath breaking, and as you own the orange grove, it doesn't make much difference; we will punish you for your sympathy with Sabbath-breakers, anyway." And supposing the court accepts that view of the case, and fines Mr. Hazen fifty dollars as it legally could, would he think he had had a fair trial? and would he ever after cheerfully support "all in office in their efforts to enforce the laws and to punish disturbers of the peace?" If he would, he deserves to be a slave to Sunday laws forever.

In the communications we hav printed upon the Chicago affair, we hav been as impartial as the number of manuscripts sent us would allow. We hav not suppressed opinions adverse to our own, neither hav we sought supporters. The proportion of communications pro and con on this subject, noted by Mr. Hazen, indicate how Freethinkers stand.

And lastly, we deny that we can injure the cause of liberty of opinion by advocating liberty of opinion. To us it is most amazing how Freethinkers, who are persecuted in many states, arrested and indicted because they express their honest opinions, can advocate the suppression by law of anybody's else opinion. Such men, it seems, advocate liberty when liberty is going their way, but when it conflicts with their notions, they clamor for the constable to suppress that treasonable fellow who disagrees with them. Christians are just as cocksure that Freethinkers are vipers that they hav warmed to life to sting them to death for their liberality as Mr. Hazen is that the Anarchists are. The Boonton Christians say, for instance, that the reason they arrested Mr. Reynolds was because he drew a crowd to his tent and disturbed the peace, besides insulting the Lord. Of course this is not so—for they arrested him for uttering heresy—but it is very easy to justify tyranny when the victim disagrees with us.

AMONG the events of the week was the presentation to Dr. Curran, by the teachers and ex-teachers of St. Stephen's church, of a beautiful golden chalice, set with rubies and diamonds. St. Stephen's parish contains more starving, squalid Catholics to the square rod than any other piece of land in this country.

WE hav heard a great deal of talk lately about the Catholic church being the shield of society against the discontent of the workers. But it seems that the Romish church, like St. Paul, is all things to all men, and shows different sides in different countries. It will surprise a good many to learn that Krupp, the great gun-maker of Germany, thinks it necessary to forbid his thousands of workmen to read two Catholic papers published in his neighborhood, the Rhenisch Westfalische Volksfreund and the Essener Volks Zeitung. In his circular Herr Krupp says he considers the papers dangerous to peaceful relations between employers and their work people, and prohibits all of his employees living in his dwellings from either keeping on hand or reading them. His oversecrs are directed to see that the ukase is carried out. It will strike an American that Mr. Krupp is rather exceeding his rightful province as an employer, and playing the part of a despicable tyrant. His employees are men, not slaves, and we hope that every one of them will read both papers.

UNDER the auspices of the Home Missionary Society of the Methodist church, Mrs. A. F. Newman recently delivered a lecture on the "Evils and Treason of Mormonism" in this city. She said she had spent ten years in studying Mormonism in the polygamous homes and institutions of Utah. "Mormon Sunday-school books and catechism are so bad," she said, "that I would be arrested for sending them through the mails, yet immorality from these books is taught to innocent children, and the books daily read in homes and churches." This is about the same language Freethinkers use regarding the Jewish Bible and Christian worship from it. And inasmuch as the Mormon Bible is borrowed of the Jewish book, and is much the more decent of the two, we cannot but thiuk Freethinkers are better justified in their charges than Mrs. Newman. The Sunday-school paper published for Mormon children is thoroughly religious, and one has to be familiar with the craft to detect the difference between it and the Christian Sunday-school papers. Mrs. Newman, we fear, is prejudiced.

As previously noted, the Romish church has been graciously pleased to award its approval to the Knights of Labor providing they do not accept certain social theories now widely advertised and accepted. Of this approval, Mr. Buchanan, one of the promineut Knights of Chicago, said: "There is no need to deny that the tendency of the organization is toward the doctrins of Henry George. Our constitution shows a pronounced bend in that direction. That accounts for the extremely qualifying nature of this papal indorsement. The ideas of George giv the motiv power to the instrument that will eventually ruin the church of Rome. These ideas deny the right of the church to the immense proprietorship of land which it has always wielded. In their hearts the papal authorities hate the Knights as they hated the Covenanters, and this feeble indorsement is merely an affair of expediency. It has a string fastened to it, and the string will be pulled the instant that it becomes plain that George and Dr. McGlynn are to continue in the ascendency. The church needs us more than we need it." As Mr. Buchanan is a Catholic, these words are promising.

THE Rev. Myron W. Reed is talked of as successor to Henry Ward Beecher in Plymouth pulpit. Mr. Reed was a college mate, in the theological seminary, of the secretary of the American Secular Union, and is at present the most popular and brilliant preacher in Denver. When Mr. Putnam visited that city last summer, he described his whilom friend as a first-class heretic, preaching humanity and reform in this world, and possessed of too little theology to swear by. Reed likes to tell this joke on himself: When preaching in Indianapolis a few years ago, he took a trip to Michigan to fish and hunt. He made the acquaintance of several lay sinners, and his actions and conversations never revealed that he belonged to the cloth. When he left, he invited his newfound friends to call upon him if they visited Indianapolis. This they soon did, and inquired for "a lawyer by the name of Myron Reed." "Don't know one," they were told. "Don't know Myron Reed?" they rejoined. "He said any one in Indianapolis could tell us where he lived." "Oh, Myron Reed! He's a preacher." "A preacher!" exclaimed the Michiganders; "why, we thought he was a gentleman." "Reed is doing glorious work where he is," wrote Mr. Putnam, "but I believe he will do bigger work in the future." Perhaps Putnam's prophecy meant Plymouth pulpit.

Letters from Friends.

MOUNT JACKSON, VA., April 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your notice to me informing me that my subscription to your paper will soon expire is received. I herewith send you my check for $3 to renew my subscription. I do not know what I would do if I should be deprived of the regular weekly visits of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which has been a constant friend and companion since 1878. With best wishes I am sincerely your friend, L. WALTERS.

STANLEY, IOWA, April 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I take this opportunity to drop you a line for the purpose of informing you of our organization. We completed on the seventh of this month the organization of the Fayette County Secular Society, and elected our officers as follows: President, John S. Brewer, of West Union; vice-president, James F. Smith, of West Union; recording secretary, E. D. Godfrey, of Maynard; corresponding secretary, G. Hennage, of West Union; treasurer, Wm. Redfield, of Stanley; committee, Daniel Davis, of Fayette; Alexander Risk, of Stanley; A. C. Smith, of West Union; S. T. Barns, of Maynard; Joseph Patterson, of Brainard.

WM. REDFIELD.

DE LEON, IA., March 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. S. P. Putnam has given us three lectures in all. After his last two we organized a Secular Union with twenty-one members, a number of them ladies. We had regular meetings until the weather was too bad for our elder laborers to attend. Since then we hav been aiding literary societies, and a glorious good time we hav had. We hav a great variety of exercises, and discussed most every question. We hav some good talent, and on the whole we feel there has been progress made and in keeping with the time in which we liv. The question has been sprung in our county papers concerning teaching Bible in public schools, and one lady teacher admitted it was not a school book, and that she had just as good a right to teach Paine or Ingersoll in school as Bible, and many of our prominent citizens hav expressed themselvs in a similar manner. I am of the opinion the Bible should be confined to the church and Sunday-school, and let those teach it in their homes that wish to.

JOHN W. LONG.

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue, of the 9th inst., I noticed an article from the great Robert G. Ingersoll about the Rev. Dr. McGlynn and the Catholic church, which every honest man of toil should read. If that article should reach the strictest orthodox Catholic, it would open his eyes; it would lead him to see how inhuman the church is, what oppressiv means she uses against the laboring class that is supporting her.

Men! Men! when will you begin to see light? When will you learn to know that your fellow-being is not selected by God as your superior? And that the popes, the bishops, and archbishops (with two red caps or three white ones) are a fraud? The religious doctrins are only kept up by those whom you support and whom you nurse with your honest perspiration. To vote for whom you please, to act as a good citizen, and to lecture for a good cause is against the disciplin of the church. To follow the Corrigans, the Crokers, etc., is not against the disciplin of the church because it is "Tammany," you know.

Again, I wish to call your attention to an article from Quebec—which I read in this morning's paper—that an encyclical letter was read in the Catholic churches of Canada to-day suspending the condemnation of the Knights of Labor until the pope shall hav fully investigated the order and passed final judgment upon it. "What fool these mortals be!" B. W. GOLDOWSKY.

HARWICH, MASS., March 26, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.50, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months to inclosed address. We are told by the church people that we can do nothing of ourselvs. "God must do it all." Why doesn't he do it, then? If he is waiting to be gracious, and is desirous that we should be saved, who is to blame but himself for not saving us? If he can make us all good and happy, and won't do it, he ought to be ashamed of himself. They tell us we must pray, and pray in faith, for his blessings. What courage hav we to pray when Christians hav been praying sixteen hundred years, and never had a prayer answered yet? They must hav cheek in an eminent degree. But what sort of a God is he that needs to be coaxed to bless us? If I had the power that they say he has, I would not want coaxing to do the right thing. I'd put things to rights instanter, and put the devil on his good behavior at once.

But, there! how can we expect the stream to rise higher than the fountain? No more is it reasonable to think that people will make their gods better than themselvs.

I am not an alarmist, but I know but too well how glad ecclesiastics would be to put the yoke upon our necks, the ring in our noses, and march us into their ranks, or to the stake. Superstition is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, and would bear the same fruit. We may hav our differences in minor matters, but must unite our efforts against our common enemy, until the earth is rid of its dreadful influence. "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin." Of course not; and without a hell Christianity wouldn't be attractiv at all. Let a minister giv out that he don't believe in hell, and something is the matter at once. As the story goes, an orthodox woman and a restorationist got into a dispute upon religion, the woman accusing him of not believing in hell. "Oh, I believe in hell for awhile, after which we are restored." "Well," says the woman, "that's better than no hell at all." Christians are like Zachary Taylor—"giv 'em [the Mexicans] hell!" said he, and the soldiers were fired up anew to the conflict.

Well, Eugene, you are young, and in an influential position, and are surrounded, as it were, by a brilliant galaxy of contributors, who are splendid helpers; but let me tell you, you will hav your hands full to clean out the state of its corruption, and the church of its superstition. But it is only a question of time (the mills of the gods grind slowly), and I bid you goodspeed. B. F. ROBBINS.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., April 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Hark, from the tombs no doleful sound! Why, Dr. J. L. York, the pioneer of the Pacific coast, is here blowing the bugle-horn of Freethought, free speech, freedom, equal rights for man, woman, children; everybody—rich, poor, black, any color—the measure of the stature is mind, physical and mental culture, rounded by reason. His steel hammer blows tingle and will awake the dear souls who hear. Our Opera House has been packed for two nights, March 20th and 22d. The first night "Evolution vs. Creation" was handled in a masterly, scholarly, and not to say scientific manner would fail to tell the truth. The next night the subject was "Individuality," the packed house was held at times silent, anon bursting with applause as the sallies of pathos, wit, facts, and logic came from our esteemed and gifted orator.

The doctor goes East about the 1st of May on a lecture tour, and we of this coast bespeak for him an ovation as a hero of no small fame—red-hot from the Australian colonies—loaded, primed, ready for the fray. He blows his own trumpet, pays his bills, and you go away from his lectures a richer, braver, better man, woman, or child. Friends along the line should see to it and not let him pass by unheard. If fifty miles away and the news comes that Dr. York is coming, pack up and be off. There is only one York, and you cannot afford to miss hearing him. The doctor will not rest until he brings up at Paine Memorial Hall, Boston.

N. WOOLSEY.

READING, KAN., April 2, 287.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is the welcome torch of freedom. It is the Bennett electric light of the nineteenth century.

I listened to Moody at Emporia, Kan., two years ago. He said that Infidels and skeptics made fun of Jonah and the whale story, but a true Christian will not doubt any of the Bible, and if it said that Jonah had swallowed the whale, he would believe it to be so.

Could not the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Liberals in Emporia and vicinity club together and get Brother Remsburg, or Putnam on his return trip from the West, to stir up the old snake? I will contribute my mite. I hav labored hard to keep its slime from our public school here. The board hired an orthodox teacher, and he holds a religious service each morning at the expense of Jew and gentile, orthodox and heterodox.

My little girl of eleven years asked me one evening if there was a man by the name of Elijah taken up to heaven in a whirlwind. She said the teacher was reading about him and another man, and she wanted to know if it was a Kansas cyclone he went up in. I told her to ask her teacher.

I told the board that I objected to having such stuff rubbed into my child, but they said that they had to abide by the will of the majority.

Valley Falls must be the Rome of Kansas, with the supreme court as pontiff.

The picture of March 26th is an exact one of the Methodist Episcopal church house of Reading.

I cannot do without your paper, so inclosed find a remittance. I hav tried to increase its circulation, and will send you a few names. W. O. DAVIES.

BERLIN, N. J., April 5, 1887.

FRIEND MACDONALD: I cannot tell you how glad I was to see your cartoon, "The Methodist Conference," in your issue of April 9th. It is capital! true to life—a picture in which the reverend drones can see themselvs as all really rational, thoughtful people see them, and ought to shame them out of the pulpit into some useful employment. It is so true to life that it ought to be posted up everywhere, in highways and byways, that all might see it. Two or three years ago three or four hundred Methodist bishops and priests held a great conference in Philadelphia. A city priest welcomed them to the city, and the priest who replied to him warned the people that they had come thither to occupy all the soft beds and eat all the good food and luxuries the city could furnish. Very different from their master, who could make a dinner of raw corn as he passed through the field after preaching, and never asked for soft beds or luxuries. But they worked their way into private families, two or more in a place, and the women went to work with a will to giv them soft beds and the "fat of the land;" and after they had waited on the dead-beats nearly four weeks, the question came up in the conference whether women should be licensed to exhort or preach, and was voted down; thus deciding to keep women a while longer on a level with idiots, according to the commands of St. Paul, who for eighteen hundred years has cursed women more than any other man that ever lived.

Women, as one of our cartoons represents, are the main supporters of the church. They are very nice to prepare soft beds and serve good food and luxuries for the indolent frauds; very nice to work slippers and make fancy morning-gowns for them; nice to get up fairs, feasts, festivals, and fancy shows, and beg to raise money for them, but when it comes to competing with the drones in the pulpit they must be kept down among idiots. They hav wit enough to know that wowen hav to work cheaper than men, and as any fool brought up in the church can repeat the old pulpit stories about an angry God, death, hell, and the devil—that no one knows anything about—they know that if women get to preaching their own occupation will be gone.

What a pity it is that women hav been so erroneously taught as to think it a duty to work for the reverend frauds! Go on with the pictures! They cannot fail of doing good. Thousands of churchmen will glance at a picture who would not read a line in your paper; and a glance at the pictures will set them to thinking, and thought, like leaven hid in dough, will finally leaven the whole lump, or open their eyes to the truth. All who take your paper ought to show the pictures to their pious neighbors. J. HACKER.

FARMINGTON, O., March 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs Lydia L. Curtis, my wife. and for some years a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, died at De Funiak Springs, Fla., Feb. 24, 1887. She had been in poor health for some years, and went South in the hope of an improvement of health, but it was too late.

Though a Spiritualist she was not a bigot. She read THE TRUTH SEEKER with much interest, feeling that its work in showing the false claims of the church was of great service to the people.

Some of our personal friends who are mediums allege they hav seen and talked with her. She is joyous in the change. She is not weighted down with that enfeebled body. She explained the mystery to us of going off to die alone. She was very impressible herself, so we wondered and even faulted the spirits that they did not impress her to stay at home. She said they influenced her to go, that she could not stay long in the body anyway. If she stayed in her home, where everything was impregnated with her life-forces, and surrounded with her family and friends, she would be held by these influences till of very feebleness of body and spirit she could stay no longer. She would be much enfeebled in spirit, requiring time and treatment on the other side to recuperate. By going away she could slip off with comparativ ease, and be much better off as a spirit.

To many of the noble men and women working in the Liberal cause, this will seem to be idle vaporing, but I firmly believe they will find there is more to us than the breath in our nostrils; that there is no death, only change, and they will be able to work for the good of humanity, embodied and disembodied, after the change called death.

E. F. CURTIS.

BRATTLEBORO, VT., March 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: As a subscriber and admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I wish to say a few words concerning it.

Since I began taking the paper, nearly two years ago, I hav found it impossible to do without it, and rather than giv it up now would pay double the price charged for it; in fact, to me it is "worth a farm," as the saying goes. The cartoons especially are certainly an important and essential feature of the paper, and are doing good work in showing to the masses how inconsistent is the Christian plan of salvation with the law of reason and common sense. Mr. Heston deserves much credit for his studiousness in so correctly illustrating the absurdities of Bible Christianity, so-called, and it is only fair to say that he is entitled to his share of praise in helping to make THE TRUTH SEEKER a warranted success. To deny that the effect is beneficial, as well as influential, is to repudiate the truth, for I know from my own personal experience that since you began the illustrations the paper has been sought for more than ever before by my Christian friends, and the anxiety they manifest each week to see the "pictures" is frequently quite amusing. The new subscriber I sent you last week was induced to take the paper because of its being so graphically illustrated, and he, no doubt, will giv it a wide circulation among his acquaintances, thereby lending his aid in spreading the gospel of humanity.

Only this week a minister said to me that one-half of the Congregational churches were going to hell, which simply confirms what Robert G. Ingersoll said a few years ago, that orthodoxy is dying. Well, let it die. It is of no earthly use to anyone but ministers and politicians, and perhaps now and then some man with more of an eye to business than anything else. Men with minds of their own, and who are possessed with sound and practical ideas, do not require it. But there is one thing we must not forget, and that is that while orthodoxy is dying, Catholicism is not. We can never hope to see universal freedom of thought established so long as a vestige of superstition remains, whether Catholic or Protestant. The rising generation, however, is improving somewhat in regard to independence of character, so far as religious matters are concerned, as is evinced by them in their determination to resent any interference of church authority in anything pertaining to amusements, such as dancing, card-playing, and so forth.

One town in this county, not far from here, as an example, has had a series of dancing-schools the past winter, attended principally by church-members, and the several ministers were so disturbed by such wicked proceedings that one of them could not sleep nights. He expostulated, but in vain, for they insisted on dancing, and did dance, much to the reverend's discomfiture. To offset their departure from the paths of righteousness, and to counteract the evil influence engendered thereby, a revival is now talked of. But it won't work, because people are getting so they don't take any stock in them whatever. Another town, adjoining the one referred to, has lately dismissed its pastor, who was of the old school theology, for the reason that he believed everybody but himself and a few near relativs were destined for hell. That was more than his congregation could stand, hence his departure for other and more congenial fields to labor in. Man made all the gods, heavens, hells, and bibles ever invented, and through fear of that greatest of all humbugs, hell, man has domineered over, tyrannized, bulldozed, threatened, tortured, and murdered his fellow-creatures for ages. Since man abolished the infernal place, he has lost his grip on the people, as each succeeding year demonstrates. The light is breaking. Let the good work go on, and may you, Mr. Editor, and your able corps of assistants, liv long enough to see the end of all priestcraft and superstition, is the sincere wish of, Yours truly, A. L. F.

WARRENSBURGH, N. Y., April 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, which please use as directed. I am pleased to read the "Letters from Friends," and also the letters from the children to Miss Wixon; pleased to think that the young and rising generation may progress high above the degradation and superstition of the church; that they may not wallow in the mire and dirt for sixty years, as I hav, and pay insurance against the orthodox hell. I am not the only one among the many of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers that has traveled the same dark and narrow way. If I were, I should feel chagrined to hav anyone know it. I owe my salvation to THE TRUTH SEEKER, for snatching me from that eternal sheol. I feel now that I am out of the darkness of superstition, and I see the bright light that has always been hid under the clergy's cloak. This town is next to Boonton, N. J. Last September Mr J. T. Brown came here with me from the convention at White Sulphur Springs, and I engaged the hall for the lecture on Wednesday, the 15th. Well, on that evening the hall was well filled—about one hundred, nearly all young people. The subject was, "Modern Infidelity," and when the lecture was about half through, the young ladies began to leave, and the young men, and they went into the street and commenced to yell and hoot, so that we could not hear what the speaker said, and soon began to throw dirt and gravel, which broke up the lecture. The most of the young people were Catholics, who came for that purpose, and said that if he was there the next evening they would hav tarred and feathered him. So, my dear readers, you can see the hot bed that I am in. May THE TRUTH SEEKER float over this nation till orthodoxy shall go to oblivion. WM. WILCOX.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Cardinal Manning, in his letter on the Knights of Labor, says: "Hitherto the world has been governed by dynasties. Henceforth the holy see will hav to deal with the people. The more clearly and fully this is perceived, the stronger Rome will be." How thankful the people or America ought to be to his holiness, the pope, to take the place of dynasties, and so deal with the people as to strengthen Rome! What a glorious end of this great republic—a mere prop to strengthen Rome! How hav the mighty fallen!

I see another bishop writes that the church cannot agree to abet Henry George, because he advocates theft; he wants to steal the land; and yet they support the Irish, who are making the same demand. Why is this? Because they can harass a Protestant nation by advocating in Ireland what they condemn in America. We all know that all nations that hav been enslaved hav been first deprived of the land, either by the sword or by some more ingenious way of getting possession of it, for instance, giving it to corporations, or selling it to syndicates. Why, all the land in Europe has been stolen from the rightful owners, the people, and by that means they hav enslaved the many to the few. Who advocates theft but the church and the tyrants they support? Henry George wants the land restored to the people, the rightful owners, and I suppose he wants those who use it to pay a fair rent for the privilege. He would hav no exemption, not even if it was covered over with churches. One of the greatest evils now is the exemption of church property from taxation. Why should the whole people be made to pay the taxes for the churches? It is the grossest of tyranny, as it looks to me. J. DOWNES.

LEXINGTON, KY., April 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A writer for your paper remarks that women wish to "love passionately." Such critics should devote themselvs to the cause of reform—no one cares whether by reason or love, so they are successful. But to be constantly casting jewels into the sea will do no good. I propose that the subject of prison reform be agitated by them at once. Shall not a portion of the convicts' wages be reserved for their future use in some place where they can use it to advantage? Or shall they be cast upon the world with five dollars?

Also, let those not satisfied with the feeble suggestions of women organize an Infidel tract society. Keep these subjects before the people, and in a few months something better than criticism can be accomplished. How mortified I feel, nearly every day, to hav five or six tracts handed me by Christians, when I hav nothing to offer in return!

Nextly, as the Catholics expect to canonize a new saint, Sir Thomas More, let us remember how piously said More, three hundred years ago, dragged James Bainham, an honest lawyer, for his opinions, into his coal-cellar, where he was chained to a post and lashed. The bishop of London kindly repeated this ceremony. More then caused this miserable man to be racked in the holy tower of London, and lastly burnt at Smithfield. Such demonstrations would giv a charming luster to piety, even in this degenerate age.

As to the cartoons, they burst upon us like the thunders of an apocalypse! They tell us, in powerful tones, what has been, what might hav been, what will be. Alas for the Belshazzars who behold their power departing! How their knees knock together with fear! How they compromise!

Modern Jews reject the follies to which their ancestors clung. In their papers we find the remark, "Worshiping God injures the nervous system; the mind is diseased which is guilty of this act." Then think of the vile scum of a corrupt ancient book pasted over the brains of the "people" of the United States; its silly doctrins descanted upon every Sabbath by men who certainly do not mean a word they say. Cicero would hav regarded with loathing a people who preferred St. Paul and Isaiah and Jeremiah to Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius. We know, then, the condition of our literature. It is palsied by this and other errors, and it is diseased, languishing, stifled, cowardly, corrupt, sniveling, apologizing to the most disgusting of human beings, flattering the most ignorant of the clergy. How can a manly literature exist in such an age, noted chiefly for its priest-ridden, shoe-wiping people, devoid of all nobleness and independence, the lust of mammon being the strongest incentiv to action?

And then the foolish women, who allow clergymen to whine over their children and teach them what they know to be lies, but hav not the courage to say so! Some remark that an American poem has never been written. But you know what a beauty it would be—brimful of flattery, falsehood, deception; incapable of a robust philosophy; plentifully flavored with the filthy, decayed scraps and refuse which the modern Jew has cast from him with loathing and contempt.

This being Lent, I attended church, and was duly informed that God is slow to anger. I suppose he has heard of the new probation scheme, and is cooling off a part of sheol for the reception of persons who would hav been devout if they had enjoyed the chance. And think what a pleasure is in store for them! They will soon know all about Jonah, and Samson, and others like them. The people of India do not seem "dispoged" that way, as Mrs. Gamp remarked.

Pericles remarked that "the post of honor was generally that of danger." Of the two, I would rather flatter and praise an Anarchist than a greedy monopolist, for without such fiery hearts the very name of freedom would be a mockery and byword upon the earth. Tremble not if palaces crumble and the ruins of a false civilization lie thick around you. So the lovely light of virtue is not extinguished, the full sunshine of hope is blazing upon the home of the patriot and honest man. ALHAZA.

KENT, OHIO, March 29, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A few years ago your subscriber brought the first TRUTH SEEKER to Kent. And after a time, by dint of much perseverance and persuasion, I succeeded in getting a few subscribers, and bought a lot of Truth Seeker tracts and pamphlets, including "The Bible Abridged," "Crimes of Preachers," Bennett's "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," etc., many of which hav long since gone the way of Michael Servetus—but of course the average Christian will not know what that means, so I will simply say for his information that they fell into the hands of Christians and they burnt them up for Christ's sake, just the same as that saint, John Calvin, burnt Servetus. Well, after awhile we organized a Secular Society and a Library Association, and purchased a small library of you. And right here I will say that Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" and Graves's "Sixteen Crucified Saviors" are in great demand, and we will hav to hav some extra copies to accommodate the friends. Our library is producing a wonderful revolution in thought, and its membership is daily increasing. I need not tell you how THE TRUTH SEEKER is progressing. The simple fact that our secretary has sent you a list of over fifty subscribers and the money for the same yesterday will speak for itself. I tell you, Friend Macdonald, a club of that size is not got without some work. The highway of Freethought, like Jordan, is a hard road to travel. It is not strewn with flowers, as many suppose. The secretary and myself in tramping over the country soliciting TRUTH SEEKER subscribers, and members to our society and library, meet with many a rebuff and insult, but when we contemplate and realize how much our labors lessen the sum of human misery and increase the sum of human happiness in this world, we feel as though we were amply remunerated.

And right here let me say that the greatest obstacle we meet with in working for your paper is the opposition of the women. We meet every day with good, whole-souled, Liberal men, who would be glad to take the paper if it were not for the opposition of their wives; they are so afraid it will ruin and demoralize their children. They are given free license to rummage among the filth and nastiness of the Bible, but when the TRUTH SEEKER agent appears in the family and makes his business known, the loving wife throws her arms around her husband's neck and kisses him, and, with tears streaming down her face, says: "For heaven's sake, husband, please don't bring that paper in the house and blight our lives and wreck our future happiness by bringing our boys to the gallows and our girls to a life of shame! Please don't! I beseech you by all the love you bear me and our dear children, please don't let them see those naughty pictures. That is a dear, good man!" And of course that settles it, for no man could resist such an appeal as that; and your agent, seeing that his little game is up, and feeling that he is treading on sacred ground, quietly makes his exit and leaves this couple in the full enjoyment of their second honeymoon. Brother Remsburg hit the nail on the head when he said the priests run the women and the women run the churches. The mainstay and bulwark of the churches to-day are the women, and to overcome and remove this great obstacle in the way of Liberalism and human progression we must depend in a great measure on the help of women, as women authors and women lecturers can, and do, for obvious reasons, effect much more in this direction than the men possibly can. Hence I wish to urge upon Liberals everywhere the importance of keeping our lady lecturers employed. The brave band of women who, at home or in the field, are, with their self-sacrificing spirit, devoting the best years of their lives to this cause are deserving of and should receive every possible encouragement.

The books written for children by those noble women, Mrs. Slenker and Miss Wixon, are worth their weight in gold, and should find their way into every home in the land. They are worth more than all the Sunday-school books ever written, and Miss Wixon's little lessons in the children's department are worth more than all the Sunday-school lessons that ever were taught. And the names of this noble band of women, like the name of the immortal Paine, will become household words, and their portraits will adorn the homes of millions long after Bibles hav become a thing of the past and every priest of to-day will hav moldered into dust and been forgotten.

Friend Macdonald, I set out to say something about the works of our society and the obstacles we are encountering in the way of opposition from bigoted priests and editors, but I will hav to defer that until another time, as I hav already written enough to fill your waste-basket. We expect to be able to send you some more subscriptions soon.

Mr. Watts will be with us on the 5th and 6th of April, and we expect Mrs. Reynolds and Mr. Washburn soon. C. Fannie Allyn spoke to us March 27th on "The Past, Present, and Future of Woman." Miss Allyn is truly a wonderful little woman, and her heart is in the right place. In a letter from her she said that in her twenty years' work she had never allowed a matter of dollars and cents to stand in the way of doing good. That is the right spirit.

Yours truly, B. F. CONAWAY.

BRADFORD, PA., April 3, 1887.

MY DEAR FRIEND BROOKS: I hav read and reread your reasons for believing in Spiritualism. In regard to its philosophy and theory it is all very well, and, considering our education, very natural.

We all wish to liv again and perpetuate our identity; we all dread to think that after death we will be lost in nature. But likes and dislikes prove nothing, and our imagination throws no light upon the question. What we want is facts.

I find no satisfaction in the orthodox scheme of salvation and a future life. Better hav no heaven than to hav a hell. If death ends in one long eternal sleep, it is a thousand times better than eternal pain. The fact that thousands of good men and women hav believed in it is in no way satisfactory to me. Such has been the case with all the religions and isms the world has ever known.

I do not wish to circumscribe any science or phenomena known to the world, but when I look around me and see that everything in the universe dies, I hav a right to suppose and believe that it is a final death. One life and one identity is the law of our nature.

You must draw hard upon your imagination if you think that after death you will liv in ghost form, and float around through space, or sit with folded hands in heaven. I am too much of an evolutionist for that.

We agree that all that is is natural; then the only question for us to settle is, Can a person liv after he is dead?

Time and space being valuable in this communication, I will omit hearsay evidence, frauds, exposures, and my own personal experience. From the tenor of your letter I judge you rely upon materialization to support your faith, as you refer to one, "Miss Fairchild, of Boston, producing from fifty to one hundred spirit forms in the presence of a score of disinterested spectators."

Now, Mr. Brooks, if that is a fact, it can be done again and the question or truth of Spiritualism settled forever.

We hav in the United States, besides Miss Fairchild, one thousand materializing mediums, one thousand clairvoyants, one thousand clairaudiants, hundreds of slate-writers, and Indian controls to numerous to mention.

I do not question your right, or ability, to know more about spirits than I do, but I do wish to hav some such spirit knowledge imparted to me, and verified in a scientific way.

I believe the world has been wofully humbuged in regard to orthodox religion, and that the whole story of supposed revelation is a big fraud upon the human race.

I will be frank with you and tell you that I think that Spiritualism is an outgrowth of religion and creeds, and both are born of ignorance and superstition.

The time will soon come when the orthodox God, devil, hell, gospel-craft and spookcraft of every description will hav to take their place with the superstitions of the world.

For the benefit of yourself and humanity, I will giv one hundred dollars to any medium that will come to Bradford and materialize spirits, or produce evidence of spirit return, to the satisfaction of three scientific man—one to be selected by you, one by me, and they to select the third one.

Mediums ought to feel it their duty to accept this proposition. They are traveling all over the world asking for jobs at one and two dollars a head; now they hav a chance to earn one hundred dollars, and convert an Infidel Materialist. If they report in favor of Spiritualism, I shall consider the money well invested. If not, it will cost you nothing, and you will find out for the first time in your life that you hav been nursing a delusion.

I had the pleasure of meeting D. M. Bennett at Watkins Glen the last year of his life, and just after his journey around the world. I did not understand from him then that he was a Spiritualist, but he did assure me that "the world had been humbuged by every kind of religion."

John, we had better not stop now to discuss belief. If you find a medium that will accept my offer, perhaps Bennett, and hosts of others, will materialize, and all questions will be settled at once. Let us try and be happy while we hav an earthly existence, for very soon we will grow weary and fall to sleep in nature's arms, and help to make up the elemental wealth of the world. Don't allow your mediums to put you off, tell them as the orthodox do us, "Procrastination is the thief of time." Select your referee, and name the day you will put in an appearance, and I will be prepared to meet you. Always for truth, C. J. CURTIS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Look Forward.

Wbat though our home, our old country home,
Where we used in our childhood to play, friends,
Now that our sun near setting has come,
Long ago went the road to decay, friends?

Then from the future we borrowed our joys,
Now our thoughts to the past are returning,
Dream we of days when, fondling our toys,
Hope's fire freshly kindled was burning.

Life is too short to fill with regret,
To mourn over what cannot be mended;
Doing our best with what we hav yet,
Let our acts with more wisdom be blended.

Not all in vain our living appears,
Though we've reached not that wherefor we've striven,
Reap we the fruit of ripening years,
While our last days the best we are given.

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Virginia's Visit.

Virginia was born far inland on the shore of the Great Salt Lake, and in the shadow of the precipitous Wahsatch mountains. There she grew up within the walls of the famous Lion House, dreaming of oceans of real sea water, and oceans of real pleasure, some day when Time should make her contemplated visit to California a reality. And now since the time has come, she is here in all her physical and mental attraction, to the joy of herself and others. Everything, including the people, is strange to her, but, as might be expected, she is in love with our country, the climate, and the sea as she follows its beach to gather mosses, or sees it from her home on the mesa above the little picturesque city of Santa Barbara, with its five thousand inhabitants, "mostly fools," as some writer wrote. From her chamber window she looks out over the endless expanse of blue waters with a delight not confined to those who hav spent their childhood in its daily optical survey, and whose infant ears knew no separation from its roar. She has not yet witnessed its grandeur under the lash of a tempest, but from the elevation that adds to its fascination she looks out over the undulated liquid space and longs to spread her imaginary wings and mingle with the white gulls circling between the two skies. "Oh dear!" says my romantic friend, "I'm so impatient! Will the flying-machine man never finish his task? I want to navigate independent of gravity. Am I never to become an angel either by real or by artificial means? Next to being a real angel, I long to be a bird—one of those mysterious sea-birds using the avenues of the air in activ hours and the ocean's surface as its couch of rest."

Santa Barbara she thinks is "just lovely," with its flower gardens, vinyards, orchards, giant eucalyptus-trees, acacias, palms, lemon, orange, and the favorit shade trees; the peppers, which, with their cataracts of bright green fern-leaf foliage, and waxy, pink ornamented clusters of berries, are the delight of all strangers.

Virginia says she has now realized a few of the great desires of her life. She has seen the cowled monk in the flesh, without which she may never meet him. She has sat through the mummeries of vespers in one of the old mission churches, and enjoyed the novelty of watching the Franciscan friars in their foreign worship. She has been rocked to sleep on the broad bosom of the Pacific Ocean, and, by the way, she says, too, it wasn't as pacific as it might hav been; but she didn't care much, as another triumph was added—that of the sublime sea having touched her stomach as well as her heart. She has tricked a solitary fish from the unknown depths, which I tell her was real naughty, since the god that made all must, too, hav meant for fishes to be free in their desire for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. With me she has, too, bathed in the waters that at the other side of the "tub" lave the shores of our moon-faced and almond-eyed Asiatic sister at the antipodes.

Virginia wished she could hav given some of her Utah friends, and the circle of the Children's Corner, some of the delicious figs that were ripe in her uncle's orchard in over-abundance in their season. As she couldn't, she is gathering sea-ferns that are as fine as lace and in delicate colors for future distribution among her correspondents. Of these ferns has been written:

"Mermaids are prodigal, I ween—
Their laces on the beach are seen.
Carelessly tossed from coral door,
The tide soon sweeps them to the shore.
Economy they'd need to learn
If out on land their bread they'd earn.
Why don't they keep some "catch-all" bags,
For silks and lace and other rags?

Ralph's Reward.

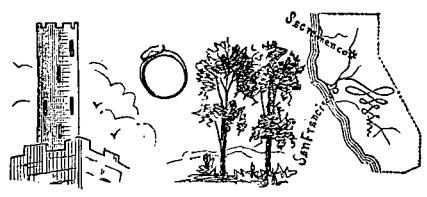
"I won't do it," cried Ralph Morton, when his mother asked him to stay at home with her, as they lived some distance from the village; and off went the naughty boy, regardless of his mother's pleading. Ralph was very disobedient, and oftimes when vexed he would treat his mother very cruelly. Ralph hurried off to join in the game of ball in the pasture. While he was playing he fell and sprained his ankle severely. He was carried home by the boys and placed in bed, where he was confined for some time. When Ralph was entirely recovered he told his mother in many words that he would obey her in the future. The mother listened to the statement, although he had made so many such promises that she could hardly believe him. But the next day, however, Ralph had an opportunity. His mother went to town and left him entirely alone. Ralph at once set to work carrying wood, water, and doing anything he could find to do which would be beneficial to his mother, nor did he stop even for an instant.



Mrs. Morton had returned, and a surprise was in store for Ralph—she had brought him a new suit of clothes, books, and toys, and, as he expressed it, a "regular Christmas-tree."

Ralph was highly pleased with his reward, and throughout his life he never forgot how well it pays to obey his parents, and that a boy's best friend is his mother.

Correspondence.

AXTELL, KAN., April 10, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a letter for the Children's Corner. Father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like the pictures and the Corner. I am nine years old. I hav a brother, Starr, four years old. I hav a sister four months old, named Daisy Belle. We hav five calves. School commenced last Monday. I read, write, spell, and study arithmetic. I like to study and learn. Cousin Charlie lived with us two years. I want to make as good a school-teacher as he is. This is all for this time.

JUDGE MERRITT MINER.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 12, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first attempt to write a letter. I've been reading in the Children's Corner. Mrs. Hansson takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. She is my music-teacher, and I often visit her. I am nearly ten years of age, and hav been going to school three months, and stopped for the winter. I hav one brother and two sisters. My mother is sick in bed to-day. My mother does not like me to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I read it anyway, and look at the pictures, which I admire very much. I am writing this at Mrs. Hansson's house. I will close for this time. I am ever your friend,

FLORENCE MAY SMITH.

LISBON, Iowa, April 11, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Since I hav seen so many girls and boys writing to the Corner, I thought I would write too. I am going to school now, read in the Fourth Reader, and study grammar, arithmetic, spelling, physiology, and geography. My teacher's name is Mattie Alexander. I like her very well. We are the only Freethinkers in the county. My sister's and our school commenced two weeks ago. I read the Corner every week, and like it very well. My brother wrote not long ago, and I think it is my turn now. I will be ten on the fourth of December. It will be summer soon. It is quite warm now. I guess my letter is too long, so I will close for this time. I would like to be with you, and we could talk better.

From your Freethinker friend,

M. E. SAILOR.

CROMWELL, IA., April 12, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav written once to the Children's Corner, and seeing it in print I concluded I would write again. I hav just finished reading "Apples of Gold" and "Story Hour," and like them very much. I think little Susie must hav been handsome from the looks of her picture, and I would like to hav seen her. I hav a little sister three years old whom we call Edna, and my brother is sixteen in May—his name is George. We liv on a farm one mile from town. There are two churches here, the Methodist and Congregational. I do not go to church. I hav not been there for almost a year, but I do go to school.

Our school celebrated Washington's birthday in the Methodist church on the twenty-second. I had a declamation, subject, "To the Priests, Greeting." The church-members thought their church would be haunted for a year.

The next day of school one of the girls asked me if I wasn't ashamed to speak such a piece in the church, and I told her, "No, not a bit." You hav a good many correspondents so I will close my letter.

From your little Freethinker friend,

MINNIE M. GEIER.

SOUTH BOSQUE, TEXAS, April 7, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Again I attempt to enter the grand old Corner, with much fear of that basket. I am still trying to convert my orthodox friends to Liberalism. I can't do much except scatter Liberal papers, but that I do with the greatest of pleasure. And I hav had the pleasure of seeing a good many picked up and put in pockets with great care. Freethought is spreading rapidly in this country. The orthodox hav made almost an entire failure with their Holy Ghost books. One year here generally does for the ministers. They leave without the love of Christ over their flock.

Father keeps "Modern Balaam" tacked on the wall for his orthodox friends to look at. I hav had some tell me if they were in my place they would tear it down and burn it. I told them I liked to look at it too well to destroy it. They just frown on me and drop the subject. We all like the pictures, and say, "Hurrah for Watson Heston!" The orthodox say, "Wait until the day of judgment comes, and then see the Infidels on their knees sending up thousands of prayers!" "But," they say, "it will be too late for them. They will be forever lost." I suppose they will need all the room they can get, and let the Infidels take care of themselvs.

I like the story written by J. R. Perry—"My Neighbor's Dog." It is a true story. I hav known a few just such cases as that of old Carlo—old fathers and mothers driven from their homes by their own sons and daughters to beg or starve, while their children made use of their hard earnings.

Mr. J. D. Shaw, of Waco, is traveling and lecturing; I hope he will convert a good many to Liberalism. Everybody likes him and thinks him a good man, except a few orthodox people, that fight hard against Infidelity, but they are not so scary of Freethinkers as they used to be. They seem to be more willing to giv them their rights.

With much love to the Corner, I will close, hoping, if this is thought worth its room, to see it in print. I remain

Your young friend,

SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE BIBLE.
SPIRITUALISM SUSTAINED BY THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.
SPIRITUALISM A NECESSITY IN GOD'S GENERAL GOVERNMENT.
SPIRITUAL MEDIUMSHIP.
OBJECTIONS TO SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED.

Like all THE TRUTH SEEKER'S publications, the mechanical execution of the work is all that could be desired. Good paper, clear type—in short, a neat little volume.

The primary object of the work, as its title indicates, is to sustain Spiritualism, but the absurdities of the Christian religion, and the abominations of the old Jew book, get a terrible shaking up. The book contains much to interest every intelligent reader. . . . Colonel Kelso has done much acceptable work in the cause of Freethought and Liberalism all over the land. Send for his new book—read it—put it into the hands of every Christian; it will teach him that the way of the fool is foolishness. Every Liberal who reads it will certainly find his "Spiritual" strength renewed.—JOHN PECK.

Parson Pomeroy's Preachin'.

HE MARRIED HER TO SEVEN MEN!

From Pomeroy's Democrat.

Beloved Bible-Bangers: The rain falleth upon the just as well as upon the unjust, if they do not know enough to go in when it rains. Then they take cold, sneeze, gape, hav too much stuffing in the head and too much fever and agony in the bones and such, as a reward for not stepping off the track when the train wants to go by. And how many of you know even the one-thousand-nine-hundred-and-sixteenth part of what the Big Book called the Bible contains?

Did you ever read of Raguel and his daughter Sara, and get onto the great, big, double-breasted lesson the story teaches? The choir being off on a strike to-day, in order to giv moral support to the sausage-case makers, you will please pass on the singing. Deacon Popover will turn the singing-book down and your parson will make it and go it alone on the following text, copied verbatim from the VII. chapter and eleventh verse of Tobit, videlicet:

11. I hav given my daughter in marriage to seven men, who died that night they came in unto her; nevertheless, for the present be merry.

There were great lights in those days, as wrote one whose history of things was too good to lose and not good enough to bind, so they sandwiched it in as the Apocrypha.

Tobias had some trouble, and went away to find a wife. Here is where Tobias differed from some others who hav trouble and who go away to find some other man's wife, and split kindling-wood, kindle a fire, crack hickory-nuts, and sorter hang around the neighborhood till they get into more trouble. Beware! brethren and sisters, beware of the man who unties himself from home too easily and of those who hold candles over their heads and peer out into the darkness too frequently.

Tobias journeyed till he came to the river Tigris. Then he took a bath. Dearly beloved, so long as there is no real scarcity of water, bathe. So long as water runs toward your door, and the clouds giv of rain in seasonable abundance, emulate the example of Tobias and take a bath. Open the pores so the devil in your system can get out, take a walk, and forget to come back. Your parson often bathes, sleeps the better, and works the easier for it. Selah!

Then Tobias journeyed on to Ectabana and brought up at the house of Raguel, who had a daughter named Sara.

O Sara, Sara!
And the bells they go ringing for Sara.

Raguel was a man of renown. His Sara was a girl of attractions. We all know, dear brethren, that girls who are attractiv are objects of attention. Your parson does not mean those girls who chew cheap gum and read novels while mother is darning their socks. Those girls who are brought up to ride a gate and hold out their lips for tobacco juice. Those girls who hav holes in the heels of their stockings, and whose hair smells sour for want of savon and aqua pura, or, in homespun dialect, plain soap and water. Or those girls who are so fly as to be flip, and so flip as to escape the flies. Or those girls who prefer holes to mends and going a-visiting at meal times rather than getting something at home.

Sara was an attractiv girl. Seven men, from the butcher and the baker, the sinner and the Quaker, the snoozer and the waker, and likewise an undertaker, were called in, having been smitten, and then sent for a priest or other marital functionary.

Seven times had Raguel given his daughter in marriage, and seven times the morning following had he carried out the lifeless remains of the husbands of a night.

Imagin the feelings of that fond father! Imagin the patience of Sara! Imagin, if you will, the piles of wedding dresses and wedding cake slaughtered on these seven several occasions! One man went in as a husband and was knocked out. Another picked up a slate-pencil and proposed to try the multiplication table, as it were, and multiplied himself to the greater population on the other side. The third, fourth, fifth, and sixth man came up smiling and went out on a board. Still Sara was on deck, like Hannah at the window, binding shoes, for years after her lover was lost at sea.

Raguel may hav fretted, and worried, queried as he buried, but he never whimpered. He kept the hinges of the front gate greased so the swing of the thing would not alarm the dog, and welcomed all who came. The tracks all led one way, but Raguel could not help it. He bought a private graveyard of his own and kept on filling it. There were no such daily papers as we hav now or the life of Josephus in nineteen volumes and an appendix would hav been a minor catechism compared to what they would hav dished up as salacious news for a farinaceous people.

The seventh man came. Like the man who walks right up to where the man who died of delirium tremens received his last stab, he jogged on, thinking to beat the game. Arrayed in the best store clothes, he too was married. The next morning Raguel kindly carried him out and left him on deposit with the aged sexton. And still, Sara bloomed serenely.

Oh, what patience was there! Job! well, Job had surface indications of being a patient man, but he was a novice compared to Sara. Why, she almost had patience enough to discover America, build the Brooklyn bridge, or drive the Atlantic-Pacific Railway Tunnel. Sara knew what she had and that it would be only a question of time before all would be well. How your parson would like the photograph of Sara! And the six intrepid braves who followed the footsteps of the first! Blessed are the brave ones who die a trying, as well as the weaker ones who try a dying.

Tobias saw Sara, and probably heard of her trials. That is, if the people then were as now—fond of talking about what is none of their business, and which they cannot understand. He went out to the Raguel cemetery, scanned the graves, took off his coat, spat on his hands and was married. He was married to Sara, and Sara was married to Tobias.

That night, we suppose, Raguel went out and dug another grave, and prepared his back for the anticipated exercise of the morrow.

Now, mark you! The morrow came, as all morrows will if you will quietly lean back and giv them a chance. They will come if you don't lean back, so you need not worry because they are not here now. Raguel came in from digging grave No. 8. He was one of those men who know that what happened yesterday would happen to-day! There are plenty of such men in the world—descendants of Raguel, as there are descendants of Ananias and Saphira combine.

Raguel was one of these men who bets on his own family, but alas! he went too often this time. He told Mrs. Edna Raguel to send a maid to open the door so he could go in and bring out the corpse, and bring it so no one would know it.

"So the maid opened the door, and went in and found them both asleep.

"And came forth, and told them that he was alive!"

And they feasted fourteen days. That was two days each for the seven men who tried to and failed. Yes, they feasted. And Sara had a husband and Tobias had a wife, and when she departed thence with her husband, Raguel, her father, said unto her:

"Honor thy father and thy mother-in-law."

Here we hav the divine command to honor the mother-in-law. And yet, you who are silly in your idiocy, and who indulge in cheap, corn-cob wit, and who hav no overplus of manhood, are continually berating your mother-in-law when, next to your wife, she is the best one in the family, omitting the children.

Giv your mother-in-law a rest. Turn in, all of you, and abuse your parson, but let your mother-in-law alone. She feels worse about it than you do.

Again, and lastly.

See what comes as a reward for patience. Sara was a good stayer. Incidental disappointments did not put ruffling into her breast. She felt that she would get there in time. She knew all along, by a big majority, that the right man had not yet come. And Tobias knew it. He could see and feel with all the feel that he felt, that because seven men had failed, there was no proof that the eighth would not get there. Do not fret. Do not worry. Do not go fishing simply because seven other men hav failed in one undertaking. And don't you, dear brethren and sisters, don't fall into the habit of digging a grave for your parson, or any other patient, persistent, pertinacious, pegging-away pilgrim till his candle is snuffed out so the curious can't see him dressing for the next world. The man who is born to marry Sara; to accomplish; to get there and get away again in good shape, has been known to get there quite numerously.

Tobias lived to be one hundred and twenty-seven years old, which was longer than lived some of those who counted on his occupying a grave before his time.

Don't forget Tobias!

The choir will please open their mouths so as to not mumble, and sing with a loud voice, the 5th verse of the 112th Psalm;

A good man doth his favors show, and doth to others lend,
He with discretion his affairs will guide unto the end.

Now let us go home, and as we think of Mr. and Mrs. Raguel, and their daughter Sara,

Don't forget Tobias.

Resolutions.

Myrtle Assembly, 4,808, Knights of Labor, unanimously adopted the following resolutions of condolence and sympathy:

SEATTLE, W. T., April 9, 1887.

Resolved, That it is a just tribute to the memory of our deceased brother, Daniel M. Crane, a member of Queen City Assembly, No. 3,413, of the Knights of Labor, and also one of the organizers of the Liberal League of Seattle, and its president for over four years, to say that in regretting his removal from our midst we mourn for one who was in every respect worthy of our esteem and affection.

Resolved, That we sincerely condole with the family of our deceased brother, who, through the unchangeable laws of nature, has been removed from our midst and gone to rest, believing that whatever nature has provided for our future he will share with the brightest and best.

Resolved, That copies of this heartfelt testimonial of our sympathy and sorrow be transmitted to the Daily Voice of the People and the New York TRUTH SEEKER, of which he was for many years a subscriber, and also to the bereaved wife and daughters of our deceased brother.

The Gods. Paper, 50 cts; cloth, $1. In five lectures, comprising, "The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," and "Heretics and Heresies."

The Ghosts. Paper, 50 cts; cloth, 1.25. Contents: "The Ghosts," "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," "The Declaration of Independence," "About Farming in Illinois," "The Grant Banquet," "The Rev. Alexander Clark," "The Past Rises before Me Like a Dream," and "A Tribute to Ebon C. Ingersoll."

Some Mistakes of Moses. Paper, 50cts; cloth, $1.25.

Interviews on Talmage. Paper, 50cts; plain cloth, $1.25.

What Must We Do to Be Saved? Paper, 25 cents.

The Christian Religion. By R. G. Ingersoll, Judge Jeremiah S. Black, and Prof. George F. Fisher. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

Orthodoxy. 56 pages, 12mo, paper, 10 cents. $1.00 per doz. post paid. Printed in large, clear type, and containing as much as could be delivered in two ordinary lectures. This makes a grand missionary document. Liberals should scatter it generously.

Ingersoll Catechised: His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the editor of the San Franciscan. 5 cents; 50 cents per dozen; 25 copies, $1; 100 copies, $3. Millions of these should be circulated.

Vindication of Thomas Paine from the attacks of the New York Observer, by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price, 15 cents.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill. Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

The Busts of Voltaire, Paine, and Ingersoll. Cabinet size; true to life, price, $1.50 each. Every admirer of these apostles of Religious Liberty should hav them.

Photographs of Colonel Ingersoll. panel, 10½x17, $3; boudoir, $1; cabinet, 40 cents.

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

News of the Week.

DR. MCGLYNN and his sympathizers hav organized an "Anti-Poverty Society."

THERE were destructiv tornadoes in the West last week. In Kansas and Missouri many lives were lost and much property destroyed.

MORE than $11,000 has been subscribed for the Beecher monument.

THE Women's Suffrage convention was held in this city last week.

THE trial of Jacob Sharp, who furnished the boodle for our boodle aldermen, is set down for May 11th.

VICTOR HUGO'S will has been admitted to probate in London. He owned $460,000 worth of property in England.

ANDREW CARNEGIE, millionaire and Socialist, was married to Miss Whitfield, of this city, last week. They hav gone to Europe.

LIEUTENANT DANENHOWER, who commanded the disastrous Jeannette Arctic expedition, committed suicide at Annapolis, Md., on the 20th.

BEECHER'S church has no settled pastor, and various aspiring preachers are practicing in its pulpit. Last Sunday the Rev. Mr. Smith, a young Methodist from St. Paul, Minn., spread himself before a small congregation.

THE Pinkerton special policeman who during the coalhandlers' strike shot and killed young Hogan, is indicted for manslaughter.

ALL the silversmiths of New York who belong to the Knights of Labor are locked out by their employers, who will not take them back until they leave the order.

THE London Times has published a letter purporting to hav been written by Parnell condoning the murder of Burke and Cavendish in Phœnix Park. Parnell declares the letter a forgery.

THE editor of the Omaha Bee was recently hit in the face and knocked down by the editor of the Republican, of the same place, who hit him with a billy. The assailant is under $6,000 bail. The trouble grew out of matter which appeared in the Bee.

THE bill for the total prohibition of the liquor traffic in New Foundland was defeated in the assembly of that colony. The vote was so close that the speaker cast the decisiv ballot. The advocates of the bill are confident that it will be carried at the next session.

THE Vatican, in answer to inquiries as to whether the pope was in favor of having a reconciliation with Italy on the basis of renunciation of the papal claims to temporal power of the pope, says that the pope desires peace with Italy, but has never thought of abandoning the rights of church or papacy.

GOVERNOR HILL of New York sent a message to the Senate at Albany one day last week. It was a rebuke of the way the Senate had acted in neglecting to confirm his appointments, and the clerk of the Senate, being a Republican, refused to receive it. The message was thereupon read by Lieut.-Gov. Jones, but the senators kept up such a howling that none of it could be heard. The scene is characterized as the most disgraceful ever enacted in the New York legislature.

THE excise law was enforced in this city last Sunday, and some of the saloons were actually closed. Delmonico's and the big hotels were raided, and none but guests could procure liquor. Across the Hudson in New Jersey, which has the same Sunday law as New York, the saloons were wide open, and many citizens of New York went over there and came back roaring drunk. Shopkeepers were arrested if they offered anything to sell. It is the general belief that Mayor Hewitt's object in enforcing the Sunday law is to make its objectionable features more apparent, and thus raise a demand for more reasonable legislation.

Odds and Ends.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX says that she loves the bustle in a large city. It does look rather ridiculous in the country, that's a fact.

A MAN worth ten million dollars is no happier, really, than a man worth nine million dollars. Money doesn't always cause happiness.

"IT'S all very well," said the grave-digger, "to advise a young man to begin at the bottom and work up, but in my business it ain't practicable."

DR. FULTON'S crusade against the Roman Catholic church is succeeding beautifully. At least ten Roman Catholics hav died in Brooklyn since the doctor began his work.

HE (at dinner): "May I assist you to the cheese, Miss Vassar?" Miss Vassar (just graduated): "Thanks, no! I am very comfortable where I am! But you may assist the cheese to me, if you will."

MINISTER (to layman): "But why do you say that Mr. Smith is a good man? He rarely appears at church." Layman: "I know he doesn't show up at church very often, but Bradstreets quotes him A 1."

CLERK (in New Jersey dry goods store): "Can I do anything else for you, madam?" New Jersey lady: "H'm. I believe there was something more I wanted. Oh, yes; I will look at your musketo muzzles, please."

IN China the highest recommendation a man can hav is the fact of his having a wife; but in this country a man with a wife can't get trusted for a suit of clothes, unless he can convince his tailor that she trims her own bonnets.

A FRIEND was condoling with a man who was very ill, and the sick man said: "Yes, I feel it very much to hav to leave my poor wife and children." "Never mind us," said the wife; "you just get on with your dying; we'll get on very well."

SCHOOL-TEACHER: "Johnny, what is the second letter of the alphabet?" Johnny: "Don't know." School-teacher: "What flies about the garden?" Johnny: "When?" School-teacher: "In the summer." Johnny: "Oh, I know—mother after the hens."

A DIVISION OF LABOR.

He: Where are you going, my pretty maid?
She: I'm going a-milking, sir (she said).
He: Can I not help you, my pretty maid?
She: You can work the pump-handle, sir (she said).

WHILE a detachment of the Salvation Army was singing a temperance hymn, the other day, in front of a gin-mill, the genial proprietor kindly turned the hose on them. Not to be defeated by ducking on a cold day, the little band quietly passed around a flask of brandy, finished their aria, and marched away happy.

A TEACHER in a Sunday-school, wishing to impress his class with the necessity of faith, asked the class why did Moses lift up the serpent in the wilderness? None of the class knew except one. He said Moses lifted it up because he knew it wouldn't bite. It was the same youth who said the Jews made a golden calf because they didn't hav gold enough to make the whole cow.

OMAHA man: "I regret to cut short your vacation trip, Mr. Comstock, but you are badly needed in Washington just now." Anthony Comstock: "If that's so, I'll start at once. What's going on there?" "Moncure D. Conway is to deliver a lecture there on 'English Life and Society.'"

"How silly you look in this picture!" said a Brooklyn belle, on viewing a photograph presented by a gentleman who intended to absorb her name. "Do I, Sarah?" he replied. "I tried to smile and look sweet when it was taken." "Smile! If that's the way you look when you 'smile,' I should certainly join the Prohibitionists if I were you."

WINTER lingered last week in the lap of spring; and

The bluebird sat in the apple-tree,
And the redbreast sat in the grove;
They shivered these notes from their little throats:
"Oh, bring us a red-hot stove!"

THERE is a measure before the legislature to exempt religious institutions from the water-tax. We are glad to know that our legislators appreciate what we all owe to religion, but we think the bill should be amended so as to exclude the Baptists from its workings. There is no reason why the state should show undue favoritism to any one sect.

"I SAY, George," said a St. Paul drummer to a Minneapolis brother, as they came together in a Dakota hotel, "hav you heard of the big row they are having in your town just now?" "Row! No. What's the difficulty?" "They hav taken all the Bibles out of the schools there." "The Bibles out of the schools? What for, pray?" "Why, because it mentions St. Paul many times, but Minneapolis not once."

AN EVER-PRESENT HELP.

"An Infidel doesn't believe in an oath sworn on the Bible, does he?" asked Mrs. Pentweazel.

"No," snapped out old Pentweazel, without looking up from his paper.

"Well," persisted his better half, "if that's the case, what does a man like Ingersoll say when he is obliged to take an oath?"

"S'help me Bob, I suppose," chuckled the old man.

"SAY! say!" called a Montcalm street woman to a tramp who had just left her door with a piece of bread in his hand, "don't eat that! The girl says it is a piece we had lying around with 'rough on rats' on it!" "It's too late, madam," he replied, as he swallowed the last morsel; "I've had people try to play that trick on me before, to get their goods back, but it always fails. I prefer the stuff to butter, but don't say so, because I hate to put people to trouble."

Gems of Thought.

JUSTICE is a very dear article, and then one is very likely to be imposed upon in the quality.—D. M. Bennett.

THE Christians say that amongst the ancient Jews, if you committed a crime you had to kill a sheep; now they say, "Charge it; put it on the slate." It will not do. For every crime you commit you must answer to yourself and to the one you injure. And if you hav ever clothed another with woe, as with a garment of pain, you will never be quite as happy as though you had not done that thing. No forgivness by the gods. Eternal, inexorable, everlasting justice, so far as nature is concerned. You must reap the result of your acts. Even when forgiven by the one you hav injured, it is not as though the injury had not been done. That is what I believe in. And if it goes hard with me I will stand it, and I will cling to my logic, and I will bear it like a man.—R. G. Ingersoll.

[NOTE.—It was said by them of old that Homer sometimes "took a nap," and Ingersoll's favorit poet—the Scottish Burns—occasionally became "slip-slop" in his divinity. In the following lines he has committed himself to sentiments that neither John Calvin, nor John S. Mill, nor his father, James Mill, nor their illustrious disciple, Dr. Alexander Bain, of Aberdeen: nor our own M. J. Savage, nor Chadwick, nor R. G. Ingersoll would, I fancy, care to adopt or indorse. Let the judicious reader pause and ponder. If he has been trained to orthodoxy, as I was, he will perhaps find his intellect pulling him one way, and his heart, so to speak, pulling him another, and he must decide and choose between them. The controversy, when once started, must be settled or there can be no real peace:

When human weakness has come short,
Or frailty stepped aside,
Do thou, all good! for such thou art
In shades of darkness hide.

When with intention I hav erred,
No other plea I hav,
But thou art good; and goodness still
Delighteth to forgiv.

To short-sighted men and to silly women, Burns's idea of God seems, at first sight, very attractiv, but there can be little doubt that Longfellow has struck the right key when he says or sings:

Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small;
Though with patience he stands waiting, with exactness grinds he all.—Hylax.]

LORD BOLINGBROKE did not go so far as to say that no revelation from deity was possible, but he did go so far as to say that no revelation could be proved to be actual. . . . His belief was in natural law, and the root of his system was that the will of the deity expressed itself in the laws of the universe: and that a faithful worship of the deity consisted, not in rites or prayers, or priestly observances, but in a faithful observance of the laws of the universe so far as they were understood. Practically, the sentiment is expressed in the famous lines of Pope, more frequently quoted than understood:

For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.

To say that a true worship is a life and not a creed, that the conflict over forms and modes is useless, vain, and contemptible, and that the test of a noble observation of the divine laws is a faithful character, strikes at the root of all religious institutions and beliefs; to say this is to call off the attention that has heretofore been given to matters that concern only the supersensual world. . . . The spread of a principle like this would work nothing less than a complete revolution in all religious thought, feeling, and observation.—Frothingham's Life as a Test of Creed.

THE Agnostic looks squarely at the facts of human life, however grim they may be. He throws no metaphysical dust into his eyes, in order not to see what is unpleasant to see. He keeps eyes wide open that he may see the bottom facts—no mistake. There must be some steel in his nerve or a streak of the stoic in his mental make-up. Nor does he juggle with language. He calls sin "sin," and evil "evil," not "undeveloped good," nor the "shady side of good:" but evil, ugly, and hateful. He indulges in no optimistic nonsense, such as "whatever is is right." Yes, he adds, except what is wrong. He doesn't waste time in speculating about the "origin of evil," or in "apologizing for God;" but recognizing the existing evil as a sad, stern fact, he goes to work manfully to get rid of it and to make the world better and happier.—W. H. Spencer.

THE SITUATION IN GERMANY.

Notes and Clippings.

THE new Interstate Commerce law has caused a suspension of work in some of the New England granit quarries.

THE pope demands of General Boulanger, of France, that young men studying for the priesthood shall be exempt from military duty.

OUR tax commissioners are now being investigated. It appears that millions of dollars' worth of property has escaped assessment. We hav a reform mayor.

THE Rev. Mr. Downs, the Boston preacher who achieved great notoriety in the usual way, now preaches in Paine Hall. The influence of the place is expected to hav a salutary effect upon him.

IT is now generally believed that the letter published by the London Times, purporting to hav been written by Parnell, and countenancing the Phœnix Park murders, is a baseless though skilful forgery.

DR. MCGLYNN in his lecture last Sunday evening said that the Catholic church would not be what it ought to be until we should see a democratic pope walking down Broadway in a frock coat, a plug hat, and carrying an umbrella under his arm.

THE German singing societies of New York meet evenings for rehearsals, usually in halls over beer saloons. Under the present law they cannot use a piano. Last Sunday the representativs of seventy-six of these societies met and resolved that they would make a test case, and that the politicians who did not stand by them would hear from them at the ballot-box. Mr. Beekman, president of the board of aldermen, has published a card in which he condemns the law as it stands.

DIVINE worship is a somewhat costly affair in Great Britain, says the World. The one hour's service in Westminster Abbey on the 21st of June, when the great personages of the realm are to assemble for the purpose of prayer, is to cost the moderate sum of $100,000. Commoners and ordinary people will not be admitted within the portals of the sacred edifice, yet it is their pockets which will be taxed for the purpose of enabling the princes and lords to pray in due state for the preservation of the queen.

A NUMBER of Washington, D. C., druggists and merchants hav been fined $20 each for keeping their stores open on Sunday. John I. Hall, a grocer, based his defense on the ground that the law forbids the opening of places of business on "the Sabbath," or the seventh day of the week, not on "Sunday," which is the first day. Judge Snell, however, on the authority of Webster's Dictionary, held the words "Sabbath" and "Sunday" to be synonymous. The matter will probably be carried to the higher courts.

GOVERNOR MARMADUKE has signed the bill recently passed by the Missouri legislature making Sunday virtually a Puritanical Sabbath. A powerful protest was presented to the governor respectfully requesting him not to sign the obnoxious bill, but it seems he yielded, says the Jewish Times, to the wishes of a few Prohibition fanatics and hypocrits, backed by scheming politicians. It is claimed, and justly, that this Sunday law is a blow at the liberty of the masses, and in the interests of sectarianism. It is not long since that the St. Louis daily journals were glorying in the fact that the people passed their free Sunday in the most rational and enjoyable manner and that the police annals on Monday mornings showed a great falling off in the number of cases brought before the various courts.

OVER in a Brooklyn synagog the other day the rabbi went for the brethren because they wouldn't shut up shop on Saturday and attend services. A reporter of the Evening Sun sat in a pew with a big Fulton-street dry-goods merchant, and the sermon seemed to hit the mercantile gentleman rather lightly to begin with. "You are living for gold, not your souls," cried the rabbi. "You are a reproach to the Christians, who can giv a day to their faith." "Now he is giving us rats," whispered the merchant gleefully. The rabbi went on: "You leave the women to fill the pews; you value an hour more than your hereafter; you are deserting the faith of your fathers for money-making; you—" "I kontradicts dot," said the purveyor of dry goods excitedly. "Der relitchion vos running down all the vile, shust like der pisness." The frowning eye of the rabbi caught the whisper, and the whisperer became dumb; but he didn't retract his sentiments.

IT used to be possible for a citizen of New York to take his wife or girl and go out of a summer evening and sit in so-called concert gardens and listen to music, both vocal and instrumental, and refresh himself with a glass of beer or not, as he chose. There were scores of these gardens in the city frequented by reputable people, the morals of the male visitors being protected by a regulation excluding "ladies unaccompanied by gentlemen." The profits on the sale of the beer enabled the proprietor to furnish the music free, and it was noticed that a very little beer lasted the patron while he listened to a good deal of music. At the same time there were many disreputable resorts, where liquors were sold and vile songs were sung. To suppress the latter sort proprietors of concert gardens were compelled to take out a theatrical license, and a law already in existence forbade the sale of malt or spirituous liquors in the auditorium of any place where theatrical exhibitions were given. These regulations hav had an effect exactly the reverse of salutary. They did not stop the sale of liquor in the gardens, but they abolished the music; and whereas previously the music furnished the principal part of the entertainment, at present the customer must depend for his diversion entirely upon drinks. If the framers of the legislation had this object in view, then, of course, the law has had the effect intended, and the legislators ought to be satisfied. If, on the contrary, they hoped to lessen the sale of beer and the prevalence of vice they hav certainly gone very wide of adopting the proper measures for that end. The reputable gardens hav been closed according to law, while some of the disreputable ones are still open in violation of it, and the latter now draw the patronage of the former. It seems that people are determined to hav beer, and there are many who do not regard as harmful a moderate indulgence in that beverage. Whether they are correct or not does not affect the truth of the affirmation that the present mixing of license and theatrical laws is doing more harm than good, and the more strictly the laws are enforced the more apparent is the evil. The sumptuary legislators will hav to try again.

THE REV. DR. JONES'S REPORT CONTINUED.—COLONEL BILLINGS'S "CRIMES OF PREACHERS."

And here is as good a place as any other to say that a good-sized pamphlet is periodically published by a man in Iowa, entitled, "Crimes of Preachers," which I saw for the first time in the hands of a young man, a son of one of our most respectable ruling elders, containing a list of some hundreds of preachers who, during the last five or six years, hav committed crimes punishable with imprisonment in the penitentiary. To my astonishment and mortification, I found in glancing at its pages that a large proportion of the offenses were sexual transgressions committed against women. I ran my eye hurriedly over the names and dates to see if the cases of three ministers whom I knew to be arraigned before the criminal courts for crim. con. were recorded, but was glad to find that the lynx-eyed compiler had missed them. The purport of this book was to show as a matter of fact in statistics that in proportion to their numbers there is no class of men in society who, with all the motivs drawn from heaven, earth, and hell, to make them walk uprightly, were so weak and criminal, especially in the matter of chastity, as the clergy. There is a profound philosophy in this fact which ought to be the subject of study, and of lecture, too, in all theological seminaries. As the Spartan mothers in ancient times, who wished to make self-governing men of their boys, showed them the drunken Helots wallowing in their degradation, and warned them to abstain from the immoderate use of wine; so this book of Billings's ought to be found, not only in every minister's study, but in the private and public reading-rooms of all our theological seminaries, as a warning to students to avoid the pitfalls into which other good men hav fallen. If the Lord, as a potter, has made his ministering servants out of extra-fine clay, the material, judging from Billings's book, seems to be very frail. The nature and strength of the sexual instinct, the temptations to its indulgence, and how to control it, are tabooed subjects, considered too delicate to be alluded to, except by innuendo. But a matter of such importance should not be ignored, and theological students who are soon to leave the monastic halls where they hav been secluded from the world, and go out into mixed society, should be warned of the dangers awaiting them, for, being forewarned, they are forearmed.

The Methodists, of course, are prominent in the list of clerical transgressors in Billings's book, but pretty much all the rest of the sects are abundantly represented in the black catalog of names. I say the Methodists of course, because next to the Catholic priests—holy "fathers" without wives—they hav the best opportunities, and therefore are exposed to more temptation to go astray.

SOME SAGE REFLECTIONS AND ADVICE.

Considering the weakness of human nature on this point of sexual morals, no pastor of a church ought ever to visit a family of his congregation alone. He should keep fresh in his memory the story of Ulysses, who, on his voyage back from Troy, when he approached the island which was the dwelling-place of the Sirens, crammed beeswax into the ears of his companions, lest they should hear the enchanting music of these women's voices, and leave the ship. In the Presbyterian system, where every congregation is provided with a bench of ruling elders, the theory is that, as they hav the oversight of the flock jointly with the pastor, one or more of them shall always accompany him in his pastoral visitations. We must take human nature as we find it, and in that nature the love instinct is so deeply rooted that we cannot trust either men or women who, in their association with each other, pass the bounds of prudence.

I learned a lesson on this subject from a Shaker, during a visit I once made to the famous establishment at New Lebanon, now presided over by the venerable Frederic Evans. I noticed that the men and women in meeting each other did not shake hands, nor talk much, but respectfully passed on; and in the simplicity of my ignorance I inquired of an intelligent brother the reason why. He replied that celibacy was the most important feature in their system, since Christ, their model man, was a celibate; and that to maintain it every path that diverged from it was doubly guarded. If the brothers shook hands with the sisters, and chatted with them familiarly, each would come within the magnetic aura which encompassed the other; and the next step in the program would be to kiss. This, if frequently repeated, would awaken in them the mutual sentiment of love, the very passion in their bosoms which it was the grand business of the community to crush out of existence. Hence no handshaking, no chatting, and no kissing in Shakerdom, since there is more than enough of that kind of thing practiced among the world's people.

Had Beecher been attended by a deacon of his church when he visited the Tilton mansion at Brooklyn, in his care for souls, his reputation would not hav been sullied as it is, and the cause of religion scandalized. When opportunity offers itself, and the temptation of a woman's eye and voice is strong, the thunders of the judgment day, as they roll around the throne of God, are too far off to reach the ears of the tempted parties; and therefore society is much more leavened up with sexual vice, especially in cities and towns, than people in the rural districts hav any idea of. The case generally is this: A merchant's place of business is far away from his home. He takes his breakfast under his own roof, and then goes down to his counting-house, where he remains till it is time to dine with his club. After that he goes to the theater, or spends the evening with his club companions, drinking wine and smoking cigars, until the short hours of the night admonish him that it is time to go home. When he arrives there, the whole family are in bed; and from Monday morning till Saturday night he sees his wife only at breakfast, and his children, if at all, only when they are asleep; for on Sunday, if he be at home, they are at Sabbath-school. Thus hundreds of wives lose the companionship of their husbands. The children during the week being at school, the long days pass in loneliness, except as they are relieved by the visits of the pastor, who, if the woman be interesting and attractiv, he is tempted to visit too often, even if he hav a wife at home. The woman sees and feels that the preacher treats her with more respect and attention than her own husband, and if he be well-looking, well-mannered, and winning in his ways, and especially if she be more lovable than his own wife, it is the most natural, as well as the most wicked, thing in the world that she should imperceptibly lose her affection for her husband, and transfer it to the preacher. Joseph, in Egypt, when his diet was leeks, onions, and Nile water, may hav resisted the seductiv charms of Potiphar's wife, but it demands a doubt whether a robust, thick-necked Methodist minister, who luxuriates on the fat of the land, is ever seen emerging from the house of a parishioner, with only one tail to his coat because the other had been torn off and left behind. The Methodist brethren, according to Billings's book, seem to take the lead in sexual vice, and I account for the fact in that they hav no officer in their church economy answering to that of the ruling elder in the Presbyterian, whose function is to attend the minister in his visitations among the families of his congregation. He goes alone, and the invisible Satan, who, perhaps, knowing that he is a mere woodcock—the most gullible of birds—has laid a trap for him beforehand, goes with him, and before the simpleton knows what he is about, the trap springs and he is caught.

It is lack of opportunity, rather than sound moral principle, which keeps most men in the path of rectitude. They are unresisting victims to their environments. It is easy for a man to be sober if he never goes where there is wine to drink, and it is easy for him to be chaste if he stays at home. Brother Staunton, who will no doubt figure as a character in the next edition of Billings's book as one of our frail divines, might hav continued to liv comfortably with his wife, instead of choking her till her eyes stood out of their sockets because she threw a cup of hot coffee in his face, if he had studied carefully, and inwardly digested, the advice Paul pressed upon Timothy about widows who were young and fascinating in their looks and manners.

There is no sense in being mealy-mouthed on this subject. The vocation of a minister of the gospel exposes him to more temptations than assail any other man in life, and then, when in such trying circumstances as generally precede a fall, up springs in his recollection, suggested by Satan, no doubt, the examples of David, Solomon, and Rahab the harlot, canonized as saints by the apostle Paul, and he is emboldened to run the risk of guilt and exposure, secretly believing that in the end at least he may get to heaven as well as they.

What Objections to Christianity?

Is it not unjust, immoral, and degrading to teach that a man may liv in wickedness; that he may harden his heart and pollute his soul, and yet at the eleventh hour receive the reward by believing something nonsensical? Has the hope of forgivness ever prevented the commission of a crime? Must a man throw away his reason and believe something unreasonable here in order to be a saint hereafter? The man that would throw away his reason is only fit to be damned.

If there was no general atonement until Christ was sacrificed, what became of the countless millions that died before his time? What has become of those who hav died since but never heard of Christ?

For eighteen centuries the Christian world has been endeavoring to explain the doctrin of the atonement, and every attempt has been ended in the admission that it cannot be understood, and the declaration that it must be believed, and continually teaching that the good works of Christ will, in the next world, be placed to our credit to balance the sins committed here.

Was Christ, the son of God, sent into the world to be sacrificed as an atonement for the sins of the world? or was he simply human—one who revolted against the religious impostures of his day, and was, as many an honest man has been, offered as a sacrifice to the Moloch of superstition?

The only evidence for believing Christ to be the son of God is the dream that Joseph is said to hav dreamt. Joseph, seeing the condition of Mary, his betrothed, and being a just man, sought to put her away privily, but an angel of the Lord appeared to him and settled the matter satisfactorily. Now, I hav no faith in my own dreams, much less hav I in a dream said to hav been dreamt almost two thousand years ago. And who tells this dream? A narrator called Matthew, according to the most orthodox authorities, fifty years after the dream was dreamt. There is no record that Christ ever said a word about the matter. There is no evidence that Joseph ever told anyone to record the dream, and Mary, whose testimony on the subject would be of inestimable value, is silent. If Christ was the son of God, why hav given the genealogy of Joseph to prove him to be of the house of David? It is hardly possible to be of the lineage of David and at the same time the son of God. Christ always called himself the son of man. The idea that he was begotten of the Holy Ghost was an afterthought. The belief that great or good men were divinely begotten was a prevailing superstition in those days, and it was considered by women an honor to hav intercourse with one of the gods. The world was already overrun with sons of gods, and crucified saviors had been abundant. Grecian mythology was falling into decay, and as the human mind is so constituted that it clings to early prejudices and superstitions, mythology was turned into a fresh channel, and loving credulity arrayed Christ in the old clothes of the departed Olympian gods. The Egyptian legend of Isis and child was renewed in the story of Mary and son.

For the first three centuries many conflicting doctrins were advocated respecting the divinity of Christ and his position in the Trinity—a dogma borrowed from Egypt. The most prominent ideas were that Christ was co-equal and co-eternal with the father; that he is God, who was born of a virgin in a miraculous way. This doctrin proved to be the orthodox one. The other doctrin, known as Arianism, held that by the very nature of sonship a son could not be as old as his father, which would imply a subordinate position in the godhead.

To settle this dispute a council of bishops was held at Nicea, and it was there decided by a majority vote that Christ was God; that he was the son of God; that father, son, and Holy Ghost, these three, are one, and that the Virgin Mary is the mother of God. Arianism was declared a heresy, which to entertain was punishable with death.

Must we believe Christ to be divine upon such evidence as this? Upon an intellectual question the minority may hold just as correct views as the majority. It is most frequently the case that one man, standing on an exalted position, has discerned the truth when the whole world has been against him. If Christ was the son of God, it seems as though it might hav been known with certainty at the time of his birth. It ought, at least, hav been made known to us through a more satisfactory source than by the intriguing vote of a majority of ignorant priests.

And it was in the same manner that the doctrin of the inspiration of the Bible was decided. The monstrous proposition that the Bible is a divine revelation was not imposed upon human credulity till the latter part of the second century. During the early ages of Christianity there were a great number of gospels written, and of the four gospels, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, it has been clearly demonstrated by many writers that they were not known prior to the year 181.

It was just as legitimate for any and every priest to write a biography of Christ as it now is for any one to write a biography of Grant or Garfield. And when these gospels began to multiply, a clamor was raised among the priests in regard to the authenticity of the various writings. And as these priests considered themselvs men of God, they necessarily concluded that the writings, too, were of God. To decide which of the writings were authentic and inspired was a question of great importance and difficulty. This momentous question was also brought before the council of Nicea, and the bishops being unable to determin, and as God had superintended the writing of them, they, with much consistency, left the matter with the deity.

They threw the manuscripts under the communion table and prayed that the Lord would cause the inspired ones to get upon the table, and the uninspired ones to remain beneath, and it was done accordingly. It is not absolutely known whether the Bible as we now hav it was adopted by the Nicene council or some subsequent one. It is quite certain that it was decided to hav four gospels on the authority of Origen, who says, "There should be four gospels because the earth has four corners, the winds four general directions, and cherubim hav four faces;" and that he did not complete his argument by saying because a donkey has four legs, has always been a matter of much surprise to me.

I would like to ask every intelligent person if they are willing to subordinate their intelligence to a blind and unreasoning faith, and believe Christ to be the son of God, and the Bible the word of God, upon such testimony as this? What meager evidence! and yet Christians are willing to consign to eternal torment those who dare deny these odious dogmas.

How any sane person can believe such nonsense is more than I can understand. And yet there are thousands who will giv more freely for the propagation of this superstition than for any other cause whatever.

And what is more astonishing is that men of education will continue to teach a superstition that was imposed upon the world by men who, by their own writings, were ignorant, credulous, blundering dishonest, and who were actually given to wilful lying. Their own writings show that they did not hesitate to lie and deceive if they could only promote the cause of Christ by doing so. They declared that a lie well told and adhered to would in time answer as well as the truth, and in the interest of religion they made no scruple to forge whole books. And Eusebius, who is the principal authority on early church history, said that it was not only right but commendable to lie, if by so doing you could promote the cause of Christ. In his "Evangelical Preparation" he givs the thirty-first chapter this significant title: "How far it may be proper to use falsehood as a medicin, and for the benefit of those who require to be deceived." In another place he says that he has related everything that would redound to the glory, and suppressed everything that would disgrace the church. This is the evidence for the truth of the Christian religion, and this the character of the fathers that established the church. And this is the religion we are asked to believe as divinely true; this is the religion we must accept without a doubt, or be consigned to dungeons of eternal pain; this is the religion that has shed the blood of millions for denying its impostures, for not believing its meaningless and senseless dogmas.

This is the religion that deluged Europe in blood; that established the Inquisition with all its devilish instruments of torture; that incited the massacre of St. Bartholomew; that caused Calvin to drag Servetus to the stake; that taught Catholics to murder Protestants, and Protestants to murder Catholics; that justified the Puritans of New England to whip, brand, and kill Quakers, and barter Indian babes to West Indian slave-traders for rum. This is the religion that has been the fortress and defense of every crime. This is the religion that, united with the state, arrayed itself against learning and science, which sunk Europe into a midnight darkness for more than ten centuries.

The church, accepting the dogma of infallibility, declared that the Bible contained all that it was necessary for man to know, and that which differed from it was pernicious, the work of the devil, and should be destroyed. Philosophers were persecuted and driven into exile, their books burnt or buried in some dusty monastery, and the schools were closed. During this long period of intellectual darkness, the church was the supreme power, and if her claims are just, that she is the guardian of learning and morals, that she is the guiding light to lead mankind the right way, this was the time when she should hav given light to the children of darkness; this was the time when, with her divine light, she should hav guided aright the erring sons of men as they sought their way through the intellectual and moral gloom of that age. But ignorance, vice, and piety prevailed, and ecclesiasticism rioted in luxury. The church had no intention of letting the people become educated, but when the tide of learning set in, when she could no longer resist the pressure of advancing knowledge, she sought to direct the current to her own benefit. But when her power was supreme, so thoroughly did she do her work that Christendom did not produce a single astronomer or a single scientist of any kind worthy of the name.

She considered all science as an emanation from the devil. Knowledge was of no use, if not absolutely sinful. It was only necessary to be a credulous believer to become a saint hereafter. That long night of a thousand years was the direct result of Christian teaching.

The church understood that "ignorance is the mother of devotion," and kept the people ignorant that they might the more easily be deceived by lying impostures and disgraceful miracles. She fought the medical science that she might draw a revenue from the sale of relics, under the pretension of curing diseases by the supernatural merit of the bones of some departed saint. This thousand years of Christian rule was the starless midnight of our race. Under the garb of piety gross imposture stalked abroad, and the church with brazen front destroyed the liberty of thought.

The masses were sunk in degradation without a parallel in the annals of history. They were taught that self-subjection and bodily discomfort were the highest forms of virtue and would contribute to the enjoyments of a heavenly life; that personal cleanliness and temporal enjoyments were a sin, and displeasing to the almighty. The people were drained of their resources for the benefit of priests, and the most of them lived in miserable huts, windowless, chimneyless, with a hole in the roof for the smoke to escape, like the wigwams of our American Indians, and it was a mark of wealth if there was a rug on the floor or a bundle of straw for a bed.

This was the condition of Europe under Christian rule, and in this deplorable condition Christendom remained until learning was thrust into her brain "on the point of a Moorish lance." It was Mohammedan influences that began to elevate Europe. It was the Mohammedans who introduced into Europe the heliocentric theory of the solar system and many of its scientific corollaries. When astronomy began to be cultivated among Christians, the church opposed with all her might this noble science. She declared it to be contrary to the scriptures and subversiv of all true piety. She hesitated not to imprison and burn the advocates of the new science.

Copernicus, from fear of the Inquisition, refrained from publishing his "De Revolutionibus" for thirty-seven years, knowing what his fate would be. When it was published, the church, true to her instincts, declared it heretical, and the immortal author would hav perished at the stake had he not died before a funeral pyre could be erected; and upon the grave of this great man Luther was charitable enough to cast the epithet of fool.

For teaching that there are other worlds than ours, the noble Bruno was dogged by the hounds of the Inquisition nearly all over Europe, and was finally taken and confined in a dungeon for eight years. He was then brought before the spiritual judges and declared guilty of heresy, and was ordered to recant and abjure his error. Bravely he refuses to do so; he will not deny what he knows to be true, and he is given over to the secular authorities to be punished as mercifully as possible without the shedding of blood—the theological formula of burning a man at the stake. The sentence was accordingly executed, and Bruno perished at Rome Feb. 16, 1600.

GEORGE H. DAWES.

The Liberal Club.

It is proper to preface this report of the 344th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club by assuring the reader that it can hope to do but partial justice to the interesting and instructiv nature of that occasion. The meeting was held in the evening of Friday, April 22d, at the usual place, 220 East Fifteenth street. The nominal admission fee of five cents was exacted at the door, except in the case of avowed Presbyterians and women, who were permitted to enter free of charge.

The writer stayed at home rather late that evening, reading a copy of the Open Court which the proprietors of that periodical had been so thoughtful as to mail to his address. He became deeply absorbed in an article by James Parton on "Cranks," and, having read it through, came to the conclusion that the crank is a useful citizen. This reminded him that it was time to go to the Liberal Club, which the venerable Pantarch used to glory in calling a congress of cranks, but which, nevertheless, is as intelligent and agreeable a body of ladies and gentlemen as can be found anywhere.

The orator of the evening was Col. Richard J. Hinton, an Englishman, who adopted this country before the war, and fought for it during that unpleasant period. The colonel is a stocky-built man, with long hair and beard, and a broad-brimmed hat. He will probably be sixty years of age before many more winters hav added their frosts to the gray streaks in his hair. He seems to hav been nearly everywhere upon the habitable globe. The geography of both hemispheres is familiar to him. He knows the Pacific coast from Topolobampo bay to Puget sound, and the Atlantic coast from St. Lawrence to the Gulf. His knowledge of the intervening territory is good. He is a journalist by profession, and wields the pen with that vigor peculiar to men who know what they are writing about. He is also an orator, and overlooking his excitability and the fact that he never pronounces an h at the beginning of a word, or sounds a g at the end of one, he is a pleasant speaker. The listener, however, must be satisfied to take 'avin' for having, and 'is for his.

Colonel Hinton's subject on the occasion of which mention is here made was "John Brown and His Men." The lecturer himself was one of those men, and might hav been at the Harper's Ferry raid and been hanged for it if that disaster had not been precipitated ten days before the appointed time, i.e., Oct. 16th instead of the 26th. The first part of the lecture detailed the circumstances of the speaker's first meeting with John Brown in Kansas, and the struggles of the free-state settlers, during which Colonel Hinton was himself taken prisoner by the border ruffians, and escaped death only by being liberated by one of his captors. He bore for many days upon his person the marks of the cords with which he was bound. The latter part of the lecture dealt with the Harper's Ferry episode, which ended in the death of Brown. It appeared that Brown's scheme was to capture the arsenal and arms at Harper's Ferry, to collect a large party of freed slaves, and then, with his own men, gain the Alleghany mountains, where they would establish a rendezvous for runaway slaves and guide them through Pennsylvania and Ohio to Canada and freedom. The plan did not work. Being divulged by treachery, the raid was precipitated before a sufficient force had been gathered to make it effectiv, and a series of blunders did the rest. The militia came out and suppressed Mr. Brown of Osawatomie and his enthusiastic followers. Among the letters found in Brown's effects was one signed William Harrison. It gave a scheme for the campaign which, if carried to success, would hav caused the slaveholders a great deal of trouble. A thousand dollars was offered for the writer of the letter. It was written, Colonel Hinton said, by himself, and signed William Harrison to prevent trouble in case the letter miscarried. A young man named Hasley or Asley, who took part in the raid, was under sentence of death. He was accused of being the author of the letter, and he wrote to Colonel Hinton not to worry over the fact that no one would ever know which of them had been hanged.

The speaker occupied about two hours in the delivery of the address. He incidentally mentioned that Brown was a Presbyterian; and it is greatly regretted that he does not still survive, as he could gain admission to the Liberal Club free of charge. Colonel Hinton's peroration was delivered with fine effect. He told how he stood in the streets of Washington and saw a regiment of men march down the streets singing the song of John Brown and his soul which went marching on. The colonel had heard in Paris a thousand students singing the Marseillaise hymn, but nothing ever so affected him as the words and music he heard that day, when the Union troops sang, "His soul goes marching on," the American Marseillaise.

The Chair read a notice of a meeting of E. H. Heywood's Labor Reform League. Mr. Heywood, the Chair said, had inherited all the reform notions that had sprung up in New England since it was settled, and was consequently the biggest crank ever produced by that section. The lecture is now open for discussion.

Captain Clark went forward with a copy of the North American Review for November, 1883, in his hand. The captain first called the kind attention of the audience to the fact that he should probably never appear again upon that platform. He would like, therefore, to make a short and uninterrupted speech, but didn't suppose there was much chance of his being allowed to do so. He then proceeded to say that he wanted to giv the retiring chairman his benediction. The Chair called him to order, and the captain said the interruption was just what he expected, and he was pretty well satisfied what kind of a show he stood there for fair play. He said a Socialist did not know a bee from a bull's foot, and referred to the speaker of the evening as Col. Bombastes Furioso. Then he read an extract from the North American Review to show that John Brown, with all his piety, had blood on his hands when he raised them to ask a blessing upon his food. If any man was ever well-hung, he believed that man to hav been John Brown. The captain went on to say that he had lived largely among the blacks in all lands, civilized and barbarous, and he was prepared to say that any man who took a negro from his nativ land and carried him to any civilized country on the globe did the negro a good turn. There is reason to believe that Captain Clark has in his day commanded vessels that were engaged in doing the Ethiopians frequent good turns of this sort around Zanguebar and Mozambique. He confessed that the commander of one of her majesty's cruisers, whom he met in Africa, expressed a willingness to hang him at the yardarm when a favorable opportunity offered. Finally, he said, there was scarcely a man in history about whom the people hav been so deceived as about John Brown, and the lecture of the evening was a bald-faced attempt to perpetuate that deception.

Mrs. Leonard said she used to know John Brown.

Mynheer Oppenheimer was reminded of Shakspere's plays, in which relief from the strain of tragedy was furnished by the antics of the fool. This evening Colonel Hinton had provided the strain, and Captain Clark the relief. Brother Oppenheimer was down on the card to lecture on "Ingersoll and Socialism," April 29th, but enthusiasm on the subject having gradually waned, he kindly gave way to Mr. Heywood.

When Colonel Hinton replied to his critics he cut Captain Clark up pretty badly, and it is understood that Captain Clark invited him to adjourn to the sidewalk, where he was willing to continue the discussion in any manner agreeable to the colonel. It is said that Colonel Hinton declined the invitation, not through any fear as to the result, but because he was so well satisfied with the way he replied to his opponent that he considered it would be cruelty to carry the matter further. Probably the next time the two disputants meet both will be ready to call things even. It is better for the affair to be settled amicably than that reparation should be done on the gory field.

FRIDAY EVENING, THE 29TH.

On the date which heads this communication, a man just past thirty, and wearing upon his person a handsome badge-pin, stood on the steps of the German Masonic Temple. Another man came along and wanted to know if the Liberal Club met there. He got an affirmativ answer. Then he asked the price of admission, and was told that if he would make affidavit that he was a Presbyterian in good standing he would be admitted free. He inquired if there was anything about him that suggested a hypocrit, a lunatic, or a sneak, and wanted the question settled right there. He was advised to pay his five cents and sit down and listen attentivly, which he did.

Mr. Wakeman opened by again referring to the fact that the speaker of the evening, Mr. E. H. Heywood, was a tremendous crank. By that he meant that many New England reforms depended upon him for their motiv power.

Mr. Heywood got a cheerful reception, and then went for all established institutions with great vigor. No rent, no interest, no marriage, no "morality," no profits, free rum, and anarchy generally would hit him about right. Prohibitionists were described as temperance drunk. He had an uncle who, when the Maine liquor law was passed in 1858, went to drinking from a sense of duty. In Princeton, where he livs, Mr. Heywood said they voted for no license, which means free rum, and for temperance Princeton is the banner town of the county and state. It was amazing, he said, how meekly rumsellers submitted to oppression, and how they throve under it. It was a fulfilment of the scripture, which says that the meek shall inherit the earth. Mr. Heywood also had something to say regarding the Anarchists of Chicago, whom he called seven John Browns. If the authorities hanged them, seven souls would be released to go marching on in the ever-growing ranks of labor reform. Mr. Heywood gave away copies of his paper, the Word, containing matter unfit for reading at family worship.

Mr. Wakeman said there would be no discussion, as a business meeting was to be held and the officers for the ensuing year elected. Mr. Chamberlain read a petition from the members and audience thanking the chair for its valuable services and asking a continuance of them. Mr. Wakeman said it was impossible, and proceeded to set forth the reasons for refusing to be a candidate for reëlection. First, there were personal reasons. By financial necessity he was obliged to liv in the country during the summer, and attending the club was inconvenient. Furthermore, he had spent many years of service in the Liberal cause, and now, for other financial reasons, he must be more free to pursue his profession of the law. Secondly, he could do the club better service as a speaker than as a presiding officer. Since the death of Mr. Andrews there had been no one to take a philosophical view of questions and harmonize the disputants in so far as harmony was possible. Mr. Wakeman believed he could fill this vacancy to some extent if relieved of official duties. Thirdly, Liberal affairs were in the condition of the business of a grocer he knew who shut up his store in order to collect and square up accounts. Liberalism should go into liquidation. This made it necessary for Mr. Wakeman to follow the example of Colonel Ingersoll and withdraw, and he believed it to be the duty of all who hav been prominent in Liberal affairs to step down and out until some important question calls them to the front again. "They should stand aside," said the speaker, "until the Liberals of the country find out that their proper position is the one of Leland and myself. Every step that organization has taken since we left the head of the League has been downward toward its destruction, and Liberalism as an organized power has grown less and less." Mr. Wakeman added that he prophesied this result at the time the Liberals turned him out of office as president of the League.

A business meeting followed. Mr. Wakeman was pleaded with to remain president, but he wouldn't do it. Mrs. Leonard nominated Mr. Henry Nichols for that office, and Mr. Searing seconded the nomination in a great speech. Mr. Sutherland nominated Van Buren Denslow, L.L.D., and Mr. King supported him. Mr. Oppenheimer feared Mr. Denslow was prejudiced against Socialists. The club didn't want a president with a prejudice. Mr. Denslow was then elected. Mr. Nichols was asked to be secretary, whereat he lost his temper, and told the chair it was an insult to offer a man of his age and experience such an office—"Yes, sir, an impertinence, sir, an impertinence." Mr. Oppenheimer being named for the place, that gentleman exemplified his freedom from prejudice by declaring that he wouldn't accept any office in the same organization with a man of Professor Denslow's views.

The offices were filled as follows: President, Van Buren Denslow; vice-presidents, E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D., Edward W. Chamberlain, and Jas. Morris; recording secretary, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald; corresponding secretary, T. R. Kinget, M.D.; treasurer, Erastus Dean; librarian, Mrs. Cynthia Leonard; assistant librarian, M. A. Sutherland; trustees, Courtlandt Palmer, Isaac Rosenbourgh, and William C. Kidney. Mr. Wakeman was made an honorary member.

There is considerable jubilation over the election of Professor Denslow as president, the nomination of Mr. Nichols being regarded by some as an endeavor to make the Liberal Club largely a Socialistic organization.

News and Notes.

This has been a gala week. I hav come into the valley of Santa Clara, said by Bayard Taylor to be one of the three most beautiful valleys in the world; and I guess it is, for mountain, sea, and plain unite in charming prospects, and fruits of the tropics mingle with those of the northern clime. There is rain in the right quantity and time, and beautiful sunshine, and now and then, just for the luxury of it, a snow-storm that descends with the softness of summer's smile. The whole valley is as nicely kept as a parlor. There are no indications of dirt, the gardens, orchards, and fields are so neatly arranged. Smooth, almost, as marble floors, they spread away shining with bright colors, while along the horizon the Coast Range rises in every variety of form. The climate is equable—no earthquakes, no thunderstorms, refreshing gales from season to season, and no oppressiv heat or biting cold. This is a land of enjoyment, of perpetual harvest and unending bloom. So the days hav passed delightfully, and I scarcely know that time is on the wing.

I am at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Schwartz, strong and true friends, who believe in work, and labor earnestly for the success of our cause. Mrs. Schwartz is a Spiritualist, but her belief only makes the triumph of liberty and justice more important in this world. Her noble philosophy is seen in one of her eloquent lectures published in the Golden Gate. Mr. Schwartz does not exactly know about the future life, but he takes an intense interest in reform and ideal progress here, and is loyal to principle even to the sacrifice of wealth.

I hav also enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. L. Magenheimer, where Mr. Bennett was entertained while in this city on his homeward journey. Mr. and Mrs. Magenheimer are stanch Liberals, and hav generously aided in the effort at this point. I lectured on Sunday evening, April 17th, to a full house, and shall lecture Sunday evening, the 24th, and in my next I will giv particulars of the campaign. The outlook is promising. New interest is aroused.

Samos Parsons, eighty-four years of age, walked seven miles on Sunday morning to attend the lecture. A glorious veteran that! Monday afternoon Mr. Schwartz and myself, with Mr. Parsons for companion, rode over to his home through a country every inch of which is like an elegant garden. Mr. and Mrs. Parsons liv with their daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Schofield, and a cordial Liberal household they make, and it was a privilege indeed to spend a few hours in this attractiv spot. Mrs. Parsons is a sister of D. R. Burt, one of our grand pioneers in the ranks that are now gone. She is eighty-five years of age, ardent still, with the beautiful enthusiasm of youth. Age is blended with the glories of life's morning. It looked as if Samos Parsons would liv to a hundred years, he has such tenacious vitality. He livs wisely, calmly, but not indolently. He has a workshop and library, with tools, books, papers, etc. He can make almost anything in iron and wood. He has a kind of universal genius—mechanical, musical, literary, and philosophic. He enjoys life hugely. Through varied fortunes he has reached a comfortable serenity, and he looks forward still.

Tuesday was a day of exhilaration from silver morn to golden eve. I went to Mt. Hamilton, on whose castled summit is the Lick Observatory, from whence the largest eye on this planet will search the immensity of stars day and night. It is thirteen miles, in a straight line, from San José, twenty-seven miles by the winding mountain road, which is the most glorious drive, I believe, in this world. It almost seems as if you were mounting via a balloon as you go speeding along. The road is so skilfully constructed that our stanch horses trot nearly to the top, four thousand four hundred feet above the level of the sea. From San José the road shoots like an arrow, amid ranks of trees to the foot-hills, six miles off. Then begins the ascent, and it is as if we were climbing round and round some mighty tower—not the tower of Babel, for we are coming, not to confusion, but to the harmony of the spheres.

Continually the landscape expands until we can see for hundreds of miles away, and as one looks down into the valley he almost grows dizzy and fears he will tumble right into it, thousands of feet below. The Santa Cruz mountains, and the Coast Range, with gleaming draperies of cloud, roll off in numberless peaks, the dark blue mingling with the misty sky. To the right the San Francisco bay stretches to the cloudy horizon, and on fair days the ships can be seen, and the city itself, with its busy inhabitants and its ferryboats passing from shore to shore. The valley shines with a wondrous mosaic of colors, white houses amid the blending brilliant greens of fields and vinyards, and groves of oak, and pine, and sycamore, and palm-trees with the sober brown, and gold and purple of flower and stalk, a panorama of charming beauty, earth and heaven glittering in magnificent array. At the Grand View House we reach the acme of the entrancing prospects, and the lovely and sublime picture unfolds its surpassing vastness. Here we change horses, pass onward into a beautiful valley and through a mountain hamlet, and up another rise higher still, while Mt. Hamilton towers before us. At Smith's Creek, ten miles from Grand View, we change horses again. From Smith's Creek to the observatory it is a mile and three quarters, air-line, but seven miles by the stage road. We travel a mile or two and return almost to the same spot, only we are fifty or a hundred yards higher up, and so we mount as if traversing the intricate mazes of a Chinese puzzle, ascending by a gradual evolution, circle above circle, to the very top, where again the valley of Santa Clara is seen, and the surrounding bay and hills. Mt. Diablo, with shining clouds about its breast, shoots its blue peak to the clear sky. A hundred and fifty miles distant we behold the snowy ranges of the Yosemite, and, faint glittering on the horizon, the waters of Monterey. An hour and a half speeds almost like one dazzling moment on this historic hight. Professor Keeler, one of our most learned astronomers, who has charge of the Observatory, explained to us the beautiful machinery by which the march of constellations brings wealth to human thought. The body of James Lick, who believed in man and not in God, is deposited beneath the massiv shaft upon which swings the telescope. Noble resting-place! The stars with silver and golden beams will write his name along the path of advancing knowledge.

The ride back, with gilded clouds along the vast firmament, and nature's most secret haunts mingling with the elegance of civilized life, was a rare enchantment. Seven miles in forty minutes down the mighty mountain sides was a rapture, the glorious horses dashing along like steam-engins.

Besides the telescopes, there are the finest clocks in the world at the Observatory, and the steps of the sun are watched to within five-hundredths of a second, and the beats of time with electric and magnetic currents are sent to San Francisco and all railroad stations, so that no variation occurs along the entire coast.

Wednesday was another day "jeweled with joy." I went to "Ingersoll's Cathedral," among the big trees near Santa Cruz, that lift their tall heads two hundred and seventy-five and three hundred feet into the sunlight. I could not tell how many there were, but one could wander for hours amid these vast arcades, where verdant halls stretch on every side, sounding with most solemn and sweet music, amid the innumerable and gigantic branches. There is "The Giant," "Jumbo," "General Grant," "General Fremont," "The Three Sisters," "The Three Brothers," "Idlewild," etc., each a thousand years old, I guess, and each a world in itself of wonder and magnificence, shooting straight up one hundred and fifty feet without a branch, then spreading its enormous dome. Amid these broad and echoing aisles, with sun and shadow mingling in delightful charm, I wandered as if by magic to the choicest spot of all, the Mecca of my eager feet among these venerable shrines, "Ingersoll's Cathedral," worthy in its beauty and grandeur of that heroic name, and he worthy to make it memorable with man's achievements for liberty and progress. It is one tree, with eight sublime columns two hundred and fifty feet in height. Its vast root is one hundred and twenty feet in circumference on the outer circle. Where it breaks from the soil it is ninety-six feet in circumference. From this mighty base rises the central trunk, with its encircling pillars forming a dome of wondrous brilliancy, in whose glancing depths the sunshine falls as if upon an emerald sea, that rolls and breaks in exquisit entrancing melody. A cathedral indeed, that nature's deft hands hav built, while the centuries hav slowly come and gone. Here thoughts unutterable press upon the mind. The life of man, the life of earth, meet in kindred fascination, and the swaying branches are like pictures of human struggle; and in this magic circle I wonder if poesy breathes its charm, for thus my thoughts flowed on:

INGERSOLL'S CATHEDRAL.

Was ever temple made so rich as this,
Whose glowing roof is wrought of sunbeams bright,
And leaves that tremble with delightful sound—
An emerald sea that seems to float above,
And drop its music on the enchanted heart?
Beneath this dome I sit, and swift thoughts come
Of what the world might be if this green arch
Made all the church for human hope and prayer.
How peaceful then the earth! How clear its breast
Of all the bloody stains of tyrant's hand!
Then would man walk abroad with brow elate;
And as these columns greet the chainless air,
So would his mind aloft make music mild—
Earthborn, yet reaching to the radiant sun.
O beautiful cathedral! planted deep
And spreading wide thy roots in earth's dark breast,
And from thy massiv base uplifting high
Thy branching pillars interlacing far,
In depths that seem unmeasured to mine eyes,
Of greeu and golden glory, and keen blue
That for a moment pierces through thy roof
Like the bright eye of a swift-wandering god.
Here can I worship. Thy grand priest is man,
The brave and loving, tender and sublime,
The music of whose speech is like thy voice
Forever falling from thy glittering spires.
Eveu as thou liftest thy bright head above
The fruitful darkness of thy rooted base—
So from the past of man, its darksome toil,
The genius of to-day in heaven's bright face
Shines splendid, weaving sunlight into joy,
And making hope for him who labors low.
O sweet pavilion, 'neath thy moving dome,
Each leaf a diamond glancing into song
Till light and sound become one joy intense—
I offer prayer, the ceaseless prayer of all,
That men might be like these strong ranks I see
Of monarch trees, upright and firm for truth,
Like him whose name is on thy stately front,
Giant like thee, and piercing to the light,
And making music for our shadowed life
Like thy sun-christened blazonry of leaves.
Here will my heart the hymn of hope new take,
And from thy gracious presence I will go,
My spirit rhythmic with thy lofty strain.

Thursday and Friday I am in the beautiful valley of Livermore, where the finest wines in the state are produced, rivaling those of France and Burgundy in delicacy of flavor. The soil is high—four hundred feet above the level of the sea—so that vinyards escape dampness, and drink in the warmth of the sun, with sufficient moisture so that the heat does not parch, but the gentle flame is transformed to richest juice. This valley is named after Robert Livermore, an English boy, who ran away from his ship, married the daughter of a Spanish alcade, received large grants of land, and fifty years ago was one of the mighty men of this country, enterprising and adventurous.

I gave two lectures to full houses, and find a large Liberal element. The prospect is bright for a permanent organization. This country is too good for the churches. Where nature smiles so brilliantly, the banners of Freethought should greet the sky. This valley has only been settled a few years. The land was once considered worthless, but it now ranks with the best producing sections of California. All sorts of fruit can be raised—grapes, apricots, peaches, pears, cherries, figs, etc.—but it takes a small fortune, however, to start a farm here; but the outlay is wonderfully remunerativ.

I am at Petaluma next week, April 26th, 27th, and 28th; at Stockton, May 1st and 8th; Napa City, May 3d, 4th, and 5th; at Sacramento, May 15th and 22d. I expect to be at Ukiah, Grass Valley, etc., June 5th, and plan to be at Ashland, Oregon, June 12th; at Talent, June 19th; at Salem, Silverton, June 21st, 22d, and 23d; and other places in Oregon and Washington Territory, but the dates are not yet fixed. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

One of the Reasons Why Dr. McGlynn was Deposed.

From an interview with a Sun reporter in 1870.

"I am opposed to Catholics making application for appropriations from the state for separate schools. I am sure Mr. Preston did not express the Catholic wish and sentiment on the subject. I assert that we do not wish to unite secular and religious education. Our public schools are the pride and glory of Americans, and should be made institutions where Christians and Infidels, Jews and gentiles, may alike send their children to be educated, without any fear that they would be subjected to any religious or sectarian bias. An Infidel, Jew, or Mohammedan has the same rights in our government that you or I hav; and the rights of all should be respected. The business of public education should be in the hands of seculars, and not intrusted to our religious orders."

Editorial Notes.

"EVERY minister," says the Christian at Work, "should be a 128th Psalm man." Well, if they ought to be, they are not. Most of them are 109th Psalm men in sentiment, and but two or three centuries ago were in practice.

A GERMAN evangelical journal says that Protestantism in Germany suffers greatly from the growth of unbelief and the activity of the Roman Catholic church. Were it not that the Evangelical church is supported by the government, the schismatics of the Luther kind would hav a hard road to hoe. The church ought to persuade Bismarck not to trade with the pope.

WE learn from press dispatches from Lynchville, Va., that Mrs. E. D. Slenker, of Snowville, has been arrested by an agent of Anthony Comstock's society on a charge of violating the United States postal law against the mailing of immoral literature, and lodged in jail in default of $2,000 bail. Up to the hour of going to press no further information is obtainable, but it is safe to assume that the charge is groundless and that the arrest is but another of those outrages with which the people hav become familiar under the Comstock law.

AT the first meeting of the Anti-Poverty Society, of which Dr. McGlynn is president and Henry George a conspicuous member, held in Chickering Hall last Sunday, Mr. George said:

"This society does not propose to ask what beliefs its members hold. If Archbishop Corrigan wishes to join, good and welcome; if Colonel Ingersoll wishes to join, good and welcome. We are not here to pray to God, but to do the work of God; to arouse the religious sentiment in man to do what charity and creeds hav not done—to abolish poverty. The churches, so far from striving to do this, condemn and persecute the priest who dares to lift up this standard—who would labor for the poor."

It is a healthy sign that Archbishop Corrigan's name was received with hisses, and Colonel Ingersoll's name with "prolonged and tremendous cheers," from an audience that filled every inch of floor room in the big hall.

THE Catholic Union and Times prints this paragraph:

"The Infidel sheet, THE TRUTH SEEKER, which, if it seeks hasn't found truth yet, scoffs at miracles, of course. We hav heard of certain so-called Christian preachers who think it a mark of advanced thought and profound mind to do the same."

In following the example of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we think the "so-called Christian preachers" do well. But if Mr. Cronin will get one of the too numerous Catholic representativs of Christian omnipotence to perform a genuin miracle—say raising a dead man—we promis not to scoff any more, and also to use our influence with the so-called Christian preachers to get them to abstain. A miracle performed this year would be worth more to the church, whose trade is falling off, than forty performed eighteen hundred years ago, and which are not susceptible of verification.

BEARING in mind that this is a country where civil law is superior to ecclesiastical canons, the Roman Catholic priests of California are carrying their heads high. Two years or so ago a Stockton couple were married by a Methodist minister, upon whom the California law confers authority for such performance. Recently a child was born, and the father asked the minister to baptize it. Hearing of this, the priest of Stockton called upon the gentleman, told him that his child was illegitimate, that his wife was a concubine, that unless he was married by a Catholic priest the child would be damned, and that he and his wife would continue to liv in concubinage and under the anathema of the church of Rome. The young man was raised a Catholic, but renounced his allegiance when he became of age. His wife is still a Catholic and the two are now completely demoralized. The father vows that he will not submit to the priest and will probably run the risk of being damned.

SAYS a Christian writer on "Our Religious Instincts" in the May Forum:

"When the Agnostic peruses some new critique of the Theistic argument, or the latest examination of the belief in a future life, he throws his hat in the air in exultation, confident that the superstition cannot survive such another fatal exposure, and timid Christians themselvs turn pale with apprehension of the coming downfall of the church. But when, the nine days' wonder over, the new dialectical or scientific cannonade has passed by, the flag of Christian trust and hope is seen floating as jubilantly as ever over the ancient walls."

The religious instinct, of which Mr. Bixby boasts, is the instinct of fear—the same instinct that made man in the savage state crouch before the lightning flash and the roll of thunder; made him seek to propitiate the powerful sun, and offer sacrifices to deified phenomena; that made him giv personality to animals and plants, to streams and winds and stars, and bow before them all. If Christians are satisfied with the permanence of that instinct, let them hav what comfort they derive from it. To the philosopher such permanence is valuable only as it reveals that man is still in the bondage of animalism.

IF Spiritualist mediums practice medicin, or heal diseases in any way, receiving pay therefor, they must take out a license when in Pennsylvania. Mrs. Sarah Patterson, of Philadelphia, who calls herself a medium, was charged by the County Medical Society with practicing medicin and surgery without a license, and a Philadelphia jury has declared her guilty. The defense set up by the defendant's counsel, Carrie B. Kilgore, and her husband, Damon Y. Kilgore, was that Mrs. Patterson was a medium and under the control of spirits, and was not responsible for what she had done in a trance. The defendant's counsel are both Spiritualists. After the verdict was announced, Mrs. Kilgore, the lawyer, made a motion for a new trial and an arrest of judgment, saying that they would file their reasons within the prescribed time. The motion was granted, and in the mean time the judge permitted the defendant to renew her bail. In his charge to the jury, Judge Arnold said: "The question before you is a simple question, whether or not the defendant practiced medicin, surgery, or any of their branches for gain, aud received or accepted certain fees from the two witnesses. If she did, she is guilty in manner and form as she stands iudicted, unless you believe that she was insane and not responsible for her acts; and if you acquit her on that ground, you are to say, 'Not guilty on the ground of insanity,' and then we can put her iu an asylum. Spiritualism is no defense whatever. Therefore, dismiss all you hav heard about Spiritualism."

SOME of our good Liberals about New York (who, by the way, do not subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, though they ought to), think that our artist "drew it too strong" when he pictured as knocking at the doors of our public schools a Catholic priest with a suggestion of the devil about him. We trust that we shall not offend our fastidious friends if we remark that we consider the picture in our issue of April 30th to be one of Mr. Heston's happiest inspirations, and we would not change a single one of its suggestions. The only apology that we could make to anyone would be to the devil for intimating that he could be a Catholic priest. But, then, we don't care for the devil, either.

SOME enterprising showmen hav built and set up in this city a fac simile of an old London street, showing the architectural styles, and the mode of the shopmen's and mechanic's lives, of several centuries. It is an entertaining and instructiv historical exhibition. But we notice in the little paper published to advertise it the showmen keep standing a wild fable called, "Chaplain McCabe's Dream of Ingersollville." Showmeu should always keep their shows before the public by means of printer's ink, but to do so it is not necessary to insult a large number of people by printing and reprinting the delirious imagiuings of a Methodist preacher, whose chief claim to notoriety is his successful mendicancy. Unless the Old London Street showmen propose to get their money from churches and Sunday-schools, they will do well to ignore dreams resulting from too great indulgence in spirits of any sort—the "spirit of God" not excepted.

THE Methodist preachers of Oregon are hard to please. The Dayton Chronicle tells this story: "In his circuit a zealous brother of the Methodist persuasion has for one of his flock a widow, poor, lone, and forlorn, as women in her circumstances are wont to be. The widow was in arrears with her church dues, and as she had no money, prevailed upon her instructor to take what was due him in anything he could fiud that he liked about the house. Among other possessions of the widow were two fine hams, one of which she offered to the minister, but, true to his greedy, selfish nature, he took both hams and a piece of backbone which he found with them. An ordinary man would hav been satisfied and kept his mouth shut after getting away with the whole thing, but this follower of the Lord was not. He had hardly got home before he began to find fault with the hams, said they smelt bad, and he believed they were not good. After using what he could of them, he again called upon the widow and informed her that the hams failed to satisfy him, and he should still hold that she was in his debt." The woman, adds the Chronicle, has the sympathy of the entire neighborhood.

Religious War in Tonga.

From the Otago, N. Z., Daily Times.

AUCKLAND, February 8.

News from Tonga indicates that the long-expected religious war between the Wesleyan and Free churches has at last broken out, and it has taken the unexpected form of an attempted assassination of the Rev. Shirley Baker (premier), who founded the Free church. On Thursday evening, January 13th, about 7:30 o'clock, as Mr. Baker was driving in his buggy, with his daughter Beatrice and his son Shirley, close to their own house and the King's palace, Mr. Baker saw some men coming down under a fence with their guns pointed at the buggy, and another man in the roadway. He called to Shirley, who immediately jumped down and told the man to giv him his gun and said, "Don't fire." The men at the fence said, "Wi wi" (Do it), and immediately he fired, hitting Shirley in the left arm. The men at the feuce were peering round, trying to get a sight at Mr. Baker, but either the carriage lamp dazed them, or else they were afraid of hitting Miss Baker. Anyhow, they did not fire, and all cleared away. The horse sprang forward when the shot was fired, having been hit with one of the slugs, and Miss Baker was thrown out, severely hurting her neck and back. Shirley said, "I am all right." But his father must hav seen his arm was shattered, and drove furiously off for a doctor. There was great yelling out, and the whole town was soon on the scene, armed with guns, axes, clubs, spears, etc. The doctor attending Shirley found he had received a very severe wound, inflicted by three or four slugs, which had entered the inside of the arm and come out just below the joint. Some people sayt hey heard two reports almost simultaneously, and support their statement by the fact that the lamp was struck in two places, and the splashboard of the buggy also. Miss Baker was wounded in the thigh in two places. A great many boats hav arrived full of armed men, also two schooners with some four hundred men. There was a fearful yelling, and the warriors marched round about firing their guns in all directions. In the afternoon a crowd of them massed around the prison yelling and beating in the doors with their rifle-butts. Four shots were fired which penetrated the prison walls. On Saturday the Hoabai warriors started out in gangs and plundered a number of town and country villages so far as the Wesleyans are concerned. In the district of Horna the Wesleyans were stripped of all their possessions and turned out of their homes.

Communications.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

Before I leave Ohio I think I will introduce the reader to some persons, not because of their opinions upon slavery, but to show the ignorance that existed at that time upon social matters in some parts of that state. At the close of one of our meetings we were informed that we would be hospitably entertained at the house of Mr. E., some four miles distant, and a person in the house would take us in his sleigh to the place. On arriving, we found a good house and a cordial welcome. The host was a man of sixty years or thereabouts, with a second wife of about fifty years. The wife was very inferior to the husband, and had married, as many another woman has, for the sake of a home, and found the home had cost much more than its worth.

Mr. E. was very communicativ, and soon gave me his history. He, with his former wife, both from Massachusetts, were members of the Presbyterian church, and during a revival in the town, which was where he was then living, the wife became so excited, fearing her children would be sent to hell should they liv to be men and women, that she cut the throats of two of them. The third was strong enough to break away from the mother, and so saved his life. This wife was confined some months in an asylum, a maniac, but the church could not hav the name of a murderer on its books, and so it excommunicated her. The husband then withdrew his name. When the poor crazed woman became calm, the husband took her home, and caused her to giv birth three different times to a child. The first, a girl, was idiotic, and her depravity was beyond description. She would wander off and become the victim of some masculin demon, and had more than once been delivered of a child too much deformed to liv. Following her birth, a son was born, more than half a fool, but not given to licentiousness. Then a third son was born, an entire idiot. As this man told me of these things, I was so roused that I said, "You permitted yourself to be the father of three idiot children—the mother a woman who had been driven mad by the cruelty of her religious creed!" "Why," said he, "she was harmless, and she was my wife." I wondered if he had learned that abominable way of treating a wife from the Bible. The eldest son had been given the farm. The two idiot sons were to be supported by him, and the daughter wandered a vagabond upon the face of the earth.

The second wife, a widow, with one daughter, had married, expecting in that way to make a home for herself and child. She was not allowed to hav her daughter with her on account of the expense; and she, the wife, what was she? Will some one tell me, when it means, as it did in this case, legal prostitution, if such wifehood is less degrading than when a mother goes upon the street and yields herself to some stranger who has not disgusted her with long years of such brutality? Alas! that woman does not yet own her own physical body!

One more anecdote of Ohio customs forty years ago. A convention was to be held at Crestline. The railroad had just been opened, and a depot built. The western Abolitionists owned a commodious tent, which was transported to this place. A number of the more distinguished lecturers from Massachusetts were to be present, and, as was expected, a large crowd was in attendance, the new railroad facilities making it easy to reach the place. I arrived early in the morning of the opening day of the meeting. A gentleman met me at the depot, and ascertaining that I was Mrs. Colman, said that I was to be entertained at his house. On reaching his home, I was met by a young lady with whom I had become acquainted the year previous in Michigan. She came to me with outstretched arms, wound them about my neck, and burst into a fit of violent weeping. I at length succeeded in soothing her so that she told me her grief. She was a resident of Philadelphia, and had been spending a year with an uncle in the West. In that time she had become engaged to a young man, the brother of her uncle's wife, who was accompanying her home to make the acquaintance of her family. As both families were very activ distinguished Abolitionists, the young couple had taken this convention on their way. They had been met on their arrival at Crestline, and invited to this house, and given for the night one room with two beds, the room so small that there was just space enough to walk between the beds. I said: "You poor, foolish child. You are crying because you hav stayed for a night with people so unsophisticated that they had no idea that chaste, pure people required bolts and bars to keep them from wronging each other. Wipe your eyes. There is no need of crying because you hav been entirely trusted by people who did not know you, and what is of much greater consequence to you, you hav proved your lover's character to be unblemished under temptation." That day the house was so filled that the two beds were made into one, nd five persons occupied the room which had been cell of suffering and mortification to my little lady on the first night of her arrival. The young lover made his bed with other gentlemen on the floor of the room out of which the little room opened.

I cannot leave this place without recording another case of "woman's wrongs." A cousin of mine charged me to keep out of my "Reminiscences" all reference to woman's rights. I am troubled to find woman's rights, so much of woman's wrongs comes up to my memory. I saw no appearance of the getting ready of our hostess to attend the meeting, and so ventured to say, "Are you not going to the meeting?" "How can you ask? The house full, dinner to get for the crowd; two babies, the oldest not one year older than the youngest, and already heavy with another—can you think I hav time or wish to go?" I said, "Hav you no help?" She answered: "Yes; my sister is here to take care of the children to-day. Oh, go and talk about the slave's wrongs, and if you can find one as much a slave as myself, both night and day, take her my pity!" I said: "Will you let me help you to-day? Let me plan for you. Giv us just some bread and butter at noon, and I will help you to get the dinner after the afternoon session." She said she feared her husband would not like it. I said: "Leave him to me. I am to speak this morning, and I shall hav something to say to him, and I wish you to hear it." The sister joined me in persuasion, and the poor woman went to the meeting. I found my tongue unloosed, and said as much for oppressed wifehood as for the chattel slave. I hav never seen this family since.

I went to Indiana and Illinois after leaving Ohio. Very little antislavery work had ever been done in Indiana, and the people were too stupid to be easily aroused. I had suffered all the inconveniences, seemingly, of Western life, but the half has not been told. A sample of the hotels may be amusing. I found in my room a bed and a broken chair—no article for the toilet whatever. This was to be put up with without wry faces where we were given without money or price the best they had; but in a hotel which had a large swinging sign on which was painted in large letters, "Preserve the Union," and for which I paid $1.50 per day, I felt like demanding a little more, and so asked for water in my room for a bath in the morning. Quite late, so late that I was already dressed, despairing of the bath, I was confronted with a man, with what they used in Massachusetts to call an iron skillet, differing from a kettle in the form of its handle, which, instead of a bail, was a straight handle projecting from one side, like a spider. He presented me with this skillet, in which was a quart of water, saying that the delay was on account of the using of the "thing," as he called it, to cook the meat in for breakfast, and the towel had to be washed and ironed, in proof of which the towel was warm from the ironing. ## Some Sunday Reflections.

Suggested by the Evening Sun.

If I were a philosopher, I might offer some reflections on, and draw some deductions from, certain perplexities that beset men of this city on Sundays.

As, for instance, if I were a philosopher, I might ask myself where freedom of action ends and restraint begins.

On Sunday Mr. de Smyth is at liberty, if he is a member of an uptown club, to enter its reception-room, call for any beverage—vinous, malt, or alcoholic—and hav it brought to him with most perfunctory elegance by a swallow-tailed waiter. But Mr. de Smyth is not permitted on that holy day to buy beer, wine, or liquor at a hotel or a saloon.

On Sunday John Smith is free to go to the park and listen to the strains that issue from the kiosk on the mall, but he is restrained on that holy day from listening to instrumental music in a public hall. He may go to a concert in the evening, where gems from operas are sung by Patti or Schalchi, but he cannot hear an opera in its entirety.

On Sunday he may take a pleasure trip on a steamboat, may witness a swimming-match, but he is debarred from seeing athletes bat a baseball.

On Sunday he may buy a cigar, but it is made a crime to sell him a pair of gloves or an umbrella.

On Sunday he may wander in the parks and look at the statuary, but the doors of the public museums of art are closed to him.

On Sunday Mr. Smith may buy a novel at the news-stand, but the doors of the great libraries are closed and bolted to him.

On Sunday he may drive with considerable rapidity on the Boulevard, but he may not witness a race.

On Sunday his coachman is permitted to drive him to the church door, and wait on the box till service is over, and after that may drive him to his club, where Mr. de Smyth gets his dinner and his bottle of '64 Hochheimer, but the coachman may not take either wife or sweetheart on Sunday to a grove where there are music and beer.

On Sunday he may buy a good dinner either at his club or at a hotel, but the grocers are forbidden, under heavy penalties, to sell to him the wherewithal to make a Sunday dinner at home.

On Sunday he may look at the panorama in 59th street, but the sight of a pantomime in 14th street is debarred him.

On Sunday he may see stereoscopic illustrations thrown on canvas at the Grand Opera House, corner of 23d street and 8th avenue, but he is not allowed to feast his eyes at the pictures in the American Museum, corner of 63d street and 8th avenue.

On Sunday he may hear the blare of trumpets and the music of Cappa's band at the head of a funeral parade, but itinerant musicians with the best of intentions and wind are not allowed to play for him on this same Sunday.

Strange, isn't it?

And if I were a philosopher I might descant on the howness of the why, but as I am not, I simply state the facts.

In London a scholar translates the "Arabian Nights," expurgating nothing, which makes it a very interesting book.

The scholar is thought to hav done a scholarly and meritorious work.

In New Jersey a man sells another unabridged classic called "The Heptameron," and now languishes in state prison for doing it.

If I were a philosopher, enjoying the whisperings of the winds through the leaves in the park, and listening to the twitter of the birds in the branches, and enjoying the way in which the bold zephyrs kiss the splashing waters of the fountain as they shoot up into the air, I might dilate on the fact that the bookseller who sold Yale College and Harvard College, the "National," and other libraries, this same "Heptameron" is enjoying the balmy air and splashing fountain, and the other et ceteras.

Bolted and barred, the New Jersey prisoner may reflect, with profit, on the fact that the same bookseller is enjoying the above-mentioned et ceteras, together with life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, at the rate of from ten to twenty-five cents a glass, from the sale of unabridged editions of the "Arabian Nights," while he is chewing the cud of reflection in company with musketoes and pollywogs on the New Jersey flats for selling unabridged copies of "The Heptameron."

Strange, isn't it?

Whether the reflection will bring him much comfort is difficult to say, but it certainly will convince him that different results flow from the same act.

When he shakes New Jersey mud from his disgusted heels, and has further calls for "The Heptameron," he can refer inquirers to the libraries which hav it on their shelves, though possibly he may be jailed for his kind direction.

How sorry I am not to be a philosopher!

A Scrap from Australia.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Having been a constant reader of your splendid paper for some time past, I could not resist the temptation to forward you an item of the Freethought cause in this colony. For the Freethought of Australia I predict a glorious future. The Freethought ranks of Sydney, Melbourne, and Brisbane strengthen each month with really astonishing rapidity. Among us are the most indefatigable workers. Mr. Joseph Symes, of Melbourne, is without doubt the Ingersoll of Australia. He works like a veritable Trojan for the noble work of liberty. I fully believe that if Mr. Symes met his death through an accident, the majority of the parsons in Melbourne would dance a can-can of delight. Sydney also has some splendid expounders of liberty, Mr. Collins being a wasp to the long-faced theologians of that place. Dr. Hughes, an eminent scholar, also an M.A. and LL.D., is never happy unless tackling the unfortunate priest.

We hav just achieved a great victory in New South Wales; that is, of placing a rank out-and-out Secularist in the Sydney parliament. Being an able lecturer, and a fearless exponent of liberty, I am positiv he will be an addition to our law-makers.

I view with admiration the independent and thorough republican spirit that is gradually growing in this sunny land, and I predict without hesitation a glorious united state republic for Australia within the next centery. Loyalty here is only lip expression to toady to aristocrats and purple-clad rogues, or to find fat billets and big salaries for cads who are devoid of brains and biceps.

During the last six months there has been a fearful depression, owing solely to the glut of foreign goods upon our market. Trade everywhere is at a stagnation. Men are walking the streets of Sydney content to work for absurdly low salaries (in some cases for bread alone). Unless better legislation is awarded us in the future, Sydney will indeed be in a deplorable state. Such a condition of things in a colony of this description is a standing disgrace. We hav everything that nature can supply, yet we derive no benefit from it.

Although Freethought societies hav such large numbers, orthodoxy reigns, and in a most bigoted, narrow manner. You would scarcely believe that a Roman Catholic paper advocated the assassination of a lecturer during his Victoria campaign. Ministers innumerable, Sunday after Sunday, belie us with their bombastic tirade. It is useless; truth will out.

I am very much pleased with Mr. Putnam's effort on the "New God." It is splendid. I hav shown it to several, who greatly appreciate it. Mr. Peck's Bible or "Christian Absurdities" is a bon bouche. Mr. Dawes's "Has Christianity Benefited Woman?" is also very good. I must now come to a conclusion, and wish American Secularism the success it so justly deserves. SYDNEY L. BRYCE.

A New Rochelle, N. Y., Note.

A comrade who passed through New Rochelle on his pilgrimage hither tells me that he there asked a minister in the street where he could go for a little warmth and quiet comfort, he being both wet and ill, and obliged to walk to New York. The gospel-sharp readily gave him a card with directions to some place where some traveling evangelists—save the mark!—were shaking sinners over hell. He went, and took a seat by the stove. Soon the sky-pilot came to him and besought him to go up in front to the grunting-bench and pray for his lost soul. "No," said he, "I came in here to get warm and be quiet. I am not lost; I am an old soldier on my way to the Home. It is my stomach that is in need, and if you hav any sympathy for me, the best thing for you to do is to giv me a restaurant ticket for a square meal." "I see," said the preacher, "you are a hard case, and I fear you are past grace." Mr. Minister heeded not this poor soldier's prayer to him for what he needed. How, then, shall the preacher hav answered his own prayers for grace?

Shade of Thomas Paine! How long shall such leeches, deadbeats, sponges, and parasites pester the earth with the mockery of mercy and continue to work the paralysis of intelligence—and that, too, when a pandering president calls the suffering soldier who served his country well a "government pauper?"

Soldiers' Home, Va. JOHN P. GUILD.

Stand from Under.

To the thoughtful it cannot escape observation that the present period of the civilized world is in a highly inflammatory state, as if the "day of judgment" was really fast approaching.

New York is said to be the richest city in the world. Fortunes are not now counted upon as of old, as a competence for old age, of fifty, sixty, or ninety thousand dollars, but millions upon millions.

The day of reckoning seems to be approaching, and the question is being asked by the workingmen and thinkers, How hav all these millions been aggregated, and found comparativly in the hands of a few? It is evident it has not been the accumulation of honest labor or handicraft. Society is divided naturally into few classes—the farmer, the mechanic, the shop-keepers, pedlers, and schemers. Hence it is seriously asked, How comes this vast inequality of wealth?—this vast inequality of luxury and ostentation on the one side, and abject poverty and starvation on the other? Verily, the "day of judgment" is fast upon us. The day of reckoning is fast approaching, and when it does arrive, sad may be the attitude of one of those unfeeling aristocrats, caught, as it were, with a stolen sheep on his back.

As in the bull-fights in Italy the incensing red flag of tantalization to the too passiv bull arouses the animal to fight, even so the wealth of these bloated schemers is flaunted before the workingman, placing him in a degrading position of subserviency.

It is too true that poverty, ignorance, and muscle are apt to be companions, as much as wealth, pedantry, clerical pride, ostentation, and impudent assumption, and they are fast coming to an issue, and heaven only knows the result. Therefore the writer advises, Stand from under, for when nature's thunderbolt explodes, we may get JESSY.

Hidden Dangers Unearthed by The Truth Seeker.

From the Jewish Times.

A careful and most valuable compilation of the sectarian enactments in the various states and territories appears in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1887, and was specially compiled for that periodical by a well-known New York lawyer. The great labor expended in searching out these Sunday, Oath, and Blasphemy laws was labor well spent, for they teach us that religious fanaticism and intolerance injected into politics hav in a great measure united church and state. There is not one of these enactments that may not on any day be invoked against citizens who do not profess the Christian religion. The Adventists, Jews, Agnostics, and the great body of Rationalists at large hav not the "equal rights" guaranteed by the Constitution that Christians hav. There are several states in the Union in which an Agnostic cannot testify in court on account of his religious or non-religious opinions, and this though he might be a man of the purest morals and the loftiest intellect. There are states in which Jews and Adventists are fined if they violate the Sunday laws, and in Arkansas, in the case of the Adventists, persecution preceded the fine. This is a gross violation of Constitutional rights.

In that extraordinary romance, "The Man Who Laughs," the author shows that in England there are thousands of laws yet unrepealed and lying dormant which if enforced would make that country one of the most despotic on earth. They are hidden dangers which may at any time be invoked to the terror of the people. In some of our own states, notably so in Delaware and New Jersey, there are also hidden dangers which, if put into effect, would make both states petty ecclesiastical despotisms.

Concerning Comstock.

From Pomeroy's Democrat.

Anthony Comstock, a crank who by some inscrutable performance of providence and class legislation is permitted to ply his vocation as an agent for the suppression of vice, is one of the most flagrant and determined offenders of law and public decency there is to be found in this country.

There is not a state prison within the confines of the United States that has not on its criminal list men who in all of honesty, integrity, morality, and sympathy with that which is good, are not better types of manhood and mankind than is Anthony Comstock. Years ago this man, who is put before the world as a Christian example, is charged with swindling people in the United States by advertising that for a certain sum of money he would send to them books containing matter which people would not care to read in public or before their families; thus he excited a prurient curiosity, and received orders and money, for which he sent cheap copies of the Bible.

This he considered a good joke, especially as it brought money to his pocket; at least this is common report, and we believe has several times been proven against him. Then he uses names other than his own. For years he has been assuming names and writing to the weak-minded, as he could obtain their post-office addresses, urging them to send for some contraband article, or has forged or used fictitious names of persons for the purpose of ordering from dealers in contraband goods, and the articles to be sent to his forged address, so that he could proceed against such persons as an agent of the law.

Of all the detectivs ever engaged in the United States there never was a more contemptible, sneaking, dishonest, and dishonorable one, or one who stoops to more dishonest means than does Anthony Comstock, allowing the editor of this paper to be a judge of such matters.

In his attacks upon persons who are engaged in that which may be called demoralization of public sentiment, he is careful only to pick up the weak, the defenseless, those who are poor, or against whom some prejudice has come to exist. He dare not arrest any man, or interfere with any corporation of strength, any more than a coward dare tackle a man who is his superior. Yet he poses as an excellent public officer, and as a devout Christian. God save the mark!

In the Hoffman House of this city are several very fine paintings, generally considered works of art. Not long since the publisher of a newspaper in this city, with no thought or intent of violating the law of the land or of public decency, obtained permission to hav one of these pictures in the hotel above alluded to copied by the engraving process, and last week, when sending his papers with this copy of the celebrated picture therein, was waited upon by Comstock, who, without any warrant or authority of law, proceeded there with his minions to take possession of this edition of the paper, tear out that portion of it containing the pictures, destroy the same, and them leave the premises. Action at law will be brought against Comstock for trespass and destruction of property, when in fact a club should hav been brought against his head with such force as to hav deprived him of his commission. For the sake of argument we will assume the pictures, as presented in the newspaper, to hav been of the lewd or suggestiv character, but they were not.

Walk along Broadway any pleasant afternoon and you will see women dressed in the most suggestiv manner, and will see hundreds of men standing on the sidewalk to gaze upon them; then go take a drink, and after that spend the evening in some house of ill-fame. Against these ordinary characters or the places visited by those whose thoughts are fired by such suggestiv dressing, Anthony Comstock lifts no hand, nor does the society he is the agent of lift its voice against them or their ways.

In the hotel hangs this picture visited by thousands and thousands of persons each year, and yet Anthony Comstock dare not walk into that hotel and lay his hand upon the picture.

Were he to do so, his head would probably be cracked as fine as ice used for cooling champagne, should he ever attempt to interfere with the property of a man of wealth and power.

Cromwell, the celebrated artist, every Sunday night at the Grand Opera House, corner of Eighth avenue and Twenty-third street, exhibits pictures larger than life, representing nude men and women.

They are copies of works of art. Thousands and tens of thousands of the best citizens of the country attend these lectures in order to behold what art has accomplished.

Anthony Comstock dare not go into the Grand Opera House and seize the pictures belonging to Professor Cromwell thus presented, but should some poor devil of a printer photograph or engrave copies of any of these nude pictures, and offer them as copies of works of art, Anthony Comstock pounces upon such person struggling to obtain an honest livelihood, nor lets up until the court has discharged the so-called offender, and reprimanded the insulting and meddlesome agent, as is done in the majority of cases where arrests are made at the instigation of this religious ass, who is doing more to bring morality into disrepute than is being done by all of those who are engaged in selling that which one law declares to be immoral and another law declares to be pure. It is about time that the legislature of this state took this matter in hand, and repealed all of the laws operating in this state in which Anthony Comstock or his society thus proceeds to an interference with the private rights of honest, well-meaning citizens.

There are scores and scores of places in this city where men and women meet for the most immoral purposes; where gambling and deliberate robbery are carried on, but the door-keepers of these places are generally men of courage, so that Anthony Comstock and his assistants never care to enter them, or even to look at them as they pass by.

Some of these days the agent for the suppression of vice will mysteriously disappear, and no trouble will be taken to find him. While he is a large, well-dressed, portly, Christian gentleman in the estimation of a few, in the opinion of the many, in which opinion Pomeroy's Democrat concurs, he is a dirty, cowardly crank, who delights in leading the weak into ways of wickedness, then, for the so-called glory of God and Comstock, robbing them of what they hav, and breaking the hearts of their relativs.

A Shocking Outbreak.

From the Milwaukee Sentinel.

There are cities in which preachers are perturbed concerning the Sunday pleasures of the populace, and even raise their voices against Sunday newspapers. Mostly, the populace goes on in its accustomed Sunday ways, indifferent to appeals and scoldings; and mostly the Sunday newspapers are respectful toward the preachers, hurling back no contumelious stone. But there is a painful exception in the last respect in Cincinnati. Goaded out of the attitude of calm endurance which a quiet conscience sustains in the case of the Sunday newspaper, the Commercial Gazette let fly at a $4,000 preacher who hurls the Sunday commandment toward all offenders.

We are in a measure shocked to find that newspaper reciting many things concerning the ways of the average $4,000 preacher. Among others, that he has, in addition to his salary, a handsome furnished parsonage free of rent—of many rooms, on a good street, with good ventilation, good furniture, water, gas, and other modern conveniences, and all the necessaries and many of the luxuries and elegances of living; good feeding in continual variety, in which the temptation and indulgence of appetite is more considered than the necessities of sustenance or that plain, self-denying physiological living which promotes the health of body and brain; he is free in the indulgence of another of the appetites which tend to excess and in which excess is physical and mental destruction. Sickness does not stop his $4,000 salary; also, it goes on when he takes his vacation at a summer resort to recover from his exhaustiv brain-work and to brace up his overworked digestiv organs. At the summer pleasure resort he finds special reduced rates for preachers, and the interstate commerce law makes an exclusiv reservation to him of the railroad favors which it prohibits to all other persons. Fees for weddings and funerals and christenings and various gifts add to his income. Compared with the mental work done by leading lawyers, judges, and journalists, his pulpit deliverances are not an excessiv strain.

It is painful to draw further from the tirade of the offensiv Cincinnati paper, but we must. Thus it continues: On the Sunday morning he eats a warm breakfast, for the cooking of which on the Sabbath the law of Moses would put the whole family to death; in a Sunday-cooked dinner of much richness and variety, he takes compensation for his work by an indulgence of appetite which is prone to exceed the limits of his physical, mental, and spiritual welfare; a supper follows the afternoon inertia of fulness, with some delicacy freshly cooked to stimulate the jaded palate. "All that is necessary to healthy nourishment could be cooked the day before, as the Sabbath law commanded. In the three cooked meals for his indulgence of the pleasure of eating beyond the actual necessities, he has thrice done that which the seventh-day Sabbath commandment made a mortal sin, for which it stoned the whole household to death." Continues this impertinent journal: "In comparison with the mass he has, in all days of the week and on Sunday, an exceptional share of enjoyment of what the scripture calls 'the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life.'" Then follows a comparison of the condition of the wage-worker to whom this preacher applies for Sunday the seventh-day Sabbath commandment.

But no more of this. The Commercial Gazette should be ashamed of itself.

That Suppressed Conference Report.

From Secular Thought.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has got hold of a good thing, and it can be trusted for making the most of it. A correspondent of that paper sends from Philadelphia a transcript of the Rev. Dr. Jones's report to the chairman of a church conference on the state of religion, the true condition and prospects of the church generally in regard to vitals, godliness, and sound doctrin, the inroads which Infidelity has made upon the faith of the people, etc., in the Eastern states. The report is indeed an extraordinary document, and if trustworthy—and no doubt it is—the publication of it ought to make a sensation. It is no wonder that the conference did not see fit to authorize the publication of the report themselvs. There were altogether too many damaging confessions made for the report to be palatable, and so they ordered it to be laid aside in the mean time. But all the same, it got into the hands of the Philistines.

Dr. Jones finds a deplorable state of affairs in the church. Everything is out of joint. The hynology is "namby-pamby;" the sermonizing provocativ of "inanity and listlessness;" the doctrin of eternal retribution for sin has become a mere "scare-crow in a field of corn." Redemption by the blood of Christ, and sanctification by the holy spirit, are "not believed in by one in a hundred of the clergy under forty years of age." Family worship has gencrally been given up; baptism of infants is so seldom seen in church that a person who examins the records would "suppose that all the mothers of Israel had been stricken with barrenness." The weekly prayer-meetings are in a "most discouraging condition," "and in a majority of instances a more sleepy, perfunctory, and dreary performance you could scarcely conceive of." He has some strong strictures upon the intellectual caliber of the students in seminaries. They are, as a rule, "not fitted either by ability, education, or manners to meet the necessities of the time." The charity training of the average student, the reverend doctor caustically says, "begun when a youth is taken from the shop or the plow-tail, and continued as it is for years, robs him of his manhood, self-respect, and spirit of independence, and makes him a mere truckling slave and parasite." The literature which the people comprising the congregations read "is steeped in Infidelity in its most insidious forms." If the reverend doctor's facts are sound, Secularists can complacently look on for a few more years and their doctrins will be espoused by all men. Christianity, as a living religion, affecting the lives of men, has sunk below the horizon. But then, the doctor did not come to Canada—he would find the church lively enough here.

Very Cheap Pamphlets.

We hav on hand a large number of the following of Colonel Ingersoll's pamphlets, which will be disposed of at cost, as follows: "Ingersoll Catechised: His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the Editor of the San Franciscan;" singly, 3 cents; per dozen, 30 cents; per hundred, $2.

"Orthodoxy," a lecture, fifty-four closely printed large 12mo pages, 10 cents; fifteen for $1; and $6 per hundred.

"Civil Rights Speech," including the address of Frederick Douglass, fifty-three large octavo pages, singly, 10 cents; fifteen for $1; and $6 per hundred.

We suggest that these be purchased in quantities, and given away to good Christians, and it is with that not unreasonable expectation that the prices hav been placed so low.

Labor's Suicide.

Cardinal Manning, of London, has explained why the condemnation of the Knights of Labor has been removed by the Roman Catholic church. Summarized, the reasons are:

1. Since the formation of the order, the general master workman has been changed, and he is now a faithful Catholic.

2. That the constitution and laws hav also been modified to suit the church.

3. That there is no obligation to secrecy toward a competent ecclesiastical authority even outside of the confessional.

4. That there is now no hostility toward the church in the order.

5. That a large proportion of the membership of the order are faithful, practicing Catholics.

These reasons speak well for the sharpness of the managers of the church in remodeling an organization which as first inaugurated was inimical to ecclesiastical influence. When Infidel Stevens was a member of the executiv board of the order, the organization devoted itself to secular work, without regard to what the church thought. Mr. Powderly had less power then than now; but since the Knights came prominently before the public, the latter has succeeded in putting the church shackles upon them. More than any other man is Mr. Powderly responsible for the servility of the order to the church, and for the changes in the constitution. Every new disclosure indicates that our judgment of months ago was accurate. The master workman has sold the order out to Rome.

It appears to us that the Knights hav made an error which will be fatal to them. No army can succeed where half the soldiers traitorously reveal their plans to the enemy. The fight of the Knights is in behalf of labor. Their enemies are the wealthy conservativs of society, and the church is always on the side of wealth and conservatism. Whether the Knights are right or wrong, we are not now considering. But from their standpoint, the policy forced upon them by the intrigues of Powderly with the priests is suicidal. The church will use them for its own purposes, and the purposes of Rome never run parallel with the interests of the lowly and the poor. Power consorts with power; wealth with wealth, and poverty must never expect to find an ally in the palaces of kings and popes. The church makes converts of people that it may liv upon them; the king cares for his subjects that they may fight royalty's battles. Five years will see the Knights of Labor perfectly powerless unless their policy is changed.

A Great Man in Error.

We regret that in his explanation of the reasons which impelled him to decline a reëlection to the presidency of the Manhattan Liberal Club, Mr. T. B. Wakeman should hav made such inaccurate statements of facts as our reporter credits him with. We will not criticise his intention of assuming the mantle of Stephen Pearl Andrews, because before the death of that eminent gentleman he in some sort bequeathed his office to Mr. Wakeman, but we do most decidedly object when Mr. Wakeman states the opposit of truth about an occurrence in which we were concerned. Says the report:

"Liberal affairs [said Mr. Wakeman] were in the condition of the business of a grocer he knew who shut up his store in order to collect and square up accounts. Liberalism should go into liquidation. This made it necessary for Mr. Wakeman to follow the example of Colonel Ingersoll and withdraw, and he believed it to be the duty of all who hav been prominent in Liberal affairs to step down and out until some important question calls them to the front again. 'They should stand aside,' said the speaker, 'until the Liberals of the country find out that their proper position is the one of Leland and myself. Every step that organization has taken since we left the head of the League has been downward toward its destruction, and Liberalism as an organized power has grown less and less.' Mr. Wakeman added that he prophesied this result at the time the Liberals turned him out of office as president of the League."

First. We are not aware that Liberalism is bankrupt, and if it owes Mr. Wakeman anything he should mention the amount. So far as we know, whatever services Mr. Wakeman has rendered Liberalism hav been paid for in cash.

Second. The illustrious man from whose name Mr. Wakeman thought to derive a reflected light has not "withdrawn" in any such sense as Mr. Wakeman's words imply. Those who make statements concerning others' purposes should be sure of their ground.

Third. Mr. Wakeman's assertions regarding the League are remarkably erroneous. He puts himself in the position of a man wronged by the Liberals of the country, inasmuch as they differed from himself and Mr. Leland. Ordinary folks, conversant with the facts, will fail to see where the injury to Mr. Wakeman has been done by so disagreeing, and we deny emphatically that Mr. Wakeman was turned out of the League. In Man of April 19, 1884, Messrs. Wakeman and Leland positivly refused to longer hold official connection with the League. Their words were as follows:

"NEW HANDS AT THE HELM.

"In a late number of Man the Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa., said:

"'There are men in the land who are not identified either with the Liberal League or its opponents, and who, if they would invite a national convention to meet, might, from their high character, close up our ranks.'

"In a recent Index we read that its editors and 'thousands of Liberals' decline to work with the National Liberal League on account of the demand for a repeal of the Comstock United States postal laws, passed as a resolve at the later Congresses of the League.

"There is nothing so desirable as unity and coöperation among Liberals for the purpose of defense, propaganda, and constructiv effect upon society politically and socially.

"The above intimation reminds us of the propriety of timely notice that the editors of Man will not be candidates for any office of the League at the next Congress. They and Man and the New York Liberal Publishing Company think it best that a new deal should be then made so that, if possible, the elements referred to by Mr. Bradford and the Index should be brought forward and harmonized with the League. This object we announced previous to the last Congress, but because it was not stated decisivly in time, the present officers were unanimously reëlected, and in such a way and at such a time that they could not decline without endangering the safety of the League.

"NOW WE GIV AMPLE NOTICE. There should be in our columns, and in the Liberal press generally, friendly suggestions as to our successors, so that the League may make the wisest possible selections. Every League and Liberal society of any kind in the country should be represented at the next Congress, whether they hav been able to agree with the course of the League or not. There will be the amplest opportunity for the realization of Mr. Bradford's suggestion by having the Liberals who hav not acted with the League join in a call of their own to meet in a free, uncommitted, and common Congress, to select new officers and inaugurate a new policy adapted to present conditions and issues.

"We take this course: (1) Because we fear that past issues and differences cannot be removed from the minds of many Liberals except by a decided change of the personnel of the management of the League, and we would not stand in the way of its unity and welfare a moment by reason of past issues. (2) Then again, as we explained in our last paper, the Comstock issues which hav been a cause of difference hav been largely tried out, and their right decision can be perhaps better secured without giving to them what seems to many exceptional prominence. (3) Man could and would still advocate organization and the principles of the League, but no longer in any official or semi-official way.

"Now, let all those who believe in any kind of organization or coöperation of Liberal people in the United States consider who, as president and secretary, would best further that purpose. And whoever may be selected shall hav our hearty support. T. B. W. AND T. C. L."

The paper, Man, was the organ of the League, Mr. Wakeman chief editor, and Mr. Leland the office editor. If they desired to hav the League and the Liberals of the country take the position held by them, why did they resign their offices? Was their refusal to hold office insincere, and but a feeble and unwilling putting away of a crown they still desired to wear? We certainly gave them credit for honesty, and still believe Mr. Leland, at least, meant what he said. The fact of the matter was, the League had lost all vitality, Man was not supported by the Liberals throughout the country, and Mr. Wakeman was enabled to print it only by the generosity of two wealthy gentlemen of New York. People were displeased with the policy of the officers—hitching Ben Butlerism, and Socialism, and what not to the League platform—and a wide dissatisfaction was felt at just those official positions taken by Mr. Wakeman which he says now must be retaken or the League (now the American Secular Union) will die. It looks very much as though Mr. Wakeman really meant, Think as I do, and do as I say, or you cannot succeed; and he certainly did not consider the facts when he said that since his resignation (not his dismissal) the League had retrograded. The Liberals of the country are too familiar with the events subsequent to that period to need a specific denial of that statement.

We are sorry, indeed, to hav to pen these words, and we forbear to say more. The ex-president of the Liberal Club should remember this: Freethinkers do not blindly follow any one, however eminent, and our gifted leaders should not be angry and sulk if personal disciples are not readily found in our ranks.

The Hebrews and the Sunday Law.

The Hebrews of this city labor under a heavy disadvantage since Mayor Hewitt has decided that the weekly holiday rests upon secular and not sacred grounds, for if they keep their religious day they lose one day's business more than their Christian competitors. The Saturday half-holiday bill, which now awaits the governor's signature, is therefore welcomed by them as putting things upon a more equal footing. The rabbis are not slow of comprehension, either, and they fondly hope that the Saturday half-holiday may be the means of grace to many Hebrews who now attend to business on the last day of the week, instead of going to the synagogs. The rabbinical conference held last week discussed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this conference of Jewish ministers welcomes the proposed Saturday half-holiday law as a useful and timely measure, both for the people at large and for the religious welfare of our community, and hopes that the Jewish community will make it the means of fully regaining and restoring the proper sanctity and esteem of the Biblical Sabbath."

The conference also condemned the present Sunday law, as interpreted by the authorities, which compels the Jewish shopkeepers who observe their own day of worship to keep Sunday also.

We are glad the sects are quarreling over this matter, for thereby they may obtain sufficient wisdom to see the plain way out of the trouble by making Sunday a blank day so far as the legality of doing business is concerned, but repealing all penalties for its non-observance. If shopmen want to keep their stores open, let them. If nobody buys, they would soon close. But if Sunday observance is to be enforced by law, we see no reason why the Jews should be specially favored.

Brave Minister, Good Young Men!

The Christian Advocate, in its last week's issue, has this:

"In one of the cities of Ohio an Infidel club brought Charles Watts, called 'the Ingersoll of England,' to lecture against Christianity. To forestall his influence as much as possible, the pastor of our church in that place, the Rev. J. R. Keys, prepared and printed with his own hands a quantity of leaflets containing the sayings of Washington, Grant, Gladstone, and Stanley, the African explorer, and had them distributed in the churches and Sunday-schools on the Sunday before the lecture. On the night of the lecture two young men stood at the entrance of the hall in which the lecture was delivered, and gave a leaflet to each person who entered, including the lecturer himself. The quotations were so appropriate that we print them this week in the Home Department."

Just to show how imbecil the average Christian is in his "arguments" with Infidels, we copy the extracts which are supposed to hav annihilated Mr. Watts and the Infidels of Ohio:

"WASHINGTON.—Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with public and private felicity. Let it be simply asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle."—Farewell Address.

"STANLEY.—What I wanted, and what I hav been endeavoring to ask for the poor African, has been the good offices of Christians, ever since Livingstone taught me during those four months I was with him. In 1871 I went to him as prejudiced as the biggest Atheist in London. I was there away from a worldly world. I saw this solitary old man there, and asked myself, 'Why on earth does he stop here?' For months after we met I found myself listening to him and wondering at the old man carrying out all that was said in the Bible. Little by little his sympathy for others became contagious. Mine was aroused. Seeing his piety, his gentleness, his zeal, his earnestness, and how quietly he went about his business, I was converted by him, although he had not tried to do it."

"GEN. U. S. GRANT.—Hold fast to the Bible as the sheet anchor of our liberties; write its precepts on your hearts, and practice them in your lives. To the influence of this book we are indebted for the progress made in true civilization, and to this we must look as our guide for the future."

"GLADSTONE.—If I am asked, what is the remedy for the deeper sorrows of the human heart—what a man should chiefly look to in his progress through life as the power that is to sustain him under trials, and enable him manfully to confront his afflictions, I must point him to something which, in a well-known hymn, is called 'The old, old story,' told of in an old, old book, and taught with an old, old teaching, which is the greatest and best gift ever given to mankind." —Address to Workingmen.

What do these sayings amount to? Washington was a Deist, and his ideas of religion were not the ideas of the Christian religion. With him religion meant Deism, the simple faith of Thomas Paine, whom the Christians of to-day never tire of slandering with all the malice of fanatics. Washington's sentiments might hav been spoken by a Mohammedan, or a Buddhist, or a Jew, or a disciple of Auguste Comte. It all depends upon what you mean by the word "religion."

Mr. Stanley's opinion is worth just as little as any one's else. He is a paid retainer of a six-by-nine king whose only way of obtaining notoriety is to keep Stanley plunging through African jungles, carrying a Bible in his trunk and a rifle in his hands. And we fail to see in the psychological phenomenon which he calls conversion, any logical proof of the alleged claim that a seditious Hebrew once rose from the dead. Livingstone's piety does not prove that a virgin had a son of the "Holy Ghost;" his gentleness (which some Africans would dispute) is in no wise corroborativ of the miracles of Christ; his zeal is no proof that the world can throw all its sins upon one man, and thousands of men hav been as earnestly wrong as other thousands hav been earnestly right. If he had "carried out all that was said in the Bible," Africa, to-day, instead of a wilderness of savages, would be a wilderness of graves. For the heathen in ancient days received little mercy at the hands of the followers of the Lord.

Grant was a great soldier, and Gladstone is a great statesman, but a country minister knows more about the Bible than Grant did, and what Gladstone knows may be learned in his controversy with Huxley. The trouble with these men is that they credited to the Bible what belongs to secular civilization. They made mistakes, and he who reasons for himself will readily see how. We do not, however, expect that Christians will find it out.

But if the Rev. J. R. Keys had such solicitude for the people of the Ohio town, why did he not go upon the platform with Mr. Watts and prove the historical truth of his faith? Why did he not prove that the Bible is inspired of God, that man was created perfect and fell through the eating of an apple by a woman, that God made a covenant with man whereby through Christ's sufferings he might escape a supposititious hell and gain a supposititious heaven? Why did he not show that the priests are not humbugging the people with their pretension of holiness and sanctity? Mr. Watts, we guarantee, would hav afforded him the opportunity to exhibit his personal bravery in confuting the Infidel, and the good young men would hav been spared the arduous duty of pedling tracts.

But perhaps Mr. Keys prefers to answer the Infidel when the Infidel is hundreds of miles away. Most ministers do.

Honest Orders.

The bishop of Prince Edward's Island is not quite as politic a priest as is Mr. Corrigan, of this city, but his plainer speaking will enable Americans to see just what the Romish hierarchy is driving at. The bishop has issued a circular to the clergy of his diocese, of which the subjoined is the concluding portion:

"Scandals hav lately arisen which are a source of regret to every true Catholic heart, and these scandals are materially increased by the approbation and praise of a certain press, styled Catholic, which openly professes its total disregard for legitimate authority, and boldly proclaims its adherence to the perverse doctrin of a new socialism.

"We call your attention to a paper styled the Catholic Herald, published in New York, which has a large circulation among the Catholics of this province.

"We earnestly exhort you to discountenance the doctrin and aims of this production, and to stop the diffusion thereof among your faithful parishioners. Our reasons are cogent and pressing. Catholics who are loyal to their church should cheerfully submit to her authority when legitimately exercised.

"In a late issue (Feb. 12, 1887) of the above-mentioned paper is contained the following declaration: 'We protest most emphatically against any attempt to extend any ecclesiastical authority into the sphere of politics, and, while cheerfully yielding full obedience to the authorities of the church in matters of religion, we emphatically deny the right of the pope, or propaganda, or archbishop to prescribe for Roman Catholics, lay or cleric.'

"Is that a Catholic utterance? Are we to believe that the church cannot exercise her influence in politics when the highest interests of morality are involved? We should then circumscribe her power and deny her mission.

"Again, this paper advocates doctrins anent private ownership of land which are opposed to truth and sanctioned by no Catholic theologian. The teachings of great minds are falsely interpreted to suit these vain theories. St. Thomas, to the great surprise of all who hav read and understood him, is shown to hav been the precursor of Henry George.

"Finally, this paper treats high ecclesiastical officials without a shadow of respect; publishes effusions in which princes of the church are spoken of as if they were ward politicians, and thereby excites the prejudices and passions of a misguided public. These reasons, we think, are sufficient to move you to prompt action.

"Advise your people to abandon this publication, the pernicious influence of which cannot but be injurious to them. I remain, reverend dear sir, faithfully yours in Christ,

"PETER MCINTYRE, bishop of Charlottetown."

The "highest interest of morality" with Roman Catholics is the highest interest of their power and pockets. "And as it was in the beginning," so it "is now and ever shall be; world without end. The Lord's name be praised!"

WE hav been supplied with reports of the lecture of George Sheridan at Washington, purporting to be an annihilation of Colonel Ingersoll and his teaching. To the senders of the reports we return thanks, and hope that they and others will continue to forward accounts of whatever occurs that is of interest to Freethinkers. We regret, however, that Mr. Sheridan is so mendacious and ignorant that he is not a foeman worthy of even our steel pen. We will not descend to the level of a lecturer who speaks of Colonel Ingersoll thus:

"He is mad clear through—mad from the polished top of his intellectual dome to the soles of his Infidel feet with Christians and Christianity. He is the assailant of the sublimest teachings of philosophy, of poetry, and of science. He declines to meet men competent to discuss the questions with him. In fact, he never met but one really able man—the late Judge Black—and then the instant he felt the steel ran from the field."

The church folks hav a standing offer of reward in the shape of door fees for any one who will abuse Colonel Ingersoll. Mr. Sheridan obtained and earned his money, and the heirs of Judge Black ought to increase the reward for his attempt to preserve that individual's reputation. Mr. Black was the one who declined to continue the controversy, giving as his reason that the editor of the North American Review would not hold Colonel Ingersoll's second article until he could reply. The editor then cast about for some other distinguished Christian who would reply, but found none willing except Mr. Fisher, and he would do it only on condition that Colonel Ingersoll should not reply to him. And Colonel Ingersoll never has!

THE Freethinkers of Manchester, England, hav been obliged to discontinue their usual discussions after a Sunday lecture. Recently Mr. Bradlaugh spoke for the Manchester society, and the "Lord's Day Observance Society" served him with a notice that the society intended to prosecute him and the proprietor of the hall. The lectures were clearly legal, but if discussion followed, it constituted "keeping a disorderly house," and the lecturer would be liable to imprisonment not exceeding two years. Mr. Bradlaugh explained that his hands were at present too full of other work to contest the matter. The London Freethinker says: "Mr. Bradlaugh is, of course, the best judge of his own business, and he was probably right in declining the challenge when he had no time to fight. But if the bigots keep up their little game, he or somebody will hav to fight. The Freethought party cannot allow discussion to be stifled in this way. The Melbourne bigots tried to trip Mr. Symes in this fashion, but he managed to beat them. He took the money at the door himself, and then went on the platform and delivered the lecture. The prosecution followed, Joseph manfully defended himself, and came out of the contest with flying colors." Mr. Foote, the editor of the Freethinker, is a good fighter as well as lecturer, and he may deem it wise to go to Manchester and make a test case.

THE late Catherine Wolfe, of this city, was a very pious and wealthy lady. Just before her decease she gave the Episcopalians money enough to purchase and fit up a large building on Lafayette place, just opposit the store of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be used as a mission headquarters and tract repository. The building was a fine brick structure of some fifty feet frontage, with a spacious door and stoop, but it wasn't good enough for the finicky Episcopalians to peddle tracts from, and they pulled the front down and are replacing it with white marble, fretted and carved into arches and images, something after the style of the Grace church chapel which blocks Eleventh street from Fourth avenue to Broadway. It will be a great contrast to the modest quarters of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and would seem at first to be a great waste of money. But a second consideration of the subject convinces one that the money spent among the marble cutters and mechanics will do hundreds of times more good than if put into tracts, which teach, in a sickly and childish way, the grossest superstition. The Episcopalians are not very enthusiastic propagandists, and the money of the late Mrs. Wolfe will probably not shift to any noticeable extent the orbit of our little planet.

MR. HESTON has summed up the situation in Germany in his picture this week with keen judgment. The people of Germany are prostrate under the feet of Leo XIII., Bismarck, and the latter's employers, Kaiser William and "Unser Fritz," the heir to the throne. Of the lot, Fritz is the best, but most helpless. The pope would swap his soul, if he has one, for power. William and Bismarck will do anything to preserve the imperial family. The people to them are pawns on a chess-board, to be kept or slaughtered, as will best protect the kings, the queens, the bishops, and the knights. As a glorious privilege, they are allowed to pay the expenses of the tournament.

MR. C. B. REYNOLDS will be tried for blasphemy at Morristown, N. J., at the term of court which began May 3d, the day THE TRUTH SEEKER went to press, so we are unable to report further concerning the anachronistic affair until next week. It is almost impossible to convince oneself that this indictment and coming trial are not acts in some preposterous farce, but we hav seen the court-house and jail in Morristown, seen the judges upon the bench, a jury in the box, and know the court is real. Nevertheless, it seems like a dream.

L. K. WASHBURN lectured last Sunday evening before the Society of Humanity, 28 Lafayette place, to a well-pleased audience. Next Sunday evening Mr. Washburn speaks again; subject, "Something Beyond." Admission is free, and all are cordially invited.

W. F. JAMIESON is in Colorada; at Longmont, Sunday evening, May 1st, and is invited to Black Hawk. He may lecture in Boulder and Loveland. Address him at Longmont, Col.

THE publishers of Herbert Spencer's "Genesis of Science" send this notice with it: "It is indispensable for the forming of clear ideas as to the real aims of science, its limitations, its validity, its authority, that its rise and development from lowly beginnings to its present commanding position should be clearly understood. The treatment of that subject requires both philosophic insight and wide acquaintance with the methods and results of scientific research, as well as an intimate knowledge of the history of civilization. In no one man now living are these gifts and these attainments so happily combined as in Herbert Spencer, and consequently his account of 'The Genesis of Science' deservedly holds the highest rank among contemporary scientifico-philosophical essays." As soon as we read the work we shall giv it a notice of our own. The publisher is J. Fitzgerald, the price is fifteen cents, and it may be purchased at this office.

Letters from Friends.

TRENTON, TEXAS, April 12, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Please say for general eucouragement that our third happy cyclone struck us the 8th of April.

It is followed by a most uncommon stillness. J. D. Shaw, of the Independent Pulpit, is a power, and he found Freethought here by the hundred, and made more.

Your humble writer takes all the Freethought literature he is able to, and hopes to see the sky cleared of cobwebs.

Fraternally, J. W. BELL.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., April 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Jamieson has just given three lectures in Neligh, a town sixteen miles from here, and he will giv two in Clear Water soon. There are a good many Freethinkers in this section of the country, but they are timid. A few of the boldest of them made arrangements for Mr. Jamieson. I heard one of them say, who wished to get an office, "Oh, it would just kill some of us to get Mr. Jamieson to lecture here." EARLE A. FINCH.

BLOCK, KAN., April 11, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: No squirrel can climb but one branch of a tree at a time; neither can J. E. Remsburg giv but one lecture at a time, but if he didn't deliver his "False Claims" interestingly at the Max school-house, April 8th, then I never saw a squirrel climb a tree at all. Now, I want to say to the Liberals of Kansas that Mr. Remsburg's terms are very low according to the ability of the man, and that no village, city, or school district can afford to do without hearing him. I am glad to know that Kansas has such speakers as he. We all had a nice time at the lecture, and with such men as the Walters, Millers, Arzbergs, Franks, Lowes, and a host of others in the county, we will continue the good work.

W. A. LOWE.

ROCHESTER, MICH., April 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: On first page of THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 16th, after referring to the failure to carry the prohibition amendment in Michigan, comes the following: "The Prohibitionists will hav to try again, consoling themselvs with the reflection that there are some causes to which nothing could be so fatal as success." There! why couldn't we hav thought about that before voting? But, seriously, this proffered "consolation" to the Prohibition class of your readers in our state seems to us an impertinence, bordering on insult, and none the less offensiv because found in one of the ablest, and usually fairest, Freethought journals of the age. And the question occurs, Can you afford it?

WHITE CHURCH, KAN., March 28, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I don't know of one outspoken Infidel this side of Kansas City, Mo. (eight miles). "Jordan is a hard road to travel," but, brothers, I still liv, and if I am spared life and breath they will hear from me during the summer. Yes, I still liv to thank all concerned with the glorious TRUTH SEEKER. Long may she wave! Keep on, Macdonald! keep on, Somerby! Never say die. Who would hav thought that the mantle of that grand, good old man, D. M. Bennett, would hav fallen on such worthy shoulders? Remember me to Brother Putnam, Si Slokum, Peck, and all of the correspondents of your paper. Don't forget Watson Heston—he's a brick. I hav had many a hearty laugh over his pictures. Oh! how I do wish I had the dollar or more to send C. B. Reynolds! And now may the powers bless you all, and believe me to be, Yours for the right,

I. P. MARTIN, aged 80 yrs. 3 mo.

SUNSET, TEXAS, April 5, 1887.

DEAR OLD TRUTH SEEKER: I feel as if I could not well liv without THE TRUTH SEEKER, and if I were able would hav more of your books. How I wish I were rich! How many treats I would giv the old woman! I get my paper on Monday. I hav received and read April the 2d. I lend my papers around among saints and sinners alike, and can see little sparks of light here and there that will soon be fanned to a flame. One gentleman took the paper out of my hand a few days ago, looked over it a moment, passed it back, and said he did not like the paper or them that read it. I told him I was very happy to be able to distinguish friends from foes. I will pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I can; then shall let you know when you can stop my paper, not the paper, for I want others to read it when I cannot pay for it any longer. In this I will send fifty cents for "Men, Women, and Gods," by Miss Gardener. HARRIET DAVIS.

WATERVILLE, MINN., April 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The spirit moveth me at sundry times and divers places to let your readers know that state legislatures sometimes pass good laws, and that Minnesota had one passed last winter. There was a good deal of railroad lawmaking done during the last session, and one of the new laws s almost an exact copy of the Interstate Commerce bill, which as your readers all know allows all roads to discrimnate in favor of the sky-pilots by selling them half-fare ickets. This section of the bill our Solons left out, and in consequence the reverend spongers hav to pay for their rides ust the same as a white man. One of the general ticket and passenger agents of a leading road ordered all the half-fare passes in, and out of the two thousand that were returned, every one was accompanied with a note kicking against the new order of things. We are all feeling bad about it.

The Baptist church here has been whooping it up for the last few weeks, and as a result has taken in about all the weak-minded ones in the place. They baptize them as fast as they catch them, and everybody turns out to see the fun. They hav a sort of pit in one end of the church, lined with sheet-iron, and they stand around it and sing, "Shall we gather at the river?" There isn't a dry eye in town. Well, the other night they were going to perform, and the D.D. had just got his rubber breeches on, and the convict was being prepared for initiation in an adjoining room, and all looked well, when a small dog in the crowd, having nothing else to do, ran up the aisle and jumped in and took a swim, to the great delight of the crowd, who were satisfied that this was the only hard-shell Baptist dog in the world. After the dog was hauled out, the show was postponed. Some of the boys think it was to heat up the tank and skim off the accumulated sins that had been washed away in the "river." So far they hav about twelve new members, counting the dog.

L. ALEXANDER.

TAMPA, FLA., April 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6 for two subscriptions.

I am away down here in Tampa, Florida, in the land of flowers and sunshine, and although we hav not had any Freethought lectures here, there are a great many Liberals; in fact, I think this state would be a good field for a Liberal lecturer. I would like nothing better than something of that kind to come to our town and organize a Liberal club. The churches here are having things their all their own way at present, but I look not far in the future when they will take a back seat in the darkness, or come out and take up the armor of truth and honesty and help fight the demon superstition.

I would part with a great many of my pleasures before I would do without your paper. I am much pleased with the cartoons, and giv much credit to Watson Heston. He is doing his part of the work to spread the gospel of universal mental liberty and dispel the gloom of superstition.

J. H. KINSMAN.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., April 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Yesterday was a big day with Liberals in Philadelphia; it seemed as if the whole city had awoke to a knowledge of the truth, and had come forth to the funeral of theological superstition. The excitement arose from the announcement in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other papers, that Charles Watts would be with us to advocate the claims of "Ancient Philosophy vs. Modern Theology," and "Morality vs. Religion." His efforts were masterly, and the attempts of his opposers reminded me of the furious waves of the ocean rolling and dashing against the massiv rock, and, instead of removing the rock, only discovered their own weakness, and went back murmuring at their own defeat. Mr. Watts has been a favorit in Philadelphia from his first appearance in the city, and still continues such. His labors yesterday deservedly won him fresh laurels for the future.

W. SEYMOUR.

BURLINGTON, KAN., April 10, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Brother J. E. Remsburg delivered a lecture here in Hamilton's Opera House on the evening of the 4th inst. to an audience of about six hundred. He is a fluent and rapid speaker, and clenches his arguments with proof on his subject, "The False Claims of Christianity," which caused quite a riffle among the adherents of old orthodoxy who were present, and one good old Methodist brother was so excited that he spoke audibly, taking exception to the speaker's arguments. But he soon learned that he was not occupying the amen corner in a Methodist revival, and that he would hav to bow to the yoke, if it was contrary to his opinions, for a large majority of those present were opposed to his changing a Liberal lecture into a Methodist revival meeting.

I am gratified that the brother developed some of the undercurrent of Freethought; they take courage when they come to hear the false claims of the church espoused by the speaker. He created such an interest in the cause that the friends hav agreed to engage him for a course of lectures in the near future. You will learn from this that the truth is taking root and bearing fruit in our city of three thousand inhabitants and eight churches. CHRIS. BROWN.

BAVARIA, KAN., April 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We are alive here, for all that the church friends were going to hav something terrible happen on account of Friend Putnam's lecture. It was a very hard dose for them to take, but we cannot see as it affected but one person here, and she took up the cause of her God and made as low and mean an attack on our organization here as her ability and understanding would allow her to do. But we are doing as well as we could with or without her assistance. She wrote to one of our local papers, and Mr. A. K. Mott answered her and made her some propositions for reading and answering, and she failed to accept them, thereby admitting her inability to defend her God when brought before light and reason.

At our last meeting (April 3d) we were entertained with a lecture by Mrs. Flora A. Abbott, of New Cambria, and were well pleased with the lecture, and glad to know we hav some ladies in our ranks who are equal and often better posted than most men in regard to that great book, the Bible. Mrs. Abbott challenged Mrs. Bowden to a debate through our county paper, and the editor accepted and agreed to publish it, but when the time came and the parties were ready for discussion, he refused to publish and refused to giv his reasons for doing so; but members of the white-necktie fraternity were seen very seriously watching him, so the supposition is that he received some advice from them about enlightening the people.

This Mrs. Bowden is the one moved by the spirit of God to interrupt Mr. Putnam when he lectured here. Speaking about Mr. Putnam reminds me that the Christians here admit he is a good runner in a heavy wind when he sees the train he is to leave on pull into the station, although dinner was ready and waiting when he left. Being rather heavy myself, I do not care to run a race with him.

Mrs. Abbott will deliver more lectures here during the summer at our meetings. She is a very interesting lecturer, and friends in this part of the state will do well to giv her a call. T. H. TERRY, Sec. pro tem. Bavaria Sec. Union.

NATIONAL CITY, CAL., April 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, and giv credit on your books for Samuel McHenry, of this place. Mr. McHenry was in the late war, and was unfortunate enough to be wounded. He was shot in the breast. The ball passed through the chest, struck the shoulder-blade, and then glanced toward the shoulder joint, where it is now lodged, and has been for the past twenty years. He has suffered great pain periodically, and at this writing his arm is so paralyzed that he requested me to write you. He is one of our substantial, reliable, and most respected citizens. He, wife, and family are with you heart and soul in your good work, i.e., always ready to accept that which is truthful, pure, and reasonable.

I am very sorry that Mr. Putnam did not form Mr. McHenry's acquaintance while here. I heard Mr. Putnam two nights at San Diego. I pronounce him great, and advise any and all of your readers not to miss him, even if you hav to walk ten miles to hear him. One sentence from Mr. Putnam is worth more than a barrelful of theological hog-wash. The San Diego dailies pronounced Mr. Putnam an orator, scholar, and gentleman, and so do I. He dined with us once; we would like to hav had him stay and make us a visit Perhaps his letter will explain clearly where San Diego and National City are located, also what he thinks about our people, homes, and environments. A. N. BURGESS.

STANTON, NEB., April 9, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed a letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 9th from D. W. Whitney, of Burnett, Neb., in which he states that there ought to be a lecture delivered in most of the towns on the line of the Elkhorn Valley road. I hav the same opinion, and why not form a lecture bureau by all clubbing together? We could hire a lecturer by the month, and hav from one to six lectures in each town along the line. It would not cost us as much as Christians generally pay each year to their pet preacher. We could hav the headquarters at Fremont or Omaha, or any other place along the line. By doing this we would not hav to pay as much for the lectures, and would know when and where they will be given; hav ample time to advertise, hav dodgers printed by the thousands, that would do to scatter in every town where the lectures are to be held, and hav ample time to get all ready for the lecture, something that is very seldom done now. I know what it is to stand all the responsibility for a course of lectures, especially one who has to work every day to make his living, having had some experience, and hav never had as good luck as my friend Whitney. I would like to hear from all the Liberals along the Elkhorn Valley that like the above propositions. I will do all in my power to make a success of it. Hoping that it will meet with the approval of most of my Liberal friends, I am, Yours for Freethought,

PHIL HELMERICK.

ELLSWORTH CITY, KAN., April 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Herein you will find $5. Apply $2.50 on my subscription for this year, and send one copy to Mr. M. R. Brondage, of this city. He is our newly-elected mayor. When I told him of the letter we received from J. E. Remsburg, that he would deliver one lecture for ten dollars, he said: "Why, I would giv that myself if he would deliver one in Ellsworth. Send up the letter, and I will answer it, and see if we can get him here." I did not know he was a Liberal. If we had an organization here, there is no doubt that we should all know each other; and here let me say I would be in favor of a secret organization, for this reason: There are many business men who do not want the church-members to know that they contribute toward Liberal meetings. For instance, my husband had occasion on short notice to try to raise some money to pay for the use of the hall when J. L. Andrew was here one year ago. Some of our business men said: "Don't mention it; it will hurt our business." Another said the church-members had said to him they should not think he would believe as he did, and support such meetings, when he knew it hurt his business, and also knew that he was largely patronized by the churches. By this you can see what cheek Christians hav, and what an iron grip they hold on the people.

SARAH METZLER.

FERNANDINA, FLA., April 10, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I promised a long letter to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to Florida, but at this time can only report progress. I am now in this beautiful town, which is situated on an island two miles wide, being only one and a half miles from the ocean beach. It is the port where all the large steamships of the Clyde and Mallory lines land their passengers and freight coming to Florida from New York. Every outgoing vessel is now crowded with passengers returning North. I am of the opinion that, with all its drawbacks, and Florida has many, there can be found no more lovely scenery or health-giving climate, in the midst of lakes whose clear waters are so delightful to gaze upon. And, as I traveled nearly the entire length of the state, now entranced with the view of a grove of magnolias, from whose limbs hang festoon after festoon of the Spanish moss, or looking in wonder at the beauty of a white heron, a pink curlew, or other representativ of the feathered kingdom, gathering shells on the shore whose beauty words fail to express, while drinking in the perfume of the orange blossoms and flowers innumerable, I could not but regret to know that here, amid all this beauty and grandeur, that noisome, deadly upas-tree, theology, reared its gigantic head, being pampered and fattened by the superabundance of ignorance and superstition that here abound to a greater extent than in any other state. I tried to make an effort to start my paper here, but after being refused by three different offices to publish such a paper, and finding that Freethought in this state was as weak and scattering as that old monster, theology, was strong and dominant, I desisted from any further effort. I am satisfied that the fact of my being an outspoken Freethinker works against me stronger than ever, but I fail not to declare I am a Freethinker. A. C. EVERETT.

NEWPORT, ME., April 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Aunt Debby's report of the dying condition of God's elect is too important to be lost. I shall hail with unspeakable pleasure the next installment of that most intensely interesting paper. Truly, when knowledge takes a step forward, the church and the gods take a step backward.

I inclose $1, which, with fifty cents I sent before, pays for THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months for Frank L. Nason, Newport, Me. And I kindly ask any person who feels for the unfortunate to send to the publishers $1.50 more, which will pay for the paper one year. Brother Nason is a good, true man, an Infidel-Spiritualist, very outspoken against the "sum of all villainies," the Christian fraud, the church. But I should not ask what I hav but for the fact that Mr. Nason is a cripple, cannot lift a cup to his mouth without taking both hands, and has a large family. I am not able to pay what I hav, but I hav done it because I know he prizes THE TRUTH SEEKER very highly, and it would be hard for him to part with it. For his stern refusal to let his children go to a Christian Sabbath-school, he has been called many hard words, such as Christians know well how to use.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

LEONARD, IOWA, March 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed herewith $5, for which you will scnd me the wickedest paper published in America for the next two years.

Why is it that my friends and neighbors say that we Liberals and Infidels are so wicked, when we as a people are becoming more liberal each day? I for myself feel sure that I am not so wicked as I used to be, especially when I call to mind that I used to believe my grandmother's election and reprobation doctriu, on this wise, that she hoped to get to heaven, but if she was sent to the lowest hell, she would be as much to the glory of God as the highest seraph in heaven. Or when I believed what old Deacon Whitlach preached to me, the first sermon I ever heard, in part as follows: "My dear Christian friends, I tell you there are children in hell that are not a span long. They tell you it is not fire that they burn in in hell, but I tell you it is just such fire as is in that stove," pointing to the stove at my side. I remember the shudder that I made when I looked around at the red stove. This was some fifty years since. We old ones do not hear such inspiration nowadays. We must be departing from our first love. God save us! We, the faithful, should remember Watson Heston in our devotions, and giv him a boom occasionally. DANIEL LEONARD.

BRAIDENTOWN, FLA., April 17, 1887.

KIND SIRS: Please insert this acknowledgment, as I received a donation from a kind friend in Philadelphia. Thanks—many thanks. I was getting very much out of heart, as I hav been very poorly the last week.

The Brooklyn lady who helped me has given me great pleasure, as I got some hens, and hav some young chicks to attend. I hope they will be of some help to me.

I received the donation from Mr. C. Eckhard, also from S. S. Chase, Fall River, and F. C. M., Philadelphia. Thanks —many thanks to the senders. I hope a few more will respond, so I can get my hut covered.

Heartfelt joy at the papers sent, as I hav to often rest on the bed; so I can read, as I cannot do anything else, which is a great pleasure.

I liv near old lady Atzeroth, the one that raised coffee a few years ago. She brought work for me several times. I went to see her, but she had gone across the river. Her old coffee-trees were very much injured, if not killed, by the freeze we had on the 11th of Jan., 1886. Thc oranges are a failure here this year. A splendid growth of limbs, perhaps, will make up next year. The was a little ice and frost away from the river; none with me this winter.

Received a phonetic package from Burnz & Co., 24 Clinton Place, New York.

Thanks to all, and good wishes. I do not know that I shall want very long. MRS. E. J. SNODGRASS.

NEW GLASGOW, N. S., April 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I mail you the Halifax Morning Chronicle, in which you will find an account of the debate on the Nova Scotia Sunday bill in the house of Assembly in Halifax.

This bill was framed and introduced for the express purpose of stopping the running of street cars on Sunday, although it forbids nearly everything except going to church. It passed the first and second reading by a majority of two, nineteen voting for, and seventeen against. It was then referred to a committee for amendment. This committee altered it considerable, and left the street cars out altogether, and it is receiving a pretty rough handling in the House. If they keep on removing its clauses (claws), it will be a very harmless affair. The bill is only advocated outside of parliament by a few Presbyterian clergymen and the religious press. The best citizens of Halifax are opposed to it, as are also all the secular papers, which hav opened their columns for discussion of the question. The best members in the House are opposed to it, and some of them, especially the Hon. Mr. Longley (attorney-general), hav uttered words in behalf of civil and religious liberty that I did not think a public man in Nova Scotia would hav courage to utter.

Fearing that possibly you may hav misunderstood my remarks about the Liberal papers giving space to Christians, I wish to say that I am more than pleased with the manner in which you conduct THE TRUTH SEEKER. In fact, everything you hav done since I hav read your paper has had my unqualified approval; and when I say that I am pleased with Mr. Horace Seaver's management of the Investigator, it is scarcely doing justice to my feelings in that respect. I love that noble, kind, and patient old gentleman, who for so many years has fought the good fight of freedom.

Yours truly, F. M. BORDEN.

WILBER, NEB., April 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Friday of last week was a cold day for the Rev. Clark Braden. He and the Rev. L. L. Luce hav been making Wilber their headquarters for settling a little unpleasantness existing between them for the past two or three years. First, Rev. Luce had Rev. Braden arrested for selling mortgaged property. Then Rev. Braden had Rev. Luce arrested for perjury. Then Rev. Luce, in a civil suit, obtained judgment against Rev. Braden for about $150, and seized Rev. Braden's grip-sack, or trunk, containing some old clothes, boots, and Braden's lectures, all of which were sold at sheriff's sale. Then Rev. Braden, on the oath of a Christian minister, had another warrant issued, and sent the sheriff all the way to Pennsylvania and had Rev. Luce again arrested for perjury. He was tried and acquitted, and at the instance of Rev. Luce the sheriff seized Braden's overcoat to apply on aforesaid judgment; and Braden failed to prove himself a Christian by not even offering to giv his other coat also.

By way of offset for our many afflictions of clerical tramps we hav had seven sound, solid lectures; three by the unanswerable Remsburg, and four by the logical Jamieson—all to large and appreciativ audiences. Inclosed find three dollars to apply on subscription, with many thanks for past indulgence. H. KILGORE.

STARK, FLA., April 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office money order for $5 for two subscriptions.

In regard to the Walker-Harman marriage for so many moons, like the wild Indians of the West, it seems to me you hav taken more notice of that foolish transaction than will please most of your readers; and as to the laws of Kansas, which Mr. Walker finds so much fault with, he would hav been jailed in any other state for the same offense. In your paper of the 16th inst. you say there are too many Christians in Kansas to make the abolition of law a perfectly safe step. Why did you not say there were too many Liberals to make it a safe step. I moved with my wife and family the fall of 1865 from the great empire state of New York to Cloud county, in the notorious state of Kansas, and resided there seventeen years, or till the fall of 1882, and hav lived here in Florida since. I believe in liberty, and if there is such a thing as a genuin Liberal, I am one. As to the marriage law of Kansas Mr. E. C. Walker's Communistic theory would put us back again thousands of years to old Abraham's times and doings. There are many Liberals in Kansas in proportion to population, and better society in any state is hard to find. The people are prosperous and happy, the laws are humane and for the benefit of the poorer classes. They hav the best form of common school laws in the United States of America, and they may thank the Liberal element for it. But how is it here in Florida, the oldest state, or the oldest city, St. Augustine, planted here in this Union! The school law is of little or no account. The ignorant and superstitious people that inhabit this state claim to be very pious. Most all the old residents, black and white, are church-members. As for murder or crime, there is very little notice taken of it. So much for a pious and Christian state. N. D. HAGAMAN.

[We regret to note that our correspondent is in error when he says that Mr. Walker would be jailed in any state. His form of marriage has for some time been recognized as legal in New York, and there has been no visible retrogression toward the days of Abraham on that account. This statement may be deplorable, but truth demands it.—ED. T. S.]

HAVANA, ILL., April 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The Lutherans of this city hav just confirmed about twenty boys and girls, whom they hav taken into the church. This church has a peculiar way of annihilating the minds of the children. As soon as they are nine days old. they are baptized; and when they are old enough to talk they are made to commit a prayer to memory, and repeat it every day. At the age of six years they are sent to a private school, where they are taught a few common studies and the Lutheran religion. At the age of fourteen they are sent to the minister, who teaches the confirming class. Here they are taught the catechism, part of which they are made to commit to memory. Then the minister examins them to find out if he has their minds caged in, and if he finds their minds well secured, he locks (confirms them) the door to their mind, and the noble faculty of reason is not allowed admittance.

This is what I call mental bondage. With this kind of teaching we can easily see why these people believe as they do. They are not taught anything else. A former minister of this church was called upon to preach the funeral of a boy who had not been confirmed, and the minister would not go because it was contrary to the laws of the church to preach anyone's funeral who had not been confirmed. This caused a fuss between him and some of the members, and with this charge, and a few minor ones, he was called upon to giv up his pastorship. It looks as if these members wanted him to preach the doctrin that makes baptism and confirmation indispensable in order to be saved, and when the minister wants to follow out his doctrin, and practice what he preaches, they are not satisfied, but want him to preach a boy to heaven, when, according to their doctrin, he goes to hell. They don't believe their doctrin themselvs, and as they pay the preacher, they want him to preach and do as they say.

We are going to hav John E. Remsburg here in May if we can make suitable arrangements. I would like well to hav him come, and I am going to try to make arrangements for one or three lectures. J. A. WEABER.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MR. D. LOUIS BODGE.

CANYON CITY, COL., April 16, 287.

MR. BODGE: I hav read with some care your letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 7, 1887, and hav concluded though with trembling fingers to make a few remarks upon it, and would be glad if the editor could print it as I spell it for the eyes of other people.

The first thing I shall notice is that you are in favor of philosophic spelling, which I would not hav guessed from your letter, only as you said it. You would be in favor of making all right at once, or none of it. You would want to build a house in a day, or not begin it—laying three or four bricks would be so distasteful you would abandon it altogether. You wouldn't plow an acre of ground unless you could do it with one furrow.

As to being radical, I am with you, and the first thing in order is as many letters as sounds. This would obviate the necessity of a silent letter, and by such an alphabet I hav written for the last thirty-five years.

People don't get their education in a day, but piecemeal, and is it not reasonable to you that the first thing, and easiest, would be to drop silent letters that signify no part of a word? This would be the least and first step that could be taken. The next would be to restrict, as far as possible, each letter to one sound, and use that letter for that sound only; this would bring the people gradually to see and feel the propriety and necessity of common-sense spelling. A friend to the cause, and yet your eyes are offended at the very first and necessary steps toward educating the people!

You make a singular expression when you say "nine new characters to represent letters," as if a letter is not a character to represent a sound instead of a letter. Again you say, "So sweeping a reform would, of course, produce an almost total change in the structure of our language in its represented form."

First, letters do not determin the structure of a language. They only signify the elements of words. Words are elements of language. Again, you say such change would obscure the etymology of words. This reminds me of an incident in Illinois, of an Englishman who was carrying rails on his shoulder, and had a piece of sheepskin sewed on his coat to prevent the rails hurting him. Going back for a rail, he met a man who asked him what he had that sheepskin on his shoulder for. "Why, to show my etymology." Said the other man, "How does that show your etymology?" "Why," said the Englishman, "my ancestors used to dress in sheepskin, and as I hav been so long from England people don't know me by my talk, so I put this on me to let them know I'm from England." So silent letters are pages of sheepskin fastened to words to show their derivation. And that is an important point to the three millions of children that we must educate annually, and pay for the millions of spelling-books they wear out. It was decided by a convention of the etymologists in London that the sounds of words are a surer clew to the etymology of words than the letters, and that phonetic spelling brings to view etymologies that were lost.

Dictionaries now furnish all the etymologies known. The idea that a man will say he wishes the adoption of so great a matter to bless the world, and yet ridicule the very first and necessary steps to educate the people to appreciate it, does not sound very logical to me. You introduce an "oak-tree" as an illustration, which reminds me of a man in Illinois who had a field of forty acres to plow, and commenced it one morning, and plowed all day, and at night found he had gone but few times around his field. He concluded that four or five furrows a day wouldn't pay, and quit. And so with friend Bodge. His oak-tree was too much for him. He would want all the twigs cut off in a day, or not at all. He would be glad to see some one else do it, but he would giv his influence against his own convictions. You would be glad to see right spelling adopted, and yet you call those who are laboring to promote it "spelling-deformers." If the spelling reform is what you represent it, it amounts to a moral obligation upon every man and woman, and if so, you owe words of encouragement. You say "every little helps" don't apply in this case. I differ with you. Inasmuch as it familiarizes the eye with correct spelling, and so changes that bad taste. Adding e to the words hav, giv, and liv, and a thousand others, adds 33⅓ per cent to the cost of writing, printing, and buying. By a falsely cultivated taste you might be willing to pay 33⅓ per cent for money when you could get it without. People labor under the impression that words are made of letters, without any regard to the number or kinds of sounds that are in the word. Your taste would not let you spell nolej (knowledge) as I do, although I hav spelt all the sounds in the word. Your taste, my friend, would cause you to add 80 per cent to the cost of that word, and not get one cent in return. And yet the intelligent American people will promote and foster a spelling so crushing to their interests, constantly retarding the education of their children to the amount of one-fourth of what they now get.

The greatest obstruction in our way is in the printers. It seems they cannot afford to furnish themselvs with a few additional types to enable us to illustrate our scheme to their readers, and if we write a communication treating the subject we must reduce it to the old spelling, or their compositors can't set it up, and yet you ridicule the little that our Editor is doing. I hav not exhausted the subject by a good deal, and if you want an alphabet let me know, and I will send you one. A. B. PIKARD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Good Advice.

[Taken from a magazine printed in 1839.]

Let order o'er your time preside,
And method all your business guide;
Early begin and end your toil,
Nor let great tasks your hands embroil;
One thing at once be still begun,
Contrived, resolved, pursued, and done;
Hire not for what yourselvs can do,
And send not when yourselvs can go,
Nor till to-morrow's light delay
What might as well be done to-day.
By steady efforts all men thrive,
And long, by moderate labor, liv,
While eager toil and anxious care,
Health, strength, and peace, and life impair;
Nor think a life of labor hard,
It has a rich and sure reward.
Its meals are hearty, slumbers sweet,
Its cares are few, its health complete;
No mind so activ, fresh, and gay,
As his who toils the livlong day.
A life of sloth drags hardly on,
Suns set too late, and rise too soon,
Youth, manhood, age, all linger slow
To one who nothing has to do.
The drone, a nuisance to the hive,
Not long in idleness can liv,
For well the bees, those judges wise,
Plague, chase, and sting him till he dies.
Then humble and obedient prove,
And justice do and duty love,
And let it be your constant plan
To compass all the good you can;
Still follow on 'mid loss and gain,
In winter's snow and summer's rain,
That by our love and pardoning grace
Bright, happy home your dwelling-place.

The Right and the Wrong.

I presume the children who are readers of this corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER know of the class of people who believe in spirits of good and evil.

Evolution has not progressed very far in the case of this class. They do not think it possible to perform a good or kind action without the help of a spirit.

I do not think any child who can be interested in the Children's Corner believes any such absurdity. Yet you may hav wondered about this question of right and wrong, and would like to think a little about their origin.

When in the course of ages this planet evoluted from its nebulous state and became fit for the abode of the higher mammals, as has already been explained in this corner, man made his appearance in the form best fitted to survive in the struggle for existence. At first, probably, if he thought at all, it was only of himself, and how he could appease his hunger as he roamed through the great forests of a tropical country, killing and eating animals weaker than he, and doubtless being killed and eaten by those larger and stronger. But, being the highest form yet developed, his superior reasoning power aided him in avoiding those things which his experience had taught him tended to his destruction, the avoiding and doing of which were his first ideas of right and wrong.

This was a very simple beginning, and concerned only each separate individual, but the most intelligen men would liv the longest, because they were able to take better care of themselvs, and had children who would naturally be intelligent like their parents.

It was probably a long time before man discovered that several men together could defend themselvs against danger much better than one man alone, and so for mutual protection they commenced to dwell together in communities. This was the first germ of society, that has developed into what we now hav.

Love of life is the strongest feeling in every creature. The thought of life brings happiness, and whatever adds to one's happiness makes life more desirable. As men dwelt together and advanced in intelligence, their capacity and desire for enjoyment increased. It was no longer possible for a man to liv for himself alone; others' rights must be considered. If death were desirable, and the thought of life made one unhappy, then right and wrong would no longer be what it is. Murder then would be right because it brought great happiness to the victim. If to hav one's property stolen caused one great satisfaction and enhanced his happiness, then a thief would be a benefactor, and theft would not be wrong. If lying did not cause confusion in business transactions and society did not suffer when one could not believe a word his neighbor said, then lying would not be wrong.

Experience has taught people differently. To insure a man's own safety, he found that he must not take his neighbor's life, and so murder became wrong. To enjoy the possession of his own property, which he found brought him happiness, he learned he must respect that of others, so honesty became right.

Briefly, right is that class of actions which men hav found by the accumulated experience of thousands of years to be best for them and that which brought the most happiness; wrong, the class of actions which hav been found to cause misery.

There are many wrong actions which bring a temporary pleasure, but if we consider them well, we soon see they ultimately result in unhappiness. It may make a drunkard happy to get drunk, but we can easily see what wretchedness would ensue if everyone sought happiness in that way.

Correspondence.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., April 11, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought so many times I would try and form acquaintance with you, and the little Freethinkers, but I am so much older than some that hav been writing; but when I saw that some had been writing at the age of fifteen, I thought I was not any too old. My father has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER off and on for about eight years. He likes it very much, and always gets me to read the Children's Corner. We went and heard Mr. Putnam two nights, and liked the lectures very much, too. We hardly ever go to church, but most every Sunday go to a Good Templar's meeting instead. But it is raining to-day, and we can't go. Well, I must close, hoping to see this in print soon.

Your Liberal friend ever,
LILLIE D. WATKINS.

BURNETT, NEB., April 1, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We are having very fine weather here now. Papa has all of his grains own. Papa had Mr. Jamieson deliver three lectures here. His first lecture was on "What Freethinkers Believe and Disbelieve;" second, "The Bible and Science, and their Relation to Each Other;" third, "Thomas Paine." I think the Science Column is very interesting. Papa appreciates the pictures very much. I like them too. I think if Mr. Heston should stop the pictures the paper would not be worth as much as it is now. Papa read the selections from Mr. Ingersoll in the last TRUTH SEEKER aloud; he thought they were splendid. He said he was going to giv it to some of his friends to read. Well, I will close for this time.

I will ever remain your true friend,
ESTELLE WHITNEY.

RACINE, WIS., April 8, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav often felt as if I would like to write a letter to the Children's Corner, but then I hav let it slip, until to-day another desire has seized me. Father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER a number of years, and we think it the best paper printed, especially since the pictures commenced. They and the Children's Corner are the first that take my eyes. My little boy is very fond of looking at the pictures. I will write a few of his idea about God, which may interest the children. (He was about three years old then; he is six now.) "Ma, who made all them pretty little moons?" "They are stars, and it is said that God made them." "Where does God liv?" "Up in the sky, it is said." Then he looked up at the beautiful starlit sky and said, "Oh, yes, I see him peeking his head out of his kitchen window." At another time, he had been told to come in when it rained; one day a little sun-shower came up, which lasted about five minutes. He came around to the door and said, "Mamma, it sprinkled a little, but I did not get wet. God did not hav much water to-day, so he only pushed a little down." When about four years old, he said, "There's a man in the moon, isn't there?" "So they say." "Yes, there is, for I see him putting his specs on." For fear of taking too much of your valuable Corner, I will, if there is no objection, write a few more of Willie's queer expressions next time. Wishing you success in your grand and noble work, I will close with love and kind regards to you and all the children.

Yours with respect,
MRS. MATHEA MORSE.

P.S.—Perhaps I may as well giv my age, like the children, which is twenty-three years.

OAK MILLS, KAN., April 9, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav written to Aunt Elmina, I will take the opportunity in writing to you.

I am a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and take much interest in reading the Children's Corner. I find that it contains many nice letters from the young Liberal readers, who seem to think lots of you and the Corner.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is a grand, good paper, and its editors are rising toward a place of distinction. All of the noblest Liberal men and women on earth contribute to its pages, and try their utmost courage in making it the grand emblem of Liberalism, and they are working rapidly toward our cause. How is Colonel Ingersoll? I was shocked to hear of the bad condition he is in, but I hope to hear of his recovery. I hav lost my youngest brother by the hand of death, and home does not seem like home without him. I hav read the "Story Hour," and when I turn to the beautiful portrait and tribute of your little niece, it makes me feel so bad to think that such a bright little gem should hav a life so brief.

Well, hoping to hear from you, and wishing the Children's Corner success, I will close, ever remaining, Your true Liberal friend,
GEO. J. REMSBURG.

[Colonel Ingersoll is, we believe, recovering his usual health. We all wish him long life, good health, and strength to deal many more sturdy blows against the follies and superstitions of the time. We sympathize deeply with our friend and all the family in the loss of dear baby Gene. We can understand all the grief and loneliness that came into the home when the dear baby boy went out. But we must learn to bear our sorrows and losses patiently, and cling the closer to the loved ones who remain with us. We thank George for his kind letter, and shall always be glad to hear from him, as well as all our boys and girls who find pleasure in the Corner.—ED. C.C.]

MOODY, TEX., April 4, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Once more I take up my pen to write to the Children's Corner, with my love to all who are correspondents of the Corner. It givs me pleasure to think that there are so many that can think for themselvs without having priests to think for them, and I think that the day is not far off when they can all think for themselvs, breathe the pure air of freedom, and study science instead of those ridiculous tales about Solomon, Joshua, and David, a man after God's own heart. But Christianity is dying out. When we look back in the history of the past and see how the church used to do, we can see that it is coutinually failing. When we cast an eye around over the country we see the most intelligent people are Liberals, we notice the most studious people are becoming skeptical. The old creeds suit them no longer, but must step back and make room for something new. We hear preachers get up in the pulpit and say that the Bible is inspired by an all-wise God. That is ridiculous! Do you think an all-wise God would inspire a book that most of the schoolboys are going around correcting its mistakes, and showing its falsities? We think that God never made any revelation at all, if there be such a thing as a God. And as for the Bible being a revelation to man from an infinit God, it can't be, for it contradicts all branches of science. If it be a revelation it should hav revealed the art of the telegraph, the locomotiv, the steamship, and all other branches of science. It says nothing about the other worlds that exist in this omnipotent space. If it be a revelation it should hav revealed all things to man, and not left him to find it out the best way he could.

Yours for truth and love,
JOHN M. SIMMONS.

MUSCOTAH, KAN., April 10, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I read the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I notice that more girls write to you than boys, so I'll try to help the boy's side out a little. There are not many Liberals out here, as far as I know, but I'm glad to say that all our family are Freethinkers. My father has been lecturing against Romanism and the Catholic church for a number of years, and has written a book entitled, "Romanism; or, Danger Ahead," which has been circulated quite well, considering the time it has been published. When I become a man I shall do my best to hinder the Catholic church from gaining a foothold on our now happy republic. It is very true in all Freethinkers' minds that the Catholic church is the worst petty thief in the whole universe. Your picture, "Women the Supporters of Priest and Pope," is the best thing out, and I, for one, thank Mr. Heston for his true as well as original pictures. If the Catholic church was away from the ignorant Irish, I believe they would become more wealthy and better law-abiding citizens. I believe a priest would take the last penny from a laborer just to get the man's sins forgiven.

Father is in Chicago, so I'm all alone with two boys and a girl. I felt kind of lonesome, so I thought I would write to you. We hav about thirty cattle, a hundred pigs, and seven horses. The grass is green, and the leaves are coming out now. It looks as if we are going to hav an early spring.

Miss Wixon, I do hope you will excuse my poor penmanship and form of letter. I hope you won't put this letter in the waste-basket, for I would like very much to see it in print. I am thirteen, and hope to write to you again before I am fourteen. I remain,

Your Freethinker friend,
LONNIE J. GROVER.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

New Wine in Old Bottles.*

There can be no radical reform in things until opinions hav been radically reformed.—Littre, 1849.

What is this "labor movement," pray?
We hear about it every day;
The thing has grown to such dimensions
That statesmen show it their attentions,
And wise philosophers and such,
Who talk, and talk, and talk so much,
That I confess I can't make out
Exactly what it's all about;
But notice that behind their backs
They carry every man an ax,
And judge the "movement" must be that
Of something these are sharpened at—
A sort of agricultural wheel;
And this it is that makes me feel
Almost afraid to speak my mind—
I havn't any ax to grind.
However, as I've heard about
The "movement's" being near knocked out
For making an unwary lurch
Against the power of the church,
I'll risk a word, for I'm an amateur
Of movements, though I'm no dynamiter.

All honor to the meanest one
That plants a seed beneath the sun,
If hope go with it from his heart
To make the more another's part;
But he that claims the right to lead
Must know the soil and know the seed,
For whoso plants for bread alone
Will find his gift shall turn to stone.

What need we now? Does "progress" rob
The wealth of that great heart whose throb
Had quickened, strengthened from the first?
Then ours, indeed, are days accurst.
But no, the human heart is whole;
Faith dwindles—faith whose firm control
Once shaped the yielding wills of men
To one for what was righteous then.
But now the heart has lost its guide
And vainly turns from side to side.
But must it turn forever so?
Thank the fair light of reason, no!

What need we? Truth! Let men be taught
The naked truth, and minds so fraught
Will more and more see life as one—
For truth is single like the sun—
Till hearts combining for the right
Make scattered force resistless might.

But what is truth? Is it not he
That walked the waves of Galilee?
Though praised his name all names above,
It is not he, for this was love.
Truth is that humble faith we draw
From sequent facts that men name law,
Which build no heaven in the skies
To fade from sight of searching eyes,
But lead us step by step from birth
Until our dust returns to earth,
With promis, if we rise again,
To lead us as they led us then.

No sudden light is this we bring,
Like Saul's, to Damas journeying;
Truth cannot change the wrong heart's way
Between to-morrow and to-day.
This thing it is that truth can do,
Make one in will what hearts are true,
And, placed alone at evil's side,
Shine till the worst be purified.

Poor "movement!" Luke has left a line
About old bottles and new wine,
Skin bags, you know, and nothing narrable
Can teach us more than this same parable;
No wonder your old bottle burst,
You might hav known it from the first.

The truth and all the truth shall save.
Can hands be free while heads are slave?
Shall hungry stomachs hav their part
And leave unfed the famished heart?
No! Let us strike for freedom whole,
For Freedom's body and her soul.

Make truth the banner of your hope,
Nor bow to big or little pope;
Aye, down with popery in science,
Down with popery in song,
Down with all the little popes
That batten on the brainless throng!
Greed and ignorance are banded,
Freemen, freemen, guard your rights!
Down with all these robber barons,
Down with all these robber knights!
Where is now the flower of manhood
Ever foremost for the truth?
Greed has chilled the craven blood
That lags along the veins of youth.
Must we see the valiant spirit
Fire and sword had failed to tame
Grovel at the beck of gold?
Arise, you dastards, rise for shame!
Ignorance, the dam of sorrow,
Girded with the two-edged sword,
Gropes along the ways of darkness
Followed by her motley horde,
Bringing tacks to nail our savior
To the cross where Christ was slain,
Ours, the son of man immortal,
Born of wedded heart and brain!

Stand we firm until the dawning,
Calmly conscious of our might,
If like men we stand together
Foes will vanish with the light.

What need we? Common sense to save
The common people from the knave,
To cure them of the growing hate
Of higher worth that leaves the state
An easy prey in all its parts
To dirty hands and dirty hearts,
And common pride to make "their betters"
Ashamed of common scoundrels' fetters.

Watch them on each election day
March up and giv their votes away—
Not always giv—to men they know
Unfit, then wait a month or so
And hear them all begin to curse
The power of the corporate purse
Because these men hav sold them out
Per contract to some scurvy lout
That's needed by a corporation
As senator of this great nation.

While men endure such things as these Reform is but an idle breeze,
With hardly force to raise the stench
From office, council-hall and bench.
Omnipotence with such a crew
Would giv it up, and yet will you
With twopence worth of patent theory
Make everything look bright and cheery?
Change your men first, turn to and show
If things are wrong they make them so.
Are these same "toilers" men in fact,
Or shall we plead the baby act,
And turn them over to be schooled
By some paternal Mr. Gould?
Hands are votes here; there's no excuse
That men can offer for abuse
Except their own stupidity;
Open their eyes and let them see!

Show them why man, though strong to trace
An unknown planet's course in space
And giv it trysting-star and day,
Is weak to find his earthly way;
Why Hurry hastens to her fall,
But step by step shall conquer all.
Teach them to take the sure and hold
As worth the rest a thousand-fold;
But let them make no plea from this
For lengthening life of things amiss;
No balm to soothe the wakening fear
That all may not be perfect here.
I plead no cause but truth, and he
That named the price of liberty
"Eternal vigilance" knew well
His sword had bought where tyrants sell.

Teach them to doubt the power of lip
And trust in honor's bulldog grip,
That catches fast and holds its own
In spite of menace, blows, or bone.
So shall they find the men whose toil
Through rain and shine will wrench the spoil
From bloated avarice, and giv
The just an equal chance to liv.

A Dog That Reasoned.

Mr. Harold Dollner, a nativ of Denmark, and for many years consul-general of Denmark in this city, and a portion of the time acting minister for that kingdom, and well known to business men as the head of the firm of Dollner, Potter & Co., of New York, for many years resided in Brooklyn in a kind of rus in urbe—a mansion of the old style, situated on Washington avenue, in the midst of what, for a city, are large grounds. He always took a great interest in his flowers, trees, and vegetables, and in the heart of the city raised the very finest pumpkins. He also kept two or three dogs; one a house dog, another of the spaniel variety, and the third a powerful mastiff. The mastiff was always chained near the stable, and not far from the rear entrance to the premises.

In a certain autumn the pumpkins which were produced in Mr. Dollner's garden were of such extraordinary size and beauty that they excited the cupidity of a person who stole two of the largest of them, and took them to the Horticultural Exhibition, where he entered them as his own, and actually took the premium for them. This so raised Mr. Dollner's indignation that he instructed his gardener to take off the largest of those which remained and deposit them in the cellar lest they should also be stolen. At the same time he told him to set the mastiff loose, so that if anybody else came in at night to steal the pumpkins, the dog would attack him. Pursuant to this order, the gardener worked all the afternoon taking off the finest of the pumpkins, which he carried up one by one, piling them near the cellar door until he had finished, when he conveyed them into the cellar. About sunset he unchained the mastiff.

This dog had watched the performance of the gardener, and during the night he gnawed off the largest of the remaining pumpkins and carried them one by one to the cellar door, where he piled them up and stood guard over them until the next morning, when as the cook arose and opened the kitchen door, with an expression of great delight the animal wagged his tail, looked up for approbation, and went away. The next night he gnawed off everything from the size of a hazel nut upward, and carried them to the cellar door as before. A few days afterward, when the person suspected of having stolen the pumpkins, who had always been friendly with him, entered, the mastiff sprang upon him with the utmost rage.

It is plain that the mastiff had never seen such an operation before. He, therefore, must hav comprehended it by an effort of the mind, held it through the entire night, worked upon it, contemplated it as a completed act, and surrendered the pumpkins to the family when they arose. Yet, of course, he failed to comprehend the reason, or to distinguish the value of the ripe from that of the green pumpkins. He also obviously connected the man, who had in his sight stolen the pumpkins, with the deed.—Christian Advocate.

The 1887 Annual.

There has been lying on our table several weeks a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1887, compiled and printed by those enterprising publishers, the Truth Seeker Publishing Company, of New York. The ANNUAL has been issued for several years, and the set make a valuable and interesting cyclopedia of Freethought statistics, arguments, etc., but this last issue is in some respects the best of all. In the place of the nonsense usually found in almanacs, this space on the calendar pages is utilized to giv the dates of important events, births and deaths of distinguished men and women, etc. Then follows a condensed and very candid review of the progress of the Freethought movement in the United States during the year 1886; also another carefully prepared article on Freethought abroad. The other articles are the address by President Cleveland on the occasion of inaugurating the statue of Liberty; "The Right to Testify," by F. M. Holland; Work accomplished by the American Secular Union, written by S. P. Putnam, and a beautiful poem, "The Coming Dawn," by D. Louis Bodge. The closing article is an interesting story by Si Slokum. The most important feature of this number, and which should secure it a wide circulation among those who like to hav information of this kind at hand for ready reference, is the department devoted to the Sunday, oath, and blasphemy laws. Fifty-four of the large pages are devoted to this subject. Everything to be found in the constitution and laws of the several states and territories, regarding the observance of rest days, qualifications necessary to testify in the courts, blasphemy, etc., has been carefully collected, affording information heretofore inaccessible to the general reader. If any one thinks there are no "Blue laws" in this country, he should invest twenty-five cents in this ANNUAL. There are a dozen or more full-page engravings scattered through the work, taken from Bennett's journey "Around the World," presenting scenes in China, Japan, India, etc.—Denison, Texas, Sunday Gazetteer.

Books.

TRY-SQUARE; OR, THE CHURCH OF PRACTICAL RELIGION. By Reporter. New York: The Truth Seeker Company. 12mo, pp. 314. Price $1.

This is decidedly an odd book. The "Reporter" disclaims authorship, and he denies us his name on the ground of modesty. All names of persons and places are confessedly fictitious, but everything seems so familiar that the reader will readily admit that it all might occur in any country village.

The locus of the story (if story is a permissible word here) is in Pinville, which appears to be a small village in central New York. The hero is Job Sawyer, commonly called Uncle Job, who is one of nature's originals—a regular nonesuch. He has "roughed it" in early life; but at the time of his introduction to us he is about sixty years old, is wealthy, and has been many years a justice of the peace. He is really a radical Freethinker, yet he prefers to be called an "independent thinker" because, as he alleges, the Freethinkers hav become about as sectarian and dogmatical as orthodoxy is.

The book opens with a dialog between Uncle Job and the local Methodist preacher in a village store where they happened to meet. The preacher finally confesses: "I know that such talk as yours comes from a pure and honest heart;" but he adds: "If you don't like what we are doing in the churches, why don't you take hold and show us how to do something better?" As the old man's answer to this banter is the keynote to the whole book, we quote it entire:

"SAWYER (dropping his head thoughtfully). I think that point is 'well taken,' as the lawyers say. I hav heard it before, and I always thought it was a good point. I hav been hoping and wishing for years that somebody would make a move in the right direction; but nobody moves, though millions are complaining that something is wrong. Since you hav brought the matter home to me so forcibly, I think I will undertake, in my humble and uncouth way, to start a reformation right here in Pinville."

After crushing an orthodox conspiracy and surmounting other difficulties, Uncle Job succeeds in founding what he calls "the Church of Practical Religion," with a goodly number of charter members, and he becomes pastor of the new church. In his first public talk, he describes his charter members as follows: "I think a careful scrutiny of that list will reveal the name of no 'deadbeat'—no person who changes his residence every three months, more or less, to avoid the payment of a just rent—no person who obtains credit, at the grocery or elsewhere, by promising to pay next week and then forgetting to redeem his promis—no manufacturer of, or dealer in, intoxicating beverages, nor any person who knowingly permits his property to be used in connection with such business—no gambler, nor person who permits his property to be used for the purposes of gambling—no woman of unchaste character, nor any male associate of such a woman—no intriguing, deceitful politician, nor trickster of any kind—no person who buys votes, or corruptly influences votes in any election—no person who sells his vote or political influence, for money or other valuable thing—no person who has wilfully sworn falsely, either in taking an oath of office, or otherwise—in short, you cannot find on that list the name of any person who has ever been accused of any act, however trivial, which the common voice of mankind pronounces wrong."

The new preacher explains to his congregation why there will be no praying in his meetings. He frankly says he doesn't believe in it, and givs them this bit of his own experience. Once, when a young man, he had been in dire extremity; all his efforts to extricate himself proved futil; death faced him on every hand, and, in a moment of despair,

"'I jest flopped down on my marrow-bones
Crotch deep in the snow and prayed;'

or rather I tried to pray, but could not. Every word I uttered seemed like blasphemy. I felt like a criminal, and stopped . . . and I hav never tried to giv utterance to a prayer from that day to this."

The "Try-Square" is a rule of conduct invented by Mr. Sawyer which he sets above the Golden Rule of Confucius—that rule being, as he claims, founded wholly in selfishness. He has squared his own conduct by it for years, and has found it an infallible guide.

In his preaching (a number of sample sermons are given in the book) Uncle Job pitches into all the evils he sees about him in the most sturdy fashion. He is especially fired up in opposition to the prevailing political vices—vote-buying in particular—and he denounces from his pulpit many local sinners by name. The old gentleman is possessed of a very earnest and positiv nature, and he givs hard knocks right, left, and center; and his discourses make very entertaining reading, even for those who dissent from his views.

Obituary.

Departed this life from Austin, Nev., March 14, 1887, Mr. David Dear, aged 55 years 8 months and 11 days. A nativ of Kent, England.

Although a nativ of England he had spent the last twenty-two years of his life in this country and Canada with his wife. He made a trip to England with the idea of staying and spending his days there if it pleased him, but he found that country had lost all its charms for him, so he returned to make his home in the United States. Deceased was one of the finest specimens of honesty and integrity it was ever my pleasure to know. I had known him as a Christian and he was a good man, and I knew him when he commenced to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other Liberal works, and then he sailed out into the sea of Freethought, which opened a vista that expanded his thoughts and ideas, and he had the faculty to express them without giving offense. Without any apparent effort or desire on his part he would draw the trust and confidence of all he became acquainted with. He was the man always selected to repose some trust in, and it scarcely required his word for his bond. He leaves a wife to mourn his loss, as she alone can mourn the loss of a model husband and companion. Death is the great harvester of all things, but death cannot destroy the influence for good of a noble life.

His wife had but just arisen from an extended period of sickness, through which he had tended her, when he was stricken with the disease that terminated his life in three days. He was unconscious several hours before he died, so he could giv no expression of his hopes or fears of the hereafter, but he was the kind of man that would die as he had lived, and be content to be judged by the past or future by his good works.

The Christian Religion. By R. G. Ingersoll, Judge Jeremiah S. Black, and Prof. George F. Fisher. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

Orthodoxy. 56 pages, 12mo, paper, 10 cents. $1.00 per doz. post paid. Printed in large, clear type, and containing as much as could be delivered in two ordinary lectures. This makes a grand missionary document. Liberals should scatter it generously.

Ingersoll Catechised: His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the editor of the San Franciscan. 5 cents; 50 cents per dozen; 25 copies, $1; 100 copies, $3. Millions of these should be circulated.

Vindication of Thomas Paine from the attacks of the New York Observer, by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price, 15 cents.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill. Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

A SHORT LESSON IN HISTORY.

A double-page picture contrasting science and theology, showing how the one has labored for human advancement, and how the other has always opposed it.

Price, six copies, 30 cents; one dozen, 50 cents twenty-five copies for $1; one hundred copies for $3. We wish that the friends of Freethought would distribute thousands of these telling pictures.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

News of the Week.

NEW YORK went dry again last Sunday.

A CHINAMAN of this city, who calls himself "Tom Paine," was arrested Sunday for ironing clothes. Justice Murray let him go, saying he did not regard ironing clothes as a crime.

THE Rev. Dr. Bristor, Methodist; servant girl; felonious assault; trial this week at New City, N. Y.

T. F. MCGOWAN, of Brooklyn, who is district-attorney of Queen's county, has disappeared. He is said to be a defaulter to the extent of nearly $20,000.

THE Rev. T. H. Dabney, of Floris, Ia., left home the other day telling his wife that he was going to baptize some converts. It has transpired that he eloped with the seventeen-year-old sister of his wife.

THE Rev. Arthur Morrison was convicted at Baltimore last Saturday of stealing a horse, and was sentenced to the penitentiary for seven years. Mr. Morrison was a Methodist, and had previously been in jail.

NEW JERSEY now has a law that all goods manufactured in state prison shall be so labeled, in order that those who object to prison contract labor need not unwittingly encourage it by their patronage.

A NEARLY completed Presbyterian chapel in Montclair, N. J., was blown down, on the 29th ult., at a loss of $3,000.

THE farmers at Paulding, O., hav blown up a canal reservoir with dynamite because it covered and ruined a large tract of land that they wish to cultivate.

THE Rev. Adolph A. Schabehorn, Presbyterian, of Nyack, N. Y., is being tried for intemperance, untruthfulness, and immoral and improper "conversation" with women.

PARSON GOODELL, of Providence, R. I., who, according to the charges of Mrs. Foster, went wrong last fall, has been whitewashed by an ecclesiastical court and acquitted of ministerial conduct.

TWO Louisville, Ky., negroes committed a criminal assault upon a young girl and were lodged in jail. Last week a mob endeavored to lynch them, and there was a riot, which was quelled by calling out the militia.

ONE of Buffalo Bill's Wild West Indians, a Pawnee brave, contracted pneumonia while the show was in this city, and a few days ago he was buried in a pauper's grave in Potter's Field. The show is now in London.

THE women of West Fairview, Pa., who prayed the court a few weeks ago that a license might be granted in their town hav had that prayer granted. The reason they assigned was that they would rather hav their husbands drink in town than go to Harrisburg, two miles away.

THE Rev. C. F. Stiver, Episcopalian, of Grenada, Miss., came flying down the steps of a house where resided his parishioner, Capt. W. P. Fowler, the other day, and as he reached the gate the captain appeared in the door and shot him. The minister fell to the ground fatally wounded. Being told that he would die, Mr. Stiver requested that his slayer should not be punished, as he was justified in the act. The inference is that the Rev. Mr. Stiver had insulted Mrs. Fowler.

A YOUTH named Defreitas jumped off the Brooklyn bridge last week. A policeman grabbed him by the heel as he went over, so that he turned several somersaults in the air and struck the water head foremost. Then he swam to a boat and was taken aboard uninjured. He was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for disorderly conduct, but procured bail and got a situation as a freak in a museum. Odlum, the first man to jump from the bridge, was an athlete and a scientific jumper, but was killed by the concussion.

Gems of Thought.

IT will be found upon examination that American slavery has been in many respects the worst form that has been known, and that in all its deformities it has been sustained by the greatest leaders in all the orthodox churches, while its bravest and truest opponents hav been Infidels.—D. M. Bennett.

WE know all about your moldy wonders and your stale miracles. We want a this year's fact. We ask only one. Giv us one fact for charity. Your miracles are too ancient. The witnesses hav been dead for nearly two thousand years. Their reputation for "truth and veracity" in the neighborhood where they resided is wholly unknown to us. Giv us a new miracle, and substantiate it by witnesses who still hav the cheerful habit of living in this world. Do not send us to Jericho, to hear the winding horns, nor put us in the fire with Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. Do not compel us to navigate the sea with Captain Jonah, nor dine with Mr. Ezekiel. There is no sort of use sending us fox-hunting with Samson. We hav positivly lost all interest in that little speech so eloquently delivered by Balaam's inspired donkey. It is worse than useless to show us fishes with money in their mouths, and call our attention to vast multitudes stuffing themselvs with five crackers and two sardines. We demand a new miracle, and we demand it now. Let the church furnish at least one, or forever after hold her peace.—R. G. Ingersoll.

PHILOSOPHERS hav no aggressiv tendencies. With eyes fixed on the noble goal to which they tend, they may, now and then, be stirred to momentary wrath by the unnecessary obstacles with which the ignorant or the malicious encumber, if they cannot bar, the difficult path; but why should their souls be deeply vexed? The majesty of fact is on their side, and the elemental forces of nature are working for them. Not a star comes to the meridian at its calculated time but testifies to the justice of their methods—their beliefs are "one with the falling rain and with the growing corn." By doubt they are established, and open inquiry is their bosom friend. Such men hav no fear of traditions, however venerable, and no respect for them when they become mischievous obstructions; but they hav better than mere antiquarian business in hand, and if dogmas, which ought to be fossil, but are not, are not forced upon their notice, they are too happy to treat them as non-existent.—Huxley's Origin of Species.

'Tis very true, my sovereign king,
My skill may well be doubted;
But facts are chiels that winna ding,
An' darna be disputed. —Burns.

THE gospels, as professed records of Christ's words and deeds, will be allowed to form the most important portion of the New Testament collection. Now, the idea of God having inspired four different men to write a history of the same transactions—or rather of many different men having undertaken to write such a history, of whom God inspired four only to write correctly, leaving the others to their own unaided resources, and giving us no test by which to distinguish the inspired from the uninspired—certainly appears self-confuting and anything but "natural." If the accounts of the same transactions agree, where was the necessity of more than one? If they differ (as they notoriously do), it is certain that only one can be inspired; and which is that one?—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

I HAV now pitched my tent under a cypress-tree; the tomb is now my inexpugnable fortress, ever close by the gate of which I look upon the hostil armament, and pains and penalties of tyrannous life placidly enough, and listen to its loudest threatenings with a still smile. O ye loved ones, that already sleep in the noiseless bed of rest, whom in life I could only weep for and never help; and ye, who, wide-scathed, still toil lonely in the monster-bearing desert, dyeing the flinty ground with your blood—yet a little while and we shall all meet there, and our mother's bosom will screen us all; and oppression's harness and sorrow's fire-whip, and all the Gehanna bailiffs that patrol and inhabit ever-vexed time, cannot henceforth harm us any more.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

WE do not know what death is any more than we know what life is, but whatever it is it is natural. We ought to say, "I know not what there is in the future, but whatever there is I am ready to meet it." This is the faith we need—faith in nature and in what nature does. Death is only the last step of life. We should not take any more care for this last step than for any other. It is merely a step off the earth instead of on it. I do not like the habit of talking so much about what has no present concern. It is well enough to look into the future as far as we can, but let us not forget that we liv in the present. When we hav exhausted the here, it will be time enough to think of the hereafter.—L. K. Washburn.

DESTRUCTION OF SODOM AND GOMORRAH.—Gen. xix, 24.

A righteous citizen escapes.

Odds and Ends.

THE rule oftenest broken in school—ferrule.

A MAN who does business on a large scale—a coal dealer.

WHEN punishing a child never strike it above the belt.

THOMPSON: "Suppose a man should call you a liar, what should you do?" Jones (hesitatingly): "What sized man?"

THE woman in full dress "bares her blushing honors thick upon her," with, however, not very much accent on the blush.

"YE little spalpeen! I'll tache ye now niver to come home agin half-dhrownded to yer poor ould mother till yez knows how ter shwim!"

IT takes two to make a bargain, except in cases of matrimonial bargains. Then a minister is required, although, in some isolated instances, his services are dispensed with.

ANGEL DARLING: "Mamma, where did baby tome from?" Fond mother: "Papa bought him in the market." Angel darling: "Why didn't him div' ten cents more and det one wif hair on?"

A MAN in St. Augustine, Fla.,
Built a house which was almost a ca.
There was nothing so nt.,
As he thought, in the st.,
But his guests said that nothing was ha.

HOUSE-HUNTER (to Harlem landlord): "Why do you charge such a high rent for the house?" Landlord: "Because there is a beer saloon on one side, a livery stable on the other, and a church across the way. All the conveniences!"

THE will of Edward Kuehn, of Omaha, provides that his body shall be cremated, and his ashes placed in a silver urn, to be set up over the bar of a popular saloon in that city. He wants a chance to see his friends trying to get where he is.

A PARTY who testily viewed,
The behavior inane of a diewed,
With a dynamite bomb
Knocked him out sur-le-champ,
In innocuous desuetiewed.

FATHER: "Tommy, you should try and be a better boy. You are our only child and we expect you to be good." Tommy: "It ain't my fault that I am your only child. It is tough on me to be good for a lot of brothers and sisters I havn't got."

A LITTLE four-year-old in Harlem created a ripple last week by remarking to the teacher of the Sunday-school class: "Our dog's dead, and I guess the angels were scared when they saw him coming up the walk. He's awful cross to strangers."

"No sir," thundered the old gentleman, "I hav made up my mind that my daughter shall never marry a man who plays poker." "She might do a great deal worse, sir." "Impossible! Poker has proved the ruination of thousands of men, and its victims never recover from the infatuation. She could never do worse." "Excuse me, sir, but I'm sure she could. She might marry some fellow that thinks he plays poker." The old man thought it over."

"Do you see that dignified-looking gentleman across the way?" "Yes." "He has been a vestryman in our church and superintendent of the Sunday-school for over twenty years." "Is that so?" Then in a lower tone: "What do you suspect him of?"

WIGWUG: "That fellow with the long hair! Oh, he's a poet." Filtrip: "His is a striking figure—undoubtedly a man fired by high ambitions." Wigwug: "Ah! Well, I liv in his neigborhood, and I happen to know that he has also been fired by his landlady."

LAYMAN (to deacon, after early service): "The music was fine this morning, deacon; magnificent—particularly the offertory. I was enraptured with it!" Deacon (without a suspicion of guile): "Yes; I noticed that you were so enraptured that my efforts to direct your attention to the contribution box proved fruitless!"

THE story has recently been imported of an English grave-stone maker who was ordered to cut on a stone the words: "A virtuous woman is a crown to her husband." The stone, however, being small, he engraved on it: "A virtuous woman is 5s. to her husband." In England a five-shilling piece is called a crown.

A MOURNING husband came to see the bust of his dear deceased wife. "Pray study it well," said the sculptor. "It is only in clay, and I can alter it." The widower looked at it with the most tender interest. "It is her very self!" he exclaimed; "her large nose—the sign of goodness." Then, bursting into tears, he exclaimed, "She was so good! Make the nose a little larger!"

"I UNDERSTAND, 'Lijah," said the minister, "that many of you colored people hav very queer ideas of heaven. Now, take yourself, for instance, do you believe in the orthodox theory that heaven is a place of pearly gates and golden streets?" "No, sah, I don't," was the emphatic reply. "Dat 'scription am too promiskiss to be true. Hebben, sah, am a place wheer de 'possum hab only one eye."

ONE of the new rules of a Western railroad is that clergymen making requisition for half-fare tickets are obliged to make affidavit that they are regularly ordained, and are engaged in no other occupation. A certificate was recently received from a preacher at Salina, Neb., who added after the words, "I am engaged in no other business or occupation," the phrase, "But in preaching the unsuchible richs of god's Word."

THE new English gun weighs I am afraid to say how many hundred thousand tons, and carries a projectil weighing you wouldn't believe how many thousand pounds; but, at any rate, it costs eight hundred dollars every time it is fired. And one day last week they spent thirty-two hundred dollars missing a target four times. This may be war, but, to a plain man, it looks a great deal more like extravagant foolishness —Burdette.

CONVERTING THE AMERICAN EAGLE INTO AN ECCLESIASTICAL HEN.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Society of American Artists hav opened their gallery on Sunday, at Fifth avenue and Nineteenth street.

THE Executiv Committee of the American Museum of Natural History in Central Park hav made a formal proposition to the board of Estimate and Apportionment to open their museum on Sunday if the city will pay the extra expense, which is set at $15,000 per annum.

THE charges against Pastor C. C. Herriott, of St. Paul, are that he used the study attached to the church as an office for his real estate speculations; that he made $9,000 in booming real estate, and while advising his flock to giv one-tenth of all they possess to the Lord, made no such partition of his own profits. He is asked to resign.

THIS note about Dr. Mary Walker is from the Philadelphia Times: Among the guests at the Girard is Dr. Mary Walker, whose natty male attire and general make-up are the subject of discussion, as she passes in and out of the hotel. Her age was the conundrum that agitated a group of gentlemen last evening. "I saw her twenty-five years ago," said one, "and she must hav been thirty years old then." Another one chimed in: "You're wrong. She was not over twenty when she made her first appearance in Washington about 1866. That would make her about forty." Finally a venerable-looking individual, who claimed to know, astonished all present by solemnly assuring the disputants that the subject under consideration was "close on to sixty."

BISHOP FOWLER gave the following advice to ministers at the Fall River Methodist conference: "You are expected to do pastoral business, not social. Remember, and it will save you from trouble. You go into the homes of your parish representing all these ministers and taking all their characters with you. Rather die than come out with soiled garments. I hope you are married. You ought to be. Never hav a relation of which you would be ashamed to tell your wife. Keep that in mind and you will never hav a select conference sitting on your case. So conduct yourself that any man in your parish will be glad to hav you call whether he is at home or not." Now if the preachers will only act upon that advice!

WE consider that the millions of Agnostics and Spiritualists in the United States, with the leaven of Buddhists, are allies of the Jews, for they teach and practice in better spirit what the Jews teach and practice, namely, universal tolerance, justice, charity, philanthropy, and all the great qualities which elevate, dignify, and ennoble human nature. Israel has allies in those brave scientists who by their researches are enlightening the human mind, redeeming it from ignorance and enthroning reason where superstition reigned. We Jews owe a debt of profound gratitude to the Darwins, the Huxleys, the Haeckels, the Drapers, the Buckleys, the Youmans, the Tyndalls, and, in a different sense, to the Beechers of this generation. We owe a debt of profound gratitude to the Voltaires, the Diderots, the Garibaldis, the Mazzinis, the Jeffersons, the Paines, the Humes, the Galileos, the Brunos, the Shelleys, the Franklins, the Copernicuses, the Humboldts, the Washingtons, and all the immortals of the past generations who in defiance of established tyranny, religious and political, proclaimed and defended those eternal truths which are the very soul and essence of civil and religious liberty. Through their teachings and life-works the shackles of the Jews, of mankind, hav been broken in the civilized portion of the Old World and in the New. Yes, through the noble labors of such dauntless and liberty-loving souls the Jew sits in the Parliaments of Italy, France, England and other countries; he sits in Congress and in our state legislatures; he fills eminent diplomatic positions, and in all public and private stations he is the peer of any man.—Jewish Times.

THE Greensboro Workman has a fragment of a diary kept by a lady visitor to Jefferson's residence at Monticello in 1805, and in that diary special mention is made of the style of the house, that some of the floors were inlaid with cherry and other species of fine and costly wood. There was a separate apartment devoted to the philosophical and astronomical apparatus of the president, and this the writer termed one of the most elegant rooms in the house. There was also a powerful telescope, and a writing machine, the latter a present from a gentleman in Paris. The Workman concludes that while it may be true that the style of Mr. Jefferson's house is greatly surpassed by many of the dwellings of modern times, yet it cannot hav been a "rude structure."

WE congratulate the Independent upon the good sense and fairness of this editorial: "We confess that we do not understand for what good reason Congress, after having provided in general terms that there shall be no difference in rates as between different persons, should except ministers of religion from this rule, and allow common carriers, coming within the provisions of the act, to do business for them at reduced rates, as compared with other persons. If the reason be that these ministers are usually poor men, and hence cannot afford to pay as much as other people for the same service, then we reply that this reason in many cases proceeds on a false assumption, and that so far as the assumption is true it proves too much. A great many other people are also poor; and, poverty in the case of ministers being the ground of the exception, then Congress might just as well hav provided that nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any common carrier from giving reduced rates to poor people. It is no harder for a minister to pay the usual rates, because he is poor, than it is for a poor widow or any other poor person to do the same thing. But if the reason for the exception in the case of ministers consists in the mere fact that they are ministers of religion, and not lawyers, or doctors, or merchants, or ordinary workingmen, then we beg leave to say that this, in our judgment, is very far from being a good reason. Ministers of religion, in their business and civic relations, are entitled to no special exemptions or privileges because they are such, and should be subjected to no disabilities of any kind on this ground. They should, so far as law is concerned, be treated simply as citizens, nothing more and nothing less, having the same rights and privileges as all other citizens, subject to the same responsibilities, and bearing the same tax burdens, without any exception in their favor, and without any discrimination against them."

Tales Told Out of School.

IV.

THE REV. DR. JONES'S REPORT CONTINUED.—THE INFIDEL PRESS.

The Infidels, although so numerous all over the country, are not organized. Fortunately for us, they hav not yet learned the secret of organization, and therefore do not know how to raise funds and establish missions in order to spread their principles. Any church which had in its communion so large a number of intelligent, well-to-do people, with a creed or without a creed, like the Campbellites, but with such zeal and self-denial as the Infidels manifest, would be a power in the world. A police force in a city, or a regiment of soldiers in the country, can quell a mob and scatter an insurrection in a little while of vigorous effort, because they are disciplined in the use of weapons, and hav their minds concentrated on a single object. But the Infidels are made up of such a heterogeneous set of independent thinkers that it is impossible to associate them in an organization for practical purposes. The English government and the landlords keep the Irish people in subjection by preventing them from being armed and organized, so that they cannot throw off their oppression, or even conspire to do so. The popish religion has made them trembling slaves to their priests, and the government, taking advantage of this servil spirit, has kept them in political slavery for hundreds of years. If such a miracle could be wrought that the five millions of Irishmen were changed in one night into the same number of nativ Americans, it would be interesting to stand off in a safe place to see the consequences. One year would be long enough time to sweep the landlords out of the island, and restore the soil to its natural owners. They would do it, not by blind dynamite, but by dint of organization, which, whether secret or open, enables one man to chase a thousand, and two to put ten thousand to flight. The secret of organization, and the idea that a river which bears the commerce of a nation on its bosom is made up of the ten thousand little streams that run into it, we Protestants got from the Catholic church, which has been studying the subject and trying its plans for eighteen hundred years. Organization, disciplin, and the perennial flow of the little streams of money into the common treasury are the sine qua non to success for any cause in this world. The Infidels, with amazing stupidity, hav deprived themselvs of this great advantage in fighting the church, by their excessiv individualism, which would scarcely let any dozen of them agree together in killing a copperhead snake. They hate a creed, or anything that looks like it, as a mad bull hates a red flag, and this want of a platform and a policy disintegrates and hamstrings them, so that they cannot marshal their forces in battle array. This sconner at creeds can not much be wondered at when we remember what long and bloody wars hav been raged round dogmas, like the trinity, which no man can understand. And the church may congratulate herself that this lack of organization incapacitates the Infidels for laying siege or making a combined attack, and enables us to regard them simply as an insurgent mob, without arms, without disciplin, without a commissariat, and without a leader.

Yet they hav a number of weekly journals, the publishing offices of three of which, being the most important of their number, I personally visited, incognito, and had conversation with their editors. In every instance I found them to be gentlemanly men, candid in answering any questions I put concerning the cause to which they hav dedicated their lives and labors.

at Boston, is the oldest journal of its kind in this country, having been in existence over half a century, and, what is very remarkable, under the conduct of the same editor and publisher. Brother Comstock, who takes the oversight of all this class of papers, informs me that of all the Infidel publications, the Investigator is most free from faults. Mr. Seaver seems to be so amiable a man that, although I would not trust his fangs when irritated any more than I would Ingersoll's, he is in a good measure free from venom in his utterances. I saw his paper regularly during the time I was in the Eastern states, and think Brother Comstock's judgment is correct. But I observe that the Investigator is high-priced, like the other species of the genus, indicating that advertisers do not patronize it extensivly, suspecting, I suppose, its limited circulation. Still, the quality of the paper, and typography, prove that the concern is in a flourishing condition. More than any other paper I hav seen, the Investigator is not so much the mouthpiece of an editor who, once a week, givs an utterance which sets all his subscribers to thinking on some branch or aspect of the cause he advocates, as it is an organ through which any man of any mind can lay his views before the public.

The Freethought journals are peculiar in this. No matter how devoted a Christian a man may be, if he offers an article in defense of his own opinions, or in direct opposition to those advocated by the paper, it will be given a conspicuous place in its columns. It must be confessed that the Infidel editors are the only men in the country who hav the courage of their opinions, and prove it by allowing complete freedom of thought and utterance. On this account I learn that the Spiritualists extensivly patronize them, because, while the Infidel editors to a man are Materialists, and do not believe in the immortality of the soul, they publish articles in favor of this doctrin as readily as they do those of their own kidney. Our religious papers, in their exclusiv devotion to orthodoxy, seem to hav no confidence in the inherent power of truth to defend itself by cutting its way through ignorance and prejudice till it reaches the conviction of the judgment. They expose themselvs to the criticism of acute observers that a constant advocacy of their own one-sided views, and a constant refusal to giv a hearing to the other side of the question, betrays a secret suspicion that their opinions are not defensible by argument. A religious paper would not dream of publishing one of Ingersoll's lectures, and dissecting it, and showing its fallacy to its readers, for fear such discussion might do harm to or displease some of its subscribers. But the Infidel editors would like nothing better than to publish the most orthodox sermon in their columns, so that their readers might see the contrast between orthodoxy and Infidelity, and learn the reasons which each party givs for the faith that is in them. We are forced to admit that of the entire press in this country, political or religious, the Infidels alone carry out the idea, and exemplify it, that the press ought to be entirely free, and present and discuss both sides of every question which concerns the welfare of mankind. British statesmen are justly full of wonder at the perfection of the United States Constitution as an organ of political government. It is indebted for this to the full and free discussion that prevailed in the convention which framed it, in all the political papers of the time, and in all the thirteen legislatures, or state conventions, to which it was submitted for examination, adoption, or rejection. There was no smothering of objections. Each framer recognized the fundamental principles of the preamble, and, having the mens conscia recti, they arrived at a unanimity of judgment, which, although not complete, was sufficient to put the governmental machinery in motion, so that its defects, if it has any, might be detected and amended, as was really the case.

In the same city of Boston is

begun is 1876 by Mr. Abbot, a man of superior abilities, but for the last five years in the hands of Mr. Potter, a Unitarian clergyman of extremely "Liberal," which means Infidel, principles; associated with Mr. Underwood, who, for many years, I am told, was a famous lecturer and debater on the questions that divide the church from the Infidels. The Index, in its weekly issues, is the organ of the Free Religious Association, a society which reminds me of the sarcastic phrase lucus a non lucendo, since all the religion there is in their creed of no creed is not enough, as old Dr. Miller used to say to his theological students, "to convert a flea." The paper is a specimen of the fine intellectual culture which the transcendentalists of New England hav reached, and of those who edit it, and write for its columns. No one can read or understand it unless he is a good way removed above mediocrity in mind and attainments; and on this very account it can do no possible harm to the rank and file which compose the body of the church. Its arrows are beautifully feathered, pointed, and poisoned, and fatal when they strike, but in the present war go entirely over the heads of the common people, and produce no results which should alarm our fears. Changes of the kind desired by the Infidels, in order to be successful, and permanent in their effects and influence, must begin below, instead of above, especially in a republican government like this, where the people rule. The church's sheet anchor, in the storm now hurtling in the heavens, is the common people, and the women; and these, thank God, are out of reach of the weapons wielded by the Index, and its like.

Not so with

"THE NEW YORK TRUTH SEEKER."

This, I should judge, is the best supported and most influential of all the Infidel papers I hav seen. It is embellished every week with cartoons illustrating some passage of scripture, and designed by caricature to destroy the reverence the common people hav for the word of God as an inspired and infallible revelation from heaven. Some of the subscribers who had been trained up in Sabbath-schools and Bible classes and who had been taught to regard as sacred all that was within the lids of the Bible are still shocked at the blasphemy of these cartoons, and in some instances hav quit supporting the paper; but enough hold on, and cheer the artist who is prostituting his fine talents in bringing reproach upon the scriptures. I spent several hours one day in THE TRUTH SEEKER office reading the titles of the books which filled the shelves of the salesroom, and glancing, when tempted to do so, at their contents. The document marked A, which accompanies this report, is a printed catalog of the books for sale at this office. These publications, numbered by the hundreds, constitute what our devoted fathers would hav called the very armory of hell, all the weapons of which were forged by the devil and his angels to be used against Christ and his kingdom. These books and pamphlets, each of which is a siege-gun loaded to the muzzle with deadly explosivs, are cheaply but well printed, and circulated everywhere by mail, and offered for sale to the people at the close of every public lecture. Brother Comstock, our saintly but gallant chevalier, told me that he had done his best to throw a lariat round the neck of THE TRUTH SEEKER concern and bring it to the ground, but it defies his skill and goes on flourishing like a green bay-tree.

What Objections to Christianity?

None can recall without feelings of pity; the human heart goes out in sympathy with those countless martyrs, who hav been, first by one party and then by another, led for their opinions to the stake. But all of these had, in their hour of supreme trial, what they considered an unfailing support. The journey from this world to the next, though through a trial of suffering, was a passage from a transient trouble to eternal happiness, an escape from the cruelties of earth to the charities of heaven.

The martyr believed that through the dark vale an invisible friend would lead him, a kind hand would guide him the more safely on account of the terrors of the flames. For Bruno there was no such consolation; the philosophical opinions for the sake of which he laid down his life gave him no such support, unless truth can be said to do so. The last great battle of life must be fought alone.

Is there not something grand, something majestic, in the attitude of this solitary man—something which even his enemies must hav admired—as he stood alone before his inexorable judges, no advocate, no witness present, none but the familiars of the Inquisition, clad in black, moving stealthily about? The tormentors and rack are in the vaults below. He is simply told that he is guilty of heresy, and must recant. He tells them that he does not receive the sentence with as much fear as they giv it, and perhaps, for he has often done so before, that they, too, are of the same belief. What grandeur in this unshaken firmness of purpose, this inflexible adherence to the truth! What greatness in this moral resolution, compared with the scene that occurred almost sixteen centuries previously in the hall of Caiaphas, the high priest, and Christ cast his gaze upon Peter; and yet it is upon Peter that the church has grounded her right to do as she did to Bruno!

But posterity is now offering a tardy expiation for this great ecclesiastical crime, and there will soon, we trust, be a statue erected that will for ages haunt the occupants of the Vatican. And, what is yet a better tribute to the honor of this noble man, and will be more enduring than bronze or marble, the Liberals of this country date the Era of Man from the execution of Bruno, and this is Anno Scientiæ 287.

And the illustrious Galileo fared but little better at the hands of the church. When he published his work vindicating the Copernican theory, the Congregation of the Index declared it heretical, the author was ordered to recant and abjure his error on pain of death. To this Galileo yielded. The church then had rest for sixteen years, when Galileo again ventured to publish another work, when again he was summoned to Rome to answer to the charge of heresy, and there, with his hand on the Bible, through the fear of death, he is forced to deny what he knows to be true.

What a scene! This venerable man, the most prominent of his age, forced by a degraded church and despicable priesthood to deny the truth! He was then cast into prison for the remaining ten years of his life, and when he died he was considered so much of an Infidel that he was denied burial in consecrated ground.

Kepler, too, was driven from his chair in the university, which he had so long and honorably filled, because his discoveries were not conformable to the scriptures. The church, not content with burning, imprisoning, and otherwise persecuting the apostles of truth, has given them a name she thinks most odious—that of Infidel. The church has fought with all her might every new-born science, and distilled her venom upon every progressiv idea, until forced to accept it, when, with the consistency for which she is famous, she will take the new philosophies under her fostering care and name them "Christian."

We need not search history in order to verify this statement. Our own times furnish plenty of illustrations. While the church can no longer punish for disbelief, yet she continues to hurl her anathemas at every bold doubter, and from pulpit and press hav been flung sneers at all the leading scientists of the day. It has not been long since you would hear from every pulpit in Christendom the names "Darwin" and "monkey" hissed with an idiotic sneer that quite revealed the missing link. But at present the church offers but a mild opposition to the theory of evolution, and it will not be long until that will be considered a Christian doctrin, and its immortal author will soon be placed in the calendar of Christian saints.

It is perfectly consistent with the doctrin of infallibility for the church to persecute. For if her authority is from omnipotence, if she is infallible, she cannot err; her decision must be final. Everything that is contrary to her doctrins must be pernicious and cannot be tolerated. And if it is absolutely necessary for the salvation of the world that mankind should accept this religion, it is far better to persecute a few Infidels here than allow their wicked doctrins to spread and drag a large portion of humanity to perdition with them. And if God is going to punish to all eternity those who deny the Lord, it is perfectly right that his representativs should torture them just a little here, by way of an introductory to what they will get hereafter.

Though the church can no longer kill or imprison for disbelief, she can silence an adversary about as effectually by throwing her influence against him and ruining him financially and socially. Many a man who, with a little investigation, would be valuable in the Liberal ranks, is awed into submission through fear of being ostracized by the church; and the church is not anxious about his salvation so long as she can extract the dollars from his pocket.

Through this cursed influence of the church the vices of nations are fearfully multiplied, people being forced to purchase immunity with deceit and safety with falsehood. Men, being forced to be dishonest with themselvs, become dishonest with others, and for the sake of position and profit proudly wear the garb of hypocrisy, woven by the cunning hands of priests.

What crime can there be in an honest doubt? Is an earnest investigation to be rewarded by suffering excruciating tortures for all eternity? Must a man throw away his reason, that lamp which guides him through the darkness to the realm of truth, and believe a senseless superstition, in order to be saved? It seems to me that the man who would refuse to reason and investigate should be the one to be damned.

Although it may be consistent for an infallible church to persecute, it is not consistent with truth.

If the doctrins of the church be true, why need they fear to hav its claims investigated? Truth does not fear inquiry, but courts it. The reason why priests and clergymen hav always taught that it was a sin to doubt, that God was angry with the dissenter, was because, in my opinion, with them a secret fear prevailed that their superstition might be false.

If Christianity is true, there need be no fear of an honest inquiry into its claims, for if true, it will come through the fire unscathed, and if not true, everyone should rejoice in knowing it, for no one should wish to entertain erroneous opinions.

If nature is from the same divine source as Christianity is claimed to be, why is not God as jealous of one as the other? One may deny with perfect freedom every fact of nature. We may deny every truth of astronomy, deride every law of physics, hold in contempt every proposition of geometry, and scoff at the multiplication table, and neither God nor the preachers would care. The only ology God is jealous of is theology, and when that is assailed, an army of half a million priests rise to defend his favorit subject.

If Christianity is a religion of truth, purity, and love, those believing in that religion ought to be charitable to an opponent. And if God is the founder of such a religion, he ought to be able to maintain it without the aid of the civil power. Everyone ought to feel its divine influence. But instead of Christianity filling men's hearts with love, it has filled their hearts with hatred, as the long record of cruelties and crimes of the church will prove, and the sooner such a religion is banished from the world the better for humanity.

The Christian asks us what we will giv in place of his religion. He claims we tear down and do not build. But if we wish to build a new house where an old one stands, do we not first hav the old one to remove? It is true we giv no creeds in place of the old ones, we furnish you with no superstitious dogmas in place of Christianity; we endeavor to clear the mind of error that truth may be received from every source. With us dogmas are nothing; they hav to be given up, and in every progressiv movement this is the case. Hav not the more recent and liberal Christian sects given up many dogmas held by the older ones? They hav outgrown some few creeds and dogmas, and the Freethinker has outgrown them all. We no longer need them.

If you were sick, would you ask the doctor what he would giv in place of the disease? The disease is eradicated that you may exercise yourself a whole man. So, with us, we wish to tear error and superstition from the human mind, so that the intellect may be exercised unbiased and without fear.

The time is not yet ripe for Freethought social organizations to take the place of the church, though in many places this is being done, and will be done when the time is ready for it.

One may do as much good out of the church as in. To giv up superstition and accept rationalism does not pluck the flower of pity from a single human breast. Our hearts go out in sympathy for the sufferer as do those of the Christian. Bible or no Bible, faith or no faith, creed or no creed, the angel of love goes forth on her errands of mercy. Theology or no theology, we can endeavor to make our fellow-creatures happy, for the "place to be happy is here, and the time to be happy is now." The sick and the suffering can be visited and their burdens relieved. The naked can be clothed and the hungry fed. Let us then turn our attention to bettering the condition of ignorant, misguided, suffering humanity, and let gods and devils take care of themselvs. Let us no longer offer our sacrifices on the altar of an angry and revengeful God that does not exist, but let us offer our sacrifices at the shrine of humanity.

Dexterville, Wis. GEO. H. DAWES.

The Dawn of Reason.

The weakness of Christianity is in its non-obedience to the commands of Christ himself. It is selling paste stones for diamonds, a pirate ship sailing under false colors. The whole scheme of salvation may be an outcome of ignorant superstition, as doubtless it is, but that does not absolve the church from following in the footsteps of Jesus Christ, who was, in fact or fiction, an embodiment of fraternal love. But the evidence of God's love for man, as revealed by the history of Christ, finds no parallel in the history of the church. Its pages are smeared with the records of wars, burnings, tortures, and the terrible deaths of its martyrs in the past, and the continual hate and dissensions in its ranks to-day. If it is a message from the creator, this so-called religion, it has been fearfully misunderstood. In lieu of fraternal love, we see the whole aim and effort of the church to be a worship of forms and ceremonials, and a cringing flattery offered up to God.

I believe the creativ power has spoken to man, has given him commands, just what to do and just what not to do, and that the voice of God that has thus spoken finds it echo in the very instinct and nature of man himself. Nature, and man's relation to it, is the religion which we should all study and seek to understand. We need no books to do this, but we need a little plain analytical thought, a sort of turning round to see who we are. As the new-born child turns instinctivly for sustenance to the breast of the mother from whom it sprung, so man turns to the earth for his support, and finds it there always and unerringly. As the mother's breast is always bared and her arms ready to embrace in love the suckling child, so the creator's arm is always extended, and, holding out to man the fertil earth, he bids him to a life-long feast. Now this is as plain as if we heard it spoken from the clouds.

There can be no mistaking this: it is the voice of God. To all forms of animal life the invitation is extended, and by all forms of animal life it is accepted, and not until we come to the highest animal (man) do we find an organized attempt to shut out and prevent an equitable division of the bounty of God.

It is man's greed arrayed against the beneficence of nature; it is man's contempt for the divine will clearly expressed in a universal language. This is the giant sin of the civilization of this age, the monopolization of the land, and the extortions of the masses by a privileged class.

Though all are bidden to the feast, the majority deem themselvs fortunate if they get the crumbs.

Now, right on top of this foundation of gigantic and universal sin against nature, against God, and against man, is built a church which pretends that love to man is the cause of its existence. Would not hate to man be a better word?

We hear the clergy speak of the will of God, but they get it from a book, and expatiate and enlarge upon it, some giving one version and another a different one of the same sentence or command.

The religion of the future will take its texts from the revealed will of God as expressed in his handiwork. Not from musty records of the past, but from ever-living evidences of preördained equity of provision for all, shall spring a religion which will be love, and, being love, will be divine. It must come. The shackles of superstition are falling off of blind idolaters; the barbarism of orthodoxy is fading before the dawn of God-given reason; and slowly but surely the fact is looming up that the true worship of God is obedience to his will as expressed in nature.

That wonderful mystery, the fragrant rose, which blooms in my garden, sprang from the dull earth, emitting sweet odor, and delighting the eye by its beautiful color, has reached its perfect development unimpeded by obstacle or unsatisfied want It has fulfilled its destiny and fades and dies away, but to the last sends forth its fragrant tribute of gratitude to its creator.

But alas for man! With abounding nature already to minister to his every want, he finds his brother man engaged in putting obstacles, and digging pitfalls for him, in his quest for sustenance.

He monopolizes and holds the land, and enslaves his brother man. And the monopolist has more regard for a beast than he has for his own race. There must be a squaring round, a righting up of the universal and brutal wrongs to labor the world over. It is coming now, and faster than many suppose. The masses are becoming intelligent, their dull eyes begin to glitter with the light of common sense. The mockery of religion has unmasked itself, and is no longer the bugaboo that can frighten them into submission to the will of their enslavers. Let us keep due on to victory. This government affords peaceful means to right our wrongs. Anarchists are lunatics and fanatics, and retard the progress of the cause. They should be denounced and expelled from every labor organization in the country. They may be likened to an idiot who, with others, is on a raft in the river, and discovering a rotten plank in its make-up takes an ax and deliberately destroys it, thereby drowning himself and all the rest on board. The best place for an Anarchist is the lunatic asylum. There he may build his chaotic realm of destruction in his mind and be harmless, but at large he is a dangerous animal. The labor cause does not want him, never did want him, but the subsidized press of the country would hav it appear that a labor reformer and Anarchist are identical.

There is redress for labor's wrongs in the peaceful ballot-box. There is release from the shackles of ancient superstition, of obligatory forms and ceremonies, in the manly assertion of reason over a blind and illogical fear of the wrath of God. To the toiling masses who support in non-productiv idleness the large army of shysters, preachers, dudes, and their millionaire fathers, royalty and its off-shoots of dukes, lords, etc., this frightening the poor toilers into a fear of the wrath of God in the next world is the most shame-faced of all the monstrous humbuggery that has been rammed down their throats for centuries.

But just now many of them are raising their erstwhile downcast eyes, and, looking this ridiculous lie squarely in the face, are wondering how it was ever possible for them to believe it. It is a libel on the creator to condemn the greatest and most marvelous of his works—man—and accuse God of placing him in a world with the chances largely in favor of his being damned eternally. Yet this is the God of the Bible and the weapon which is used to keep in submission the honest workman. There is no such God as this in existence; there never was, nor never will be. The cause of life, the creation of worlds, with the mysterious power of evolutionary growth of endless forms of animals and vegetable life, is, and has always been and will ever be, an unsolvable mystery. That it ever emanated from a God, shaped after the fashion of man, who gets mad at his own work and damns it right and left, is a barbaric notion which solidifies all the horrors of heathenism, and, curiously enough, is called Christianity.

We hail the dawn of reason as the sure harbinger of the emancipation of industrial slavery.

Afraid of the Church.

It is surprising and painful, the cowardice of our literary and scientific writers. Many of these gentlemen are a disgrace to humanity and to letters. They fear to write what they know to be the truth, lest the priesthood and its dupes should be offended. They state whole falsehoods and half truths; they slur, they cover up, they pervert, distort, and discolor.

In Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly I hav just stumbled upon a case in point. Arthur Vaughan Abbot, in an article entitled "The Telescope and its Revelations," is speaking of the sphericity of the earth and its revolution through space. He adds:

> But scarcely three hundred years hav passed since the highest representativs of science and art in the then civilized world assembled to compel a poor, insignificant Italian astronomer to declare that the world was stationary.

Shame upon you, Arthur Vaughan Abbot! Why did you not tell the truth? Why did you lie? You knew that these "highest representativs of science and art" assembled, not as scientists, but as dignitaries of the Christian, the Roman Catholic, church, and that their condemnation of Galileo's teachings was spoken authoritativly as priests and prelates of that church. They spoke for the church, in the interests of the church, not for science and in the interests of science, as you hav dishonestly tried to make your readers believe. Perhaps it was not incumbent upon you, in writing an article upon astronomy, to state that the church which then condemned and sought to silence Galileo exists to-day; that it claims to be infallible, and that it is the same crafty, cruel, and malignant foe of science, truth, and liberty. But you were bound to tell the truth of history, and not falsify in the interests of the church that forced Galileo upon his knees, and wrung a lie from his reluctant and trembling lips. Such prevaricators as you, Mr. Abbot, are stumbling-blocks in the way of progress. You are a shame to the noble profession of letters. You are unworthy to speak in the name of science.

The Rev. Hate Evil Mossback.

I suppose there are few men in the world who can tell good stories as long, without telling the same one twice, as my uncle who livs in Maine. Of course, the story sounds a great deal better than it reads, because the reader loses the inflection of the narrator's voice and a pronunciation that no spelling can illustrate. Then he has a way of holding the listener with his eye, makes appropriate pauses, and throws in little glittering bits of profanity which sound well enough, but would look out of place in print. In the following narrativ which he relates names of persons and places are suppressed, as he is settled in a sparsely populated country, where all who liv or hav lived anywhere within a considerable distance for a generation are known to all the rest, and putting anyone's name in print is likely to lead to remark. My uncle has no great respect for ministers. The pay they receive in his locality is not large enough to attract a man who can make his living anywhere else, so that the specimens of the cloth seen there are not flattering representativs of their profession. He said to me one day, "Boy, did I ever tell you about old Elder Mossback and his lost ax?" I replied that he had not, but I hoped he would, and he said he supposed he might as well tell it then as any time. After pausing a few moments to gather up in his mind the details of what he was about to relate, and arrange them in the proper order, he said:

To commence at the beginning, as long ago as 1850 to '60 there used to be a kind of a gospel prodder and holy stake-driver lived over to Owlsburg, in this prohibition state, by the name of Mossback—Hate Evil Mossback his full name was. He owned a few acres of land, with what he called his dommysile on it, that he made his headquarters, and where he used to rally from when he made his raids on the world and Satan. His wife stayed there for a garrison to hold the fort when the parson was away. He was a preacher by profession, but by trade he was the biggest kind of a tramp. Honesty didn't enter into his composition at all. The storekeeper over there to Owlsburg trusted him once for some truck to keep him from starving, and had to dun him for his pay, and then never got a cent of it. Finally he gave it up and went out to work peeling bark for twenty-five cents a day and boarded himself. He said he wanted that money the elder owed him, and it was a dumbed sight easier to get it that way than to collect it of old Mossback.

Fearfully and wonderfully made they say a man is. Well, if there was anything that was fearful about old Mossy it was his appetite, and the most wonderful feature he had was his feet; they were big enough for a giant. Then he had legs like a giraffe, the body of a fifteen-year-old boy, and a head, by godfrey, about as big as your two fists. Much as six foot four inches tall, he was, and didn't weigh over a hundred and forty after a meal. His mouth couldn't hav been made any bigger without setting his ears back so they'd touched behind his head, and his nose, had been poked around through the scripture so often looking after smut that the end of it was twisted way off to one side.

The few acres of land he had was wet and stony as the devil, and a better working man would starve on it the first year, and so would the parson if he hadn't depended more on his begging than he did on farming. He generally tried to raise a few potatoes and peas to lengthen out his "salary," as he called what folks gave to get rid of him.

In all the time he preached at Owlsburg old Mossy never was known to hav his seed on hand in planting time. Instead of saving anything he went around the settlement and picked up what he could, a little here and a little in 'tother place, and carried it home and planted it. They asked him why he didn't plant more, and he said that land that wasn't planted didn't hav to be hoed, and saved labor. As lazy a man as ever lived in the world.

One winter potatoes had rotted pretty bad, and every bushel a man had in the spring was as good as a dollar, cash money. Things looked pretty mountainous for old Holy Joe, and he didn't see where he was going to get his potatoes to plant. Well, sir, he rallied and cast his eyes around for new fields, and dumbed if they didn't light on a settlement about four miles away that went by the name of Goldcoast. There were quite a number of Christians in the place, rich as the devil in faith, but poorer than skimmed poverty in every other way. They had been supporting a gospel prodder for a number of years—one of these exhorters that would open up hell right in front of them so that the faithful would hang onto their seats to keep from dropping into it, and he'd pretty near cleaned the camp out of loose change.

There were others in the settlement that didn't take any more stock in ministers than you and I do—five or six of them, farmers, all but one; he was a carpenter. The leader was old man Porson. He used to say he didn't mind giving a poor tramp of a preacher a dollar if he had earned it, but any parson that got anything out of him had got to earn it first; and what happened afterward showed that the old fellow was right.

This was the settlement that Parson Mossback looked at with both eyes peeled; he knew almighty well that the faithful there couldn't help him, and he was afraid that the others wouldn't, but he'd got to make a rise or starve. So he sends a line to Deacon Spike giving out that he'd be at the school-house on the Goldcoast next Sabber-day, and would hold divine services, the Lord willing, both forenoon and afternoon, and requests him to giv notice to the people to that effect. Same time, of course, he makes it plain to the deacon that a collection would be acceptable.

Sunday came to the Goldcoasters, and with it, sure enough, comes Parson Mossback, ready to do battle with Satan and all his hosts.

Well, he took for his text, "The laborer is worthy of his hire," and then he spread himself for an hour and a half on the duty of Christians to support their leaders, and closed his oration by telling the assembly that he would take up a collection at the end of the afternoon services. The second proceedings passed off about like the first, and then old Mossy asked Deacon Spike to send around the hat and see what he could raise. The deacon came back with one dollar and fifteen cents in the hat, and Elder Mossback began to think that his dumbed sermon hadn't taken hold in the right place. Old man Porson was there, and got up in his seat and apologized for the slimness of the collection. He said he didn't hav much money to giv himself, but if some 'taters would be of any use to the cause he and two or three others would contribute a sackful. The parson said "vegetables was as good as cash" to him. Then old Broadax, the carpenter, felt the spirit move and he followed suit with the offer of an ox-yoke to the Lord if his agent could make any use of it. Everything was grist that came to old Mossback's mill, and he grabbed quick as lightning.

The people had been so all-fired liberal with him, the parson concluded to stop and preach again in the evening. Well, night came and old Mossy was there. He never had but one sermon, and he'd preached it forward and back that day, so in the evening he had to begin in the middle and preach both ways. He howled so towards the end that they thought they'd hav to stop him to save the roof, but he finally calmed down and says, "My frien's," says he, "do not be surprised at my enthusiasm. It's out of the fulness of the heart that the mouth speaketh, and my heart is full of the love of God and of gratitude toward the frien's who hav been so liberal with their substance to-day. You will sing the doxology." They all joined in, and that ended his first and last day's work in the Goldcoast settlement.

Next morning along comes Mr. Broadax over to Brother Searls's, where the parson had gone night before for entertainment, with a yoke big enough for a pair of young elephants, and of no more use to the parson than it was when it stood in the tree, not a dam mite. Then comes old man Porson with the rest of the contribution in a sack as wide as it was long, that held near three bushels. It was full to the mouth, sewed up, and was about as bad to handle as the same heft could be in any shape. When the old man rolled the sack from his wagon, the parson at him to load the thing again and haul it home for him, but Porson swore that he'd promised his horse to a neighbor that day, and couldn't possibly. He would do anything, he said, for a good cause, but he couldn't lie for the best of causes. Then he drove off and left the Rev. Mr. Mossy to get along the best way he could. Old Stake-driver skirmished around the sack for awhile, and said it was the heaviest lot of potatoes he ever saw, if it wasn't he'd be danged.

Well, Brother Searls helped him get the thing on his shoulder, and then tucked the big yoke under his arm, and sent him off. It was four miles to Owlsburg—up a thundering steep hill and then down 'tother side a good deal steeper, and then, by golly, he had another just as bad to go up before he got there.

Old Mossy plowed along, the sweat jumping out of every pore, till he'd gone about three miles. He didn't dare to drop either the sack or the yoke, for he knew he couldn't load them again, alone. After a while he fell in with a neighbor that took the yoke out from in under his arm, and helped him lower the potatoes to the top of a big stump beside the road. He rested a while, took a drink from a spring, and then he got under the sack again and staggered along up the hill. Carrying the potatoes came a good deal too near earning them to suit him, and he believed it was more like doing the work of a jackass than of the master that rode on one. When he finally got home, dropped the yoke on the ground, and tumbled the sack on the floor, he had just wind enough to say to his wife, "Mother, God be praised!" "What's the matter now?" says she. "Matter!" he says, "why, I've got a lasting holt on that nest of Infidels over to Goldcoast. Look at that sack of potatoes. Do you think they would giv that liberal if I hadn't touched their ungodly hearts? Another such exercise of the power of God, and I'll convert the whole of them." "Amen," his wife says, "but I'd rather hav something to eat than convert a hundred Infidels." "Open that sack, then," yells old Mossy; and he went to work at it with his knife, and she bore a hand with the shears. "Seems to me," says the old lady, "that there's something in this sack besides potatoes;" and sure enough, by thunder, the first thing she struck when they got the bag open was a stone as big as a man's fist. "And here's another," she goes on, "and another, and another. 'Pears to me these taters 'll need sortin' 'fore they're cooked," she says. The parson didn't say a word till he'd divided the sheep from the goats. There might hav been a hundred and thirty-five pounds of potatoes, and dum nigh stones enough to make the heft up to two hundred. Then the parson opened. "Saint Mulligan and Jim Blaine!" says he, "if that ain't meanness!" and he cussed the Goldcoasters in the name of death and taxes. The whole lot of 'em, he said, could go to tophet, and back again, before he'd ever break the bread of life to such a golblasted community. And that's the last time old Mossback ever preached in that settlement.

I here broke in to remind my relativ that he had promised to tell me about Elder Mossback's Lost Ax. He gazed at me a moment with a look that was half astonishment and half reproof, and then, without further notice of my interruption, proceeded:

Elder Mossback passed the time between that and the next morning, Indian fashion, sleeping and eating; and then he said to the old woman that he guessed he would clear a little piece of land of logs and brush, and put his crop in new ground. For a while he put in hard, but it seemed to him all the time that the logs grew heavier, and the work began to drag. He hadn't entirely got rested from his yesterday's tramp carrying the potatoes and rocks, so finally our sky-pilot farmer sets himself down on a log and goes to sleep. While he snoozes away, getting rested, along comes one of the neighbors' boys and picks up old Mossy's ax and drops it into a hollow stump. Then he skipped. Bimeby up wakes the reverend stake-driver, and goes to take up his ax, and lo and behold ye! his ax is gone. Down he flops on his knees and prays for a while the best he knows. Then he looks where he left his ax. No use, the ax isn't there. Then he prays again, harder than before. Same result. He tries it again, and this time he tucks in for all he is worth, and lays siege to the throne of grace with a powerful and long-continued address, but there wasn't any more sign of an ax around than when he began.

The parson went home pretty well tuckered out and feeling bad generally. He laid it all to the Goldcoasters. They had trifled with him, the devil had got away with his ax, and the Lord hadn't answered his prayers. So he sat around the rest of the week, and instead of planting his potatoes he eat every one of them, and didn't hav any for seed after all.

Sunday morning he thought he would go to the Methodist meeting and see what was going on in that camp. The minister was away and they were holding an experience meeting, and invited him to join in. As soon as he got the floor the experience of the past week came over him, and instead of praising God, he went on to tell them about the trouble he'd had with the Goldcoasters. He told how his hopes of having made an impression on the unbelievers had been raised by their liberal gifts, about his journey home, and the rock sandwiches he'd found in the sack; and then he came to the lost ax. Says he, these are his words:

"I had worked hard all the forepart of the day, and in the afternoon, being fatigued, I sot down upon a log to rest. From that I dropped upon my knees for a season of prayer, and arose refreshed in body and mind. Soon I wanted my ax, and stepped to where I had laid it down, but, my brethren, it was gone. I looked round and round, and around and around, and could not find it. I prayed the second time and searched again, around and around, and round and round, but no ax. I prayed again for the third time, in perfect faith, and then looked round and round, around and around. No ax-ah. Then once again, my brethren, did I lay mighty siege to the throne of grace, still in perfect faith; but when I arose-ah, and looked round and round-ah, and around and around-ah, still my ax was gone-ah. Then I came to the belief that the devil had taken it away-ah. But since I hav been in this meeting-ah, new light has been given me, and at last I know that the devil hasn't got my ax, but it's gone up, GONE UP-ah, to swamp a road for me!"

Well, the parson impressed the folks at the Methodist experience meeting powerfully, and they agreed that perhaps the ax had gone to heaven to swamp a road for him; but it wouldn't go down outside, and when he passed the hat after that some one always hove rocks into it in memory of old man Porson, till finally you couldn't hire him to say collection for a hatful. The last I heard of him he had sold his place, packed his gripsack, and gone to Boonton, New Jersey, and there I hope the peace that passeth understanding, but which he didn't find at Goldcoast, will abide with him forever.

"There," said my uncle, "you hav the story of the Rev. Hate Evil Mossback and His Lost Ax; and the next time I start to tell you anything, don't interrupt me before I am half-way through." G. E. M.

Mrs. Slenker in Her Own Defense.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: I hope you will not think I've been doing anything very criminal that I am in jail. Yet I presume the great outside world will think it one of the worst sins that could be brought against a woman, for I am charged with violating the Comstock law by mailing obscene matter.

You see, I'm a faithful follower, as well as worshiper, of our old hero, D. M. Bennett; yet I hav never craved martyrdom, for I do not see the good of it, nor am I made of the stuff that produces first-class martyrs. But though using all the caution my frank, honest, truthful nature would admit of to avoid the very position I am now occupying, I hav all along suspected it would only be a question of time ere some of Comstock's agents would decoy me into mailing him just what he wanted, as has really occurred.

While not desiring to claim any reflected honors by comparing my case with that of my dear old friend Bennett, yet we really hav many points in common. Our birthday was the same, though not the same year. He was reared a Shaker, and I a Quaker, both sects teaching the need of a pure morality, and especially a pure sexual morality. He had the warmest friends and the meanest enemies, and so hav I. He was the most honest, and frank, and radical of men, and I follow in his footsteps. I could no more help doing what I hav done than I could change my whole nature. And now, wherein consists my crime? I deny that I hav committed any crime. I deny that the matter I hav mailed is, taken as a whole, obscene.

You will many of you remember that some years ago I wrote a series of articles for THE TRUTH SEEKER on "Sexual Intemperance"—articles so radical, sexually, as to be objectionable to many of the readers of the paper, and to be finally stopped as dangerous to its well-being. These articles received the warmest approbation from S. P. Andrews, Elizur Wright, Theron C. Leland, and hosts of other radical reformers. They grew out of reading the Alpha, and becoming convinced that the methods therein advocated was the best known way of settling the vexed question of the relation of the sexes as regards the propagativ act and its consequences. These articles I continued for years in the Alpha, and won much commendation from its editor and readers. But, alas! I read the poems of the "good, gray poet," and quoted from his "Leaves of Grass," and committed several like indiscretions, and was finally shut out from its chaste columns.

In the mean time, "Diana" was published, and sent me by Mrs. Burnz (the publisher, though it came out first minus the name of any publisher). At first I was not interested in the book, though acknowledging its tenor to be good. Finally Mrs. Burnz wrote me urging a careful review of the book. Then I commenced studying it in earnest, and you who know me know I do nothing by halves. I got in correspondence with the author, and he sent me a package of the books to sell or giv away at discretion. I did not sell many, but distributed them among medical men and women, and all others where I thought they would be appreciated and finally do good work.

I received by express, and also from the author (by hand) a lot of sexual experiences collected from all classes of people who would giv them. These were in type-writing, and had been collected by Diana as the ground-work of his book, and typed off in classes or sets, giving the for and against of various ideas advocated in the book. These "Leaflets," as they are called, had in my eyes one serious objection. The words used to denote the sexual organs and their functions were ones which I supposed were never used save by the vulgar. I was disgusted, shocked, and amazed at the free use here made of them. I protested, argued, and objected, only to be converted and convinced at every point. That is, convinced that in proper hands they are short, emphatic, clear, and not misunderstandable—that no others hav ever been found to fill their place so completely as they had done. Little by little I commenced sending out these leaflets to those who were really interested in the study of sex and Dianaism. I lost many friends by it—friends who were shocked by the words, as well as the subjects treated upon. But having been a student at the feet of nature all my life, I became daily more and more interested in sex as the origin of all organized existences.

I received letters on sexual matters from all parts of the country, and from England and Canada, nearly all commending the work I was doing, but a few here and there writing out of curiosity, and some penning real personal obscenity.

I answered all respectfully and earnestly, either ignoring the objectionable portions or kindly advising the writer to lift himself on a higher plane. I don't think one of my correspondents (and they are legion) will deny that they were really made purer and better by what I wrote them. I did not work for money, for though I asked that all should furnish stamps for replies, I was money out on time and stationery. A few were generous, but the many expect more than they giv, and being more ready to giv than ask, I hav made no financial profit out of all the years of work in this line. I did my home-work and made pen-work only a side issue and a mental recreation. All the while I kept myself as prudish personally as a Quaker. I firmly believe in monogamic marriage, and hav faithfully performed my obligation as daughter, sister, wife, mother, and grandmother, as well as citizen and neighbor, and aimed to giv to the world truth and morality as I saw it.

I hav a circle of friends, mostly strangers to me personally, who are, like myself, students of sex, hygiene, and morality. We hav for years passed our letters from one to the other, each putting his or her mark on what has been read, so that none will be resent to the same person. We collect all cases of "mother's marks," of deformed children, idiots, etc., that we can, and try to learn the causes thereof, so that a better heredity may be given to future generations by avoiding the mistakes of the present and past. We circulated slips from papers and medical works, and were really a vast school of devoted students, seeking the forbidden fruits of the tree of sexual knowledge.

Had I been like the majority of the ring, merely a private citizen, I should probably hav escaped suspicion, or been considered as game not worth hunting down. But my persistent attacks upon error, superstition, and fraud of all kinds, and the numerous communications I penned for some twenty-five or thirty different papers, caused me to make many a bitter and implacable enemy, some of whom swore years ago to destroy my work if I was destroyed with it. They may destroy me, but the work will last. The seed is sown, the harvest is being gathered, and year by year the crops will increase in extent and value.

In my sixtieth year I find myself in jail. On Thursday last, April 28th, about 11 A.M., three men came in while I was writing an article on "Charity." I at once divined their object, and was not at all surprised when they said that they had come on official business, involving the mailing of unmailable matter.

After a short talk I was informed that in fifteen minutes I must go to Lynchburg with them. I had not anticipated so sudden an arrest, but sent one of them to the woolen mill for Mr. Slenker, and one to Rev. Dr. Bullard's and to Mr. Smith for credentials as to my character as a citizen; then, throwing a few things in a hand-bag, I was off, not saying good-bye to any one for fear of breaking down.

I do not know how they all take it at home. It came on them like a thunder-clap—though my husband and son know something of what I was doing, but nothing of the scope and extent of the work. They had warned me over and over of danger, but something I could not resist impelled me onward.

I saw the terrible need of work, and that only a daring few would do it. It needed a woman, clean, pure, and honest, who would take hold and dig deep. It needed one who could reach the heart and speak to the innermost; one who, like the Abolitionists of slavery times, would throw herself into the cause, daring all and braving all for the good that was to grow out of it.

I had a long, cold, rough ride to Central. We arrived three minutes of train time, and got to Lynchburg between 7 and 8 P.M., and by dusk I was behind the bars for the first time in my life.

It was not pleasant to hear the key turn upon me. I was half sick from nervous excitement and the long, cold trip. The room was large and decent, but no fire, so I had to go to bed to keep warm, but did not sleep a wink all night. I never can eat or sleep when I am distressed. I felt so alone. Not knowing even yet how they take it at home. It must be terrible for them. All my little annoyances are as nothing to the thought of involving those I love. The reporter of the Lynchburg News called to interview me. I gave him a brief statement, but hav not seen his report. I was promised a paper by several, but hav received none. I was not allowed even a pencil and paper to write.

About nine in the morning I had a hearing, or whatever they call it. As I looked around on the room full of men, and saw myself the object of the gathering of magnates of the law, as well as of curiosity hunters, I wondered if woman would ever be tried by her peers.

I was offered counsel, but I felt it was useless, as no one could understand the case as well as I did, so I made a simple statement (after the public reading of some of the captured letters and leaflets). I explained why they were circulated, and why plain words were used. I said I had been informed that taken as a whole they were not obscene, and consequently were mailable, though I knew it was probable that the average jury would pronounce them obscene.

The investigators and so-called conservers of morality decided that the case must come before the court in Abingdon, Va., in June, and I was to be taken to Wytheville jail, as being the most comfortable jail in the district, and nearer home (thirty miles, I believe, from Snowville).

The officers were all kind, and the marshal (Mr. Jordan, of Newbern, Va.) was especially kind and sympathetic. He brought me here, and commended me to the especial care of the jailer, and saw that I had pen, ink, and paper, and the privilege of writing all I wished, and that letters from me to him could go unread. He promised to do all he could to hav me bailed out, the bail being $2,000. It was most midnight when we got here, and the jailer in bed. I was taken to a cold hallway, and Ann, a town pauper, was ordered to share her "bed" with me. It was a blanket spread on the bare floor, and another to cover us. An open door in front led to a room where a man lay with a broken leg, and Ann waited on him. All around us were doors of iron bars, and behind each was a prisoner, singing, swearing, and using real obscenity. Overhead was a man who was religiously insane. He prayed, cried, preached, and sang; roared, stamped, and raged alternately, while the prisoners aggravated him by calling him a liar and other opprobrious names, just to make amusement for themselvs by hearing him rave. It was a long time ere I got warm, but finally, as I had not slept a wink since leaving home, tired nature conquered, and I was oblivious of all. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

A Challenge to Comstock, the Christian.

From Pomeroy's Democrat.

Anthony Comstock. You are hereby notified that in our library are books and pictures of the class that you deem immoral. That we hav in our library and in our private office pictures of men, women, and children in undress uniform. That we hav art journals and illustrated medical and surgical books in which the anatomy of the human form can be seen naked by the naked eye. That we hav copies of books that you, in your insane, asinine anxiety to get hold of, declare to be "immoral," even as is a crowd of schoolboys in swimming or dancing in the sand along shore.

Also, that if you enter our house, library, sanctum, private office, or place of business to steal, take therefrom, or confiscate our private property until the law has declared such articles by their name to be prejudicial to public morality, and ordered their destruction, we will break your head in case we hav no revolver handy, and throw your dead body into the street.

Our residence is at 18 West Sixty-first street, and our private office is at No. 234 Broadway. Ask the janitor for particulars. We make the proposition in good faith, that we may determin whether a citizen has the right to enjoy his own, duly acquired by purchase or production. We admit that you can lay a complaint against a person; that you may cause his arrest, but we deny your right to act as sheriff, judge, jury, and executioner, no matter whose agent you are. Therefore, if you enter our premises to destroy property that does not conform to your ideas of puritanism on a rampage, we will defend our rights and our property even to your death, if to that we must go in such defense.

Between works of art and works of nastiness there is a wide difference. Educated in nastiness, you are not able to judge as to art, but that is no reason why decent people should suffer. Ambitious to earn your salary and expenses, you serve Anthony Comstock admirably, even as a polecat serves itself well by poking its nose into eggs before they are addled.

If the law under which you proceed permits the existence of originals as works of art, and declares copies to be works of nastiness, the law is an insult and should be repealed. If this law be honest, then the children of decent parents are to be classed as nasty because they are reproductions. We presume your parents to hav been decent people. By the way, while you are doing so much in the line of giving information, would it be asking too much for you to inform the public as to your father and your brothers, if you hav any? Let us know how far back of you the water is clear and the purpose high.

In all you do to maintain the dignity of law and its agents, in all you do to purify the stream of time, we will gladly aid. But why don't you attack your superiors? Why not make your raids upon the persons, property, homes, and rights of the rich? Why not go into the palaces as well as into the hovels? Why let your foolish prejudice and ungovernable anger lead you only to surprise those who hav no means of defense, yet who are better, pûrer, braver, and far more worthy citizens than yourself, even were all you charge them with more than true?

The legislature of New York needs to protect the people of this state by depriving Anthony Comstock of his power for malicious mischief.

Crank or Hypocrit?

From Life.

Mr. Anthony Comstock can see a nastier meaning in an innocent work of art than any adult of our acquaintance. Whatever suggests the human form is, to this man, an indecent thing, and had he held office in the days of Phidias, he would hav delighted in "suppressing" the friezes of the Parthenon. What a magnificent contempt he must hav for the licentious brute who created the Venus of Milo!

The Weary Way of the Blasphemer.

The Morristown court opened at 11 o'clock Tuesday morning, the third instant, and C. B. Reynolds occupied a front seat therein. He was accompanied by his bondsman, Edwin Worman, of Boonton; John Maxfield, of the same place; L. K. Washburn, and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The civil branch of the court had the first innings, and it was not until a grand jury had been impaneled, and the civil calendar called, that the judge who presides in criminal cases took the middle seat on the bench. Then two or three men were naturalized, a young lawyer made a motion, and the court adjourned without referring to Mr. Reynolds.

At the noon recess District-Attorney Cutler was interviewed. He said he would be busy all the week with the grand jury, had some other cases to try the next week, and was not very certain when he would move Mr. Reynolds's trial. At this Mr. Reynolds modestly suggested that the case be dismissed, which the judge would probably do if asked by the district-attorney. The idea was not favorably entertained by the district-attorney. He should, he said, try the case this term, and the court would probably adjourn in two weeks. He would see the judge, and hav the day set; so at 2 P.M. Mr. Reynolds and his friends wandered wearily back to the court room, hoping that the district-attorney would keep his word and interview the judge in time for them to take the afternoon train back to New York.

His honor came in and ascended the bench, the district-attorney looked at him a moment, spoke to a lawyer, and then gathered up his papers and made for the grand jury room. Mr. Reynolds and friends squirmed on the hard seats of the court room, and thought bad thoughts. The Court took up the calendar, called it over again, and at last found a case in which the lawyers were ready for trial. Mr. Reynolds kept his eyes on the door of the grand jury room, through which Mr. Cutler had disappeared, and his friends kept vigilant watch of the clock. The sheriff was ordered to impanel a jury, and twelve men of the vicinage responded to the lottery, took their seats, kissed the Bible, s'helpmegod, and the attorney for the plaintiff addressed them. Mr. Reynolds and his friends never relaxed their watchfulness, and the door of the grand jury room and the clock were indented by the looks directed at them. The case was one of assault and battery, where one railroad engineer had pounded another railroad engineer because the latter had been guilty of ministerial conduct with the former's wife. The plaintiff swore that he had been well thrashed, a doctor corroborated him, and the clock traveled on toward train time, but still no district-attorney emerged from the grand jury room. Mr. Reynolds's friends tiptoed their way out of court, for THE TRUTH SEEKER had to go to press, and walked rapidly to the depot. Mr. Reynolds and his bondsman kept their fidgety seats, waiting for Jersey Justice to pull the bandage from her eyes, and recognize his right to know when he would be wanted to answer the charge of having defended the almighty from the slanders of his friends. Wednesday morning the Editor found this note upon his desk:

"Cutler and the judge set the case down for a week from Monday—Monday, May 16th. "C. B. R."

At what hour of the day or night this decision was arrived at we do not know. Enough that it came at last, for at one time it was thought that Mr. Reynolds would hav to permanently settle in Morristown to find out. The district-attorney is a genial young gentleman, but he seems to be a very busy man.

Mr. Reynolds lectured in Philadelphia last Sunday, the 8th, and will no doubt be happy to visit other places between then and the 16th, for he must linger in this vicinity till that time, if no longer. Mr. L. K. Washburn will replace Mr. Reynolds at Philadelphia on the 15th inst., and would also be glad of other engagements in this section of the country. If Mr. Reynolds is tried on the 16th, THE TRUTH SEEKER will contain a full report of the proceedings. But we suspect that the authorities of Morris county are not over-anxious to employ further the legal machinery of their inquisition.

What Is Freethought?

"Freethought, as we understand it," we once wrote, "stands for absolute freedom of thought, of speech, of publication, upon any and every subject on earth."

This sentence is the text for a three-and-a-half-page criticism by John W. Truesdell, in the Freethinkers' Magazine for May. Mr. Truesdell calls the statement "radical and absurd," and defines the kind of a Freethinker he is as follows:

"But the more conservativ Freethinkers are those who believe that Freethought stands for the absolute right of all to think what they please upon any and all subjects, also the right to speak and publish, in a proper manner, all thoughts, provided they do not too severely trespass upon the rights of others."

He further says:

"The absurd notion that a man who proclaims himself a Freethinker has either the moral or legal right to speak his thoughts upon any and every subject on earth will not stand a moment's analysis. To concede the right to publicly advocate crime would practically annul all legal and moral barriers against crime. . . . . It is this unbridled and almost criminal interpretation of the rights of Freethinkers which encouraged the Chicago Anarchists."

Mr. Truesdell evidently entertains the opinion that Freethinkers hav, or think they hav, rights peculiar to themselvs. But so acute a philosopher as the banker of Syracuse will probably see, now that it is pointed out to him, that Freethinkers hav no more and no fewer natural rights than Protestants or Roman Catholics. We all start even in natural rights.

Mr. Truesdell's definition of a Freethinker's right is a funny one, and would land him in jail if the Christians incorporated it into statute law. His own limitation of his rights is precisely the same as the English Christians endeavored to formulate into a law against blasphemy. Like Mr. Truesdell, the English Christians guaranteed the right of all to think as they please, also the right to speak and publish,

"Provided that any person who, with the intention of wounding the religious feelings of any person or persons, shall in any public place utter any word or make any gesture, or exhibit any object within the hearing or sight of any person or persons whose religious feelings are likely to be thereby wounded, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; and on being convicted thereof, shall be liable to a fine or imprisonment, or both as the court may award, such imprisonment not to exceed the term of one year."

This bill is exactly paralleled in Mr. Truesdell's statement that Freethinkers hav the right only to "speak in a proper manner," and provided, moreover, that "they do not too severely trespass upon the rights of others." The English bill was opposed by every Infidel in the country, because, said the Freethinker, this clause "puts nearly ever propagandist agency of the Freethought party at a disadvantage. Every handbill, every placard, every contents-sheet, every journal or paper displayed for sale, every open-air lecture, and every strong sentence at a free leeture, would render the actor or speaker liable to a year's imprisonment for wounding the religious feelings of Christians." In other words, when the Freethinkers did not speak in a proper manner, they could be put in jail. We can never agree with the author of that bill, nor with his cis-Atlantic supporter, for we hold that every one has the natural right to speak as he or she pleases, but not to trespass at all upon the rights of others. It is an undisputed fact of history that the Christian religion is responsible for unnumbered murders, for bloody wars, for cruel persecutions, for every offense in the calendar of crime, but we would fight for the right of a man to be a Christian as soon as for the right of Mr. Truesdell to be a conservativ Freethinker and to think, and say, and publish that the limit of utterance is reached when a person speaks in an improper manner—that is to say, in a manner disagreeable to Mr. Truesdell. But when a Christian begins his career of deviltry, then we would sit down on him, and sit down hard; just the same as upon any one who trespasses upon another's rights.

Who shall say what is a "proper manner?" and who shall decide when the trespass is "too severe?"

Our critic says that "to concede the right to publicly advocate crime would practically annul all legal and moral barriers against crime." Treason, we presume Mr. Truesdell will concede, is a crime. Yet our Constitution guarantees the right to advocate treason if one chooses, and so far we hav not heard that the legal and moral barriers against treason are flat upon the ground. Blasphemy is a crime in most states, yet Mr. Truesdell would no doubt agree with Mr. Reynolds that he has the right to speak contumeliously of the Bible. Fishing on Sunday is a crime, but we do not believe that Mr. Truesdell would care to shut us up in jail for advising a friend to cast a line on the Lord's day—not even if we pointed out a good fishing-ground. We could name hundreds of acts which are and hav been crimes, but which every one advocates now. They were not crimes naturally, but only made so by statute, and who cares for those laws now?

Real crimes are the invasions of others' natural rights to their life, their liberty, or their property. We fail to see how freedom of thought, of speech, of publication, trespasses these.

Mrs. Slenker's Arrest.

Probably no Infidel writer in the country is more widely known than Elmina Drake Slenker, of Snowville, Va. The knowledge that she is now lying in jail, accused of mailing obscenity, will shock thousands, and the first question asked is, What has she done? So far as an answer to this may be printed it is told, or rather hinted at, by Mrs. Slenker in her own defense in another column of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Before judgment is pronounced in her case, the good character of the defendant must be considered. Mrs. Slenker is now a woman nearly sixty years of age, an honest, earnest, whole-souled person who would not willingly injure anyone in the world. We hav had dealings with her for years, and never knew a more honest person. In all that she has done—in her writings as in her business dealings—honesty, simplicity, and straightforwardness hav been her marked characteristics. In whatever she became interested she spared no trouble, and, we are afraid, no words, to get to the bottom of it. On some subjects she is an extremist, if not a fanatic. Bearing this in mind, her conduct is better understood.

Some years ago, as Mrs. Slenker herself explains, she took up the study of heredity and the relations of the sexes. She, with a number of others, some of them living in New York and Brooklyn, entered with great zeal upon the chase after facts to support their theories. Some, however, tempered their zeal with much discretion, but Mrs. Slenker was not of that number. Her earnest nature did not permit concealment in anything. And, while we find it impossible to get at the bottom facts in the case, we are convinced that she has gone to intolerable lengths in her correspondence, and in circulating the "data" furnished by the anonymous author of the pamphlet "Diana." The publisher of this book denied to us any knowledge of these "data," but thought that if they did exist it would be extremely injudicious to circulate them. Other people who might be supposed to know something of the matter profess profound ignorance, and the precise words of the "data" we can only conjecture, and our conjecture (founded upon evidence that we cannot print) is that in both the data and her correspondence Mrs. Slenker has circulated that which we can in no wise defend, even when clothed with the title of "scientific research." Of course, the discussion of heredity and kindred subjects need not and should not be confined to doctors and Latin scholars, for in that case scarcely any practical good would result, but it is not necessary to be vulgar in anything. The English language is rich enough and flexible enough to convey all shades of meaning without borrowing from the vocabulary of the abandoned class.

There is but little doubt that Mrs. Slenker will be convicted on May 31st, at the Abingdon term of court. She herself feels this. For years the agents of Comstock hav been decoying her, and she has been led to write and mail scores of letters and documents, almost any one of which would be sufficient for Comstock's purposes. One of her friends writes us that he is afraid to mail one of the letters she wrote, now in his possession. Yet in writing and mailing these, the thought of being obscene, we fully believe, never entered her mind. The matter was collected in the way of study of the subject of heredity, and sent for a serious purpose to those whom she believed to be fellow-students in her peculiarly chosen field. To the scientist and earnest investigator, she holds, all subjects are pure. Of her good intentions and personal purity there can be no doubt. But Judge Benedict ruled in Mr. Bennett's case that the intent of the book did not affect its character under the postal statutes, and it is more than probable that the same ruling will be made in this case. Such ruling works rank injustice, and the law of Dakota upon blasphemy might well be incorporated in the rulings of judges who are trying violators of the postal statute. When it appears beyond reasonable doubt that words are used in the course of serious discussion, and with intent to make known or recommend opinions entertained by the accused, they should be held to be free of taint, as they are held by the Dakota statute to be not blasphemous, though amenable to that charge when recklessly and frivolously employed. If ever any one was serious in her work, we believe Mrs. Slenker is; and though her earnestness cannot free her from responsibility to morality and the law, it should affect our judgment of her acts. And, too, medical men assure us that people may be perfectly sane on all but one subject, but be verging upon insanity regarding that one.

Whether or not Mrs. Slenker has done anything worthy of legal punishment, it is an unconstitutional stretch of authority to place her before a United States court, miles from her home, where she is unknown, and where her previous unblamable life cannot be made to weigh in the deliberations of a jury. Mrs. Slenker's home is in Snowville, it was there she committed the offense, and it is there, or at the county seat, she should be tried. If she has sowed obscenity broadcast, the laws of Virginia are ample to protect its people. The United States hav no business punishing the citizens of a sovereign state for any crime but those named in the Constitution, and over which the Constitution givs them jurisdiction.

And what shall be said of the dirty agents employed for years in ensnaring an aged woman—inducing her, by pretending to be students of her special hobby, to write such words as should place her in their power? What shall be said of the society that employs these foul creatures? What of the Christians who support this society and urge the prosecution of the miserable work? Their actions sink them beneath the notice of clean and honorable people, and they are best left to fester in their own corruption. No words can express the contempt in which every decent man must hold them.

The Mayor Would Remodel the Sunday Laws.

Because of his enforcement of the Sunday laws Mayor Hewitt has been accused of being a Puritan, and the charge made him angry when a World reporter called at his office last week. He said:

"I hav already stated my views explicitly on that subject, and I hav asked the legislature to change the laws so that beer may be sold in respectable places where music is performed while customers drink their beer. I see no harm in that. I hav also explicitly expressed my approbation of a law to permit the sale of beer and light wines on Sundays under proper restrictions, but the legislature has seen fit to do nothing. I cannot make new laws. I must enforce the laws now on the statute books. We began with the dives first, now we hav got around to the respectable hotels. The law makes no distinctions between individuals or places. It operates against the rich and poor alike. But now that we hav stirred up the influential proprietors of hotels, I suppose they will bring some influence to bear to get the legislature to change the law. Until that is done I propose to see that the laws, as they exist, are enforced as far as possible. I do not believe that the police can enforce the law fully. It would require a policeman at every store to do that. I believe that the best way to get an obnoxious law repealed is to enforce it strictly."

The Germans of the city hav formed a league for the repeal of the Sunday laws; the New York Herald has begun a crusade against the laws, and the landlords of the large and fashionable hotels hav also organized. Now that the mayor and excise commissioners are favorably disposed toward a new law that can be enforced, it looks as though the churchmen would hav to take a back seat, and allow the people a little personal liberty on Sunday.

There is no more harm in selling cabbages and clothing on Sunday than there is in selling them on Monday. And when people will hav their beer they might as well hav music with it, for with their attention occupied by more or less sweet sounds, they will drink fewer glasses than when beer is the sole object of consideration.

The Residence of Christ.

We hav always had some doubts as to where Christ could be found. These doubts are dispelled. The last, lingering shadow has departed. It has vanished before the rays of positiv knowledge. The Rev. T. L. Cuyler has allowed the electric light of his intellect to shine on this question, and "the mists hav rolled away." It is strange that no one made the discovery before. This learned divine informs us that "Jesus Christ as veritably resides in your heart, if you are a true disciple, as you reside in your own house." What a multitudinous residence Jesus occupies! His is a "house of many mansions." But think of the "heart" of the ordinary Christian disciple for a residence!

It strikes us that the rent of such a tenement cannot be very high. It is not a very roomy structure generally; a sort of one-story affair, without a mansard roof. This residence is usually low in the walls and poorly lighted. The cloud of Christianity obscures the sun of reason. Whenever there is a revival a great many of these tenements are occupied, but as soon as the revival is over there is a sign in most of them which reads, "To let."

Christ seems to move a great deal. We do not wonder. The average Christian heart is not a palatial residence. But think of anyone seriously writing such nonsense as this clergyman has written. It seems almost impossible to be Christian and sensible at the same time. There is somewhat in Christianity that eclipses reason and common sense. The words of the Rev. T. L. Cuyler, which we hav quoted, come about as near being idiotic as it is possible for words to be. Can men and women who read such language hav any respect for the man who uses it? Is there nothing for Liberals to do when the Christian pulpit teaches that Jesus Christ livs in a human heart as a man resides in a house? Can superstition go any farther?

Virginia Jails.

Civilization seems to move backward in southwestern Virginia, or else its wave has not reached the jails of that section. By letters received in New York from Mrs. Slenker, the condition of one of those institutions is learned. Her first night she describes as passed under a scanty blanket, shared by an idiotic, insane pauper woman. There were no fires in the building outside the jailer's room, and the prisoners lay abed most of the day to keep warm. Every prisoner had rats for bed-fellows—the big, fat, ferocious rats that flourish in the fetid atmosphere of jails. While Mrs. Slenker was penning one brief note, eight huge rats scrambled over the floor, and some of them attempted to crawl upon her clothes. In the next room to her an insane person was confined, a man, who unintermittingly prayed and yelled and stamped and swore.

Such is the place where the Christian society, presided over by Baptist Samuel Colgate, and patronized by the religious wealth of New York, has put Mrs. Slenker, a woman used to a clean home and air and sunlight! Yet the United States commissioner was humane in selecting this jail, for it has, says the Lynchburg News, "comforts superior to those of any other in southwest Virginia!" What the lives of prisoners in the others are it must beggar the imagination to conceive.

It is a relief to know, however, that the authorities possess human hearts. The jailer at Wytheville is "good and kind," writes Mrs. Slenker, "and little kindly acts from one prisoner to another are gleams of sunshine that brighten even a prison." The food offered her is good, plentiful, and varied, but not what she is accustomed to eat, and she greatly feels the change.

We hope in the next issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER to be able to announce Mrs. Slenker's liberation upon bail. To think of an aged person—a woman of culture—confined in such a place is horrible. Rats, insane people, and vermin are not enjoyable companions, though one is sustained, as is Mrs. Slenker, by the conviction that she has done no wrong, but worked only for humanity's good. And though we may differ from her in her estimate of her work, we cannot help shuddering at the fearful consequences it has entailed. Her husband has communicated with the United States marshal at Newburn, and as soon as the necessary formality of executing a bail bond can be gone through with, Mrs. Slenker will be free until the trial.

Woman's Work and Woman's Pay.

It is but justice to pay a woman for the work she does, and if a woman takes a man's place and performs the work of a man, she should receive the same pay that the man receives. The way to carry out this measure of justice is for everyone who accepts it to practice it. If we believe a thing is right or just, let us do it. It is not necessary to wait for a law to be passed, or for compulsory legislation on the subject, before we begin. Men are always ahead of nations, and justice is always seen before it is sought through a statute. It is unquestionably true that hundreds and thousands of men, and some women, hav in their employ to-day women and girls to whom they are paying less money than they are giving men for performing the same labor, and these employers continue such injustice only because they are not compelled by the law of the land to do what is right and just. It is a shame that this is true, and it is moreover a shame that individuals will not act up to their own sense of justice. Public opinion is made by private conviction, and general reforms are brought about by individual acts. It is the duty of individuals in matters of this kind to be guided by their highest convictions. Let all those who favor paying women as much as men for doing the same labor start the reform, and others will then be forced to follow where they are not just and honorable enough to lead.

WE call attention to Brick Pomeroy's challenge to Anthony Comstock, published in another column. Mr. Pomeroy is an admirer of art, and he desires to know, once for all, whether he is to be permitted to enjoy his gallery in peace, resting his eyes upon the beautiful when so inclined, or whether he will hav to invoke the aid of the courts to protect his property. We do not for a moment imagin that the soapboiler's agent will pick up the glove, for Mr. Pomeroy has lived in the West for many years, and has brought with him to effete New York many of the wild Western ways, among which is the habit of doing as he pleases with what he pays for. We really wish that Comstock would try to seize his pictures.

THIS mixture of religion and tobacco smoke appeared in the Evening Telegram on the day of the ascension to heaven of Peter Smith, a murderer hanged in this city on the 5th instant. It is descriptiv of the ceremonies previous to the execution:

"Deep from the heart of this noble priest prayers kept wending their way up to the throne of grace. Frequently the voice of Smith blended with that of his spiritual adviser as he joined him in asking for mercy of God on the sins of his past life. When not listening to the consolations that the prayer-book and ritual of the Catholic church afforded him, Smith pac d up and down the corridor with the death-watch, smoking segars furnished by these kind-hearted deputy sheriffs. The smoke from their Havanas united with his and formed, as it were, an incense that wafted the religious words that he not infrequently uttered into the great beyond."

We trust the prayers and tobacco smoke were acceptable to the Lord.

THE Supreme Court of Massachusetts agrees with Mayor Hewitt of this city that the Jews can hav no special mercantile privileges on Sunday. A decision by the full court has just been rendered in the case of the Commonwealth against Starr. The defendant was a Hebrew, and contended that he kept his shop open on Sunday for the purpose of selling meat to the Hebrews. The opinion, which is by Chief-Justice Morton, says:

"The Superior Court correctly held that the fact that he was a Hebrew, who conscientiously believed that the seventh day of the week ought to be observed as the Sabbath, and that he actually refrained from secular business on that day, was immaterial. The Superior Court also correctly held that it was not competent for the defendant to prove that he kept open his shop for the sole purpose of selling meat to Hebrews, and that this was a work of necessity or charity. The statute prohibits keeping open shop for any purpose of business, and the exceptions of 'works of necessity and charity' do not apply."

There are bills now before the Massachusetts legislature revising the Sunday laws. The best thing for the Jews to do is to help along their passage.

Letters from Friends.

PAROWAN, UTAH, May 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a lone subscriber in this place for a long time, but I am glad to be able now to send you a few names—four new ones and my own—five, as you will see. Inclosed please find $10, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER as per names on blank. GEO. S. HALTERMAN.

PARKERSBURY, OR., March 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You can send THE TRUTH SEEKER right along, at least until the money givs out, and then I will try to forward a few dollars more, for old friends are not so easily parted. In fact, the thorough manner in which THE TRUTH SEEKER treats all subjects makes it rather dear to me. I can't very well do without it. Send her along, pictures and all. D. J. LOWE.

LONGMONT, COL., April 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for two years' subscription. Sometimes I am a little slow, being hard up, but I am with you always so long as you stick to the true principles of Liberalism, as you hav done so far.

I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is improving a little all the time. The cartoons are a feature that pleases all at our home. Yours truly, M. H. COFFIN.

BUFFALO, N. Y., April 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I do not know when I saw an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, or anywhere else, that pleased me as well as Debby's or Amos Townsend's. It is the best exposé of the conditions of the Protestant churches that I hav seen. I hope Debby will continue her good work and giv us the second part and the third and fourth also. It is true, and as well done as true. I hope, Mr. Editor, you will encourage her to continue her good work. JOHN DOWNES.

OWEN, O., April 18, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Christians frequently charge us with insincerity. They tell us we preach Infidelity but do not believe it. Now, I want to say to these Christians in all sincerity that if I believed, as they do, that there is a place of eternal torment, and that the great majority of the human family are thrust into it, I would no more become father to a child than cut my throat. Yes, if it were possible I would commit suicide a thousand times before I would be guilty of so monstrous an act.

I want every Christian minister that has a particle of sincerity to preach and press this point from the pulpit. I want every professor of religion that has a spark of honesty to practice it during life, and thus cease to assist the Infidel and Christian world in populating hell. FRANK EVERLY.

ROCKFORD, ILL., April 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, article Paine, Thomas, last paragraph, I read: "This unhappy unbeliever died in contempt and misery. His disgusting viccs, his intemperance and profligacy, made him an outcast from all respectable society. He is represented as irritable, vain, cowardly, filthy, envious, malignant, dishonest, and drunken. In the distress of his last sickness he frequently called out, 'Lord Jesus, help me!' Dr. Manly asked him whether, from his calling so often upon the savior, it was to be inferred that he believed the gospel. He replied at last, 'I hav no wish to believe on the subject.'"

There is a close resemblance between this extract and the one Mr. Kelso quotes, and they may hav had a common paternity. Very respectfully, G. W. BROWN, M.D.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., April 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You will please change the address of my paper from Fort Worth, Texas, to this place, San Diego, Cal., as I hav decided to make this city my future home, as it is more congenial to the tastes of a Freethinker than Texas. Here we hav no fanatical Sunday laws, nor threats of Prohibition. Southern California is having a most wonderfnl boom at this time. This city, for instance, eighteen months ago contained only twenty-five hundred population, and at this time she has twelve thousand. The climate at this place is conceded by all to be the most desirable in the world—a more even temperature than that of Italy.

By all means continue the publication of the pictures. I find they hav the same effect on one of the "faithful" that a red rag does on a Mexican bull. Whom the gods would destroy, etc. F. W. BRADLEY.

SILVER CITY, IA., April 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5.25, and a list of able and Liberally inclined people. Please giv credit on my subscription as far as the amount will reach and send TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1887.

Please be kind enough to grant space in a conspicuous place, as I want to say through the columns of your paper, on the bounties of which I hav been feasting for one year without paying for same, that I am, nevertheless, neither stingy nor dishonest, and don't wish to be counted one of the "vicarious atonement Liberals," nor one of the "set of delinquents who are so blind that they do not see that they are frauds." But I am compelled to be a not very rich music-teacher, with a small income and a large family, and through different causes I am frequently deprived of the privilege of paying subscriptions in advance. Knowing well when I ought to pay, I am struggling hard to keep my name off THE TRUTH SEEKER'S private charity list. Through the selfish and sneakish machinations of the antagonists of Freethought, I frequently hav to sustain heavy losses, and for the enjoyment of reading and advocating Liberal papers I hav always been compelled to sacrifice much of the comfort which some of our more generous friends, who perhaps hav money enough to feel big about it, can enjoy. Within the last few years I hav been compelled to stop all my papers (mostly Liberal), and would undoubtedly be compelled to stop the last one, which I love the most, if our fair-minded successors of the noble D. M. Bennett were of the same starch as are a few of our would-be Liberal readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I want to assure you, Mr. Editor, that no Liberal can more heartily appreciate the generosity of the true friends and supporters of THE TRUTH SEEKER, nor more deeply regret that there are so many who are (unwillingly, I trust) indebted to you, than I, and I wish to be counted as one of the true friends of your paper, who, at least, is willing to lend a helping hand in the construction of the temple of humanity, even with the risk of being associated with the less fortunate set of delinquents, or what is still worse, with the risk of disgusting a few of the more fortunate, "sensible, and honorable" readers of your paper. J. G. KUHN.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., April 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I saw by THE TRUTH SEEKER that C. B. Reynolds has been here. I felt as though I could fly to meet him, as he is just the man of all others we need to organize a Liberal society. If he cannot come, please send some one else, and I will entertain them while so doing. I hav been praying, hoping, and working for this end some time, that we may hav a good Liberal organization. I believe we could hav five thousand members in a short time.

I will say a word in regard to a poor or rich man's party. Some appear to think we can hav a poor man's party. My judgment is that we cannot afford to drift into any such thing. My reasons are these. I hav among my subscribers men that are worth $100,000, and should we drift into it, it would be our downfall—and so it should be, as a Liberal party must be for the whole people. The poor man is not more honest than the rich. I hav a man working for me as poor and superstitious as can be. These are the men to blame for the state of our country to-day. Another word and I hav done. I heard a large capitalist say he attended the Episcopal church but did not believe the dogmas there taught. The well-to-do would be ready at any time, if we will organize and get strong, to join us, as we must under our able leaders and the truths they teach.

CHARLES SACH.

CHICAGO, April 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send $8 for my paper. I am a genuin Freethinker, and am sorry I am not a good writer so that when Ingersoll makes mistakes I could correct him. That "Lay Sermon" of his is open to criticism. I am well along in years as well as himself. I know something about those country villages where they were honest and happy. I was in one of the blacksmith shops he tells about where he stood on the forge and saw the sparks go up until 9 o'clock at night. That was good for the boys who had nothing to do, but not very good for me to hav to stay there until that time of night and pull on the old handle of the bellows. When I go into a shop now and see them pull a little slide to turn on the wind, I think it is good times. I know the honest, happy cobblers. One of them married a girl, and when she was about to be confined, he ran away and was never heard from. The other got in debt and skipped out. Among other debts was one which he owed a young lady for a bushel of hazelnuts she had picked. He was to pay her fifty cents for them. Then comes the doctor. It was thought that he poisoned his wife's pet dog, and his wife also, but it could not be proved against him. Finally he took poison himself and said, "This is what killed the dog and my wife." Happy, good, old times when I was a boy! The only thing I can do is to read such things and cuss and let it go.

THOS. GALPIN.

Mr. Lemieux's bill now before the Quebec legislature provides that in courts of justice a crucifix shall be placed in a conspicuous place opposit the witnesses' stand during examination, and such crucifix to be of the size determined by the lieutenant-governor in council. Before a witness is allowed to swear and giv his testimony, he shall be called upon to lift his right hand in front of the crucifix, and to place his left hand on the Book of the Evangelists, and to swear before the crucifix and upon the holy evangelists to tell the truth and the whole truth in the cause in which he is to be heard as a witness. Every sheriff shall place or cause to be placed a crucifix in the manner above indicated in each and every of the court-houses within the limits of his district, under a penalty of fifty dollars for each day in which he neglects to do so.

INNERKIP, ONT., April 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Science tells us that the cave dwellers hav passed away, but such is not the case. One of them belonging to the Quebec legislature has introduced a bill for a new form of oath, as you will see by the above clipping. If Quebec passes that bill it will then be on a level with Connecticut and New Jersey. What a pity that men can be so blinded with superstition! Just think of men in the nineteenth century carrying all sorts of trash in their pockets for luck, and to ward off disease, such as carrying chestnuts for rheumatism. Mr. Peck need not go back to the time of Christ to find a man carrying a black cat's tooth.

Even some of our banks hav a horseshoe hanging above the teller's desk, and on Sunday men will get down on their knees, "like spaniels in the dust," and ask God to forgiv them for the very actions that God prompted them to do.

O poor, deluded men! don't talk about intelligence, but go back to your caves and your diet of roots and grass.

Yours for a Godless world, R. M. COWING.

NEW YORK, May 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your suggestion of the 30th ult. to the laborers of nominating Col. R. G. Ingersoll to the presidency is what I always had in my mind, as he would undoubtedly make the strongest candidate in the field.

Should he accept the nomination, the working people will hav to disown their political absurdity, also turn a deaf ear to the church and newspapers; to the former especially, as it will be obstreperous in its denunciation against the great champion of humanity.

Workingmen! reconsider your situation! You are named freemen, because you are in a free country. On what essential ground do you claim your freedom?

You are nothing more nor less than slaves to the church. Who is the church?

Tramps who are slothful to work are seeking to take from you the right of mankind and to deprive you of your liberty. The church is pressing on you what she terms to be "legal holydays," and will teach you to vote against the man who exposes their frauds, although he is broad in humanity and is working more for your interest than all the churches combined.

Look back! In the last mayoralty campaign you nominated Mr. Henry George, a man with broad principles. The church, or at least her Tammany agents, hav discovered that his works or his doctrins are against the disciplin of the church.

The only fault I could find with Mr. George is that he is trying to convince you that his doctrins are not against the church, as he has no reason for fearing her.

But the great Robert G. is the man for you, fearless in his denunciations, and under no obligation to the church or "any other party."

It is in your power to decide whether you are born to be slaves, and whether the church has a right to interfere and mingle in politics. It is true that I am a mediocre, but hav sense enough to comprehend that God did not select a Catholic preacher or the mayor of New York as his agent.

I cannot allow a human being like myself to be my superior on account of the salary I pay to him.

B. M. GOLDOWSKY.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am aware you are not very credulous or apt to be excited at wonders, therefore I will briefly giv a statement just as it was given to me by Deacon Dale. The deacon said he had retired to bed, and had fallen into a quiet and pleasant snooze, when he was awakened by a strong, stifling smell of burning sulphur, which almost suffocated him, but he was still more astonished when he beheld the figure of a man sitting on a chair a few feet from the bed. The figure was one living coal of fire, brilliant and intensely luminous. "You may be assured," says the deacon, "I was struck with mute astonishment. We gazed at each other in silence for some moments (they seemed hours), and the figure was the first to speak, which it did in grating, measured sounds, and with an emphasis like the jabbing of a red-hot piece of iron, or a heated poker, into my side.

"'Behold in me the once arch enemy of the only word of God, the holy Bible, Tom Paine! Tom Paine, the misleader of youths and the traducer of saints! I am now roasting in hell for my misdeeds. Be warned in time. Burn that Infidel TRUTH SEEKER and my "Age of Reason," and escape the torments of everlasting hell!'

"I heard no more, but instantly fell back in a swoon, from which I did not recover until next morning, and found myself a little fatigued, but not much. The events of the last night were too vivid to be overlooked, but I thought I had an attack of the nightmare of the worst kind, and so endeavored to let it pass. But behold, when I aroused myself, there indeed was the cushioned chair, and the adjoining mahogany table, but the chair was burnt bottomless, and the mahogany table-top was ruined, where Tom Paine's elbow had rested! This took place two weeks since. It is true I hav had offers from some dime-museum men for the purchase of the furniture, but Talmage wants them for the use of our Tabernacle."

I would simply add that if the deacon were a Spiritualist, I should impute his hallucination to that peculiar range of research, but the deacon is too good a church-member to tolerate such heresy. CALEB.

P.S.—I might add that I did not see the ruined furniture, as Talmage had them in keeping. C.

N. S. HOME, VA., May 1, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I find in "Lives of Illustrious Shoemakers," by W. E. Winks, Funk & Wagnalls, publishers, an interesting "Anarchy case." Thomas Cooper, a newspaper reporter, had become interested in the Chartists, and was their nominee. The times were severe; there was a big strike and some riots. Cooper was nominee for the Commons, and he made an open-air speech at Hanley, 1842. "His subject was the Sixth Commandment, 'Thou shalt do no murder,' in which he spoke of the violation of this law by the conquerors and legislators, and by masters who oppressed the hireling in his wages. The men were out on strike, and the excitement produced by this and another address on the following night was intense. He counseled perpetually, 'Peace, law, and order,' and bade the men hold out in their strike until the People's Charter became the law of the land. Riot and incendiarism broke out in a short time, for which Cooper was in no way responsible, but had, on the other hand, distinctly endeavored to persuade them from. He was taken prisoner on his return from Manchester, and, having been tried for the crime of arson, was acquitted, having pleaded his own case so eloquently that the judge was evidently affected, and the ladies present at the trial were even moved to tears. Tried again at the spring assizes on the charge of sedition, he cross-examined the witnesses from Monday to Saturday at noon, and then proceeded to sum up his defense in a speech which altogether (Sunday intervening) lasted ten hours. 'I do not think,' he remarks, 'I ever spoke so powerfully in my life as during the last hour of that defense. The peroration, the Stafford papers said, would never be forgotten; and I remember as I sat down, panting for breath and utterly exhausted, how Talfourd and Erskine and the jury sat transfixed, gazing at me in silence, and the whole crowded place was breathless, as it seemed, for a minute.' The case being removed by a writ of certiorari to the court of Queen's Bench, was tried on the 5th of May, 1843. In his defense Thomas Cooper again delivered an eloquent address in a speech four and a half hours long, and was again acquitted of a charge of felony. Judge Erskine's notes of the trial had 'Mistaken' written alongside the evidence on that part of the charge. But the eloquent Chartist orator was convicted on the charge of sedition and conspiracy, and sent to Stafford jail for two years."

Perhaps this is where the Chicago judges got their law.

What constitutes a conspiracy and sedition? Evidently in the practice of certain courts it is to want justice done to the unfortunately poor, and to say so to some one else, if there is enough prejudice and pigheadedness among the populace to allow such judgment to be carried out.

I do not know anything about the Chicago Anarchists, so-called, but no evidence has been given that they plotted the bomb-throwing, and the judge admitted it. When such rulings as they were sentenced under are supported by the people, there is no protection to the expression of an opinion, and a trial for any alleged felony or misdemeanor can be turned into a persecution for saying anything whatever that does not suit the convenience of the judges, and in such case the actual anarchy is not on the part of the accused, but belongs to the maladministration and injuriousprudence of big blockheads and blacklegs who invite Nihilism by their iniquity. It seems to be the sentiment of the pious press that these men under illegal sentence for what they probably did not do are to suffer for being Atheists, for the priest-bidden editors seem to think that the American republic is a government by God, for God; and the people are largely enough goats to swallow such stuff. Everyone who believes in free speech and a free press should, regardless of these men's personal merits or demerits, see that American principles are not violated by their execution. JOHN P. GUILD.

LEXINGTON, KY., April 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Every moment that monopolism is permitted to deface the beauty of our institutions will make the reaction, which is sure to follow, more terrible and destructiv. We boast of liberty, and so did old Rome when under the tyranny of nobles and senate. We know what followed when Cæsar, with the spirit of the Gracchi burning in his bosom, undertook to reform the government. The few patriots who forget self are the living columns which support the great moral structures of the world. The masses are in a comatose state, and will do for bricks and mortar. When Alaric sacked Rome, the heathen residents raised armies and tried to defend themselvs, but the Christians fled to the churches and temples to pray for help and deliverance. We see, then, how they dilute our strength and impair the greatness of the body politic.

The tendency of religion is to mislead the mind; even now the noble candor of Cicero is distasteful to the Christian, who prefers a false ecstacy on the bosom of Jesus to the truthful spirit of philosophy which encounters with the same firm calmness the smiles and frowns of fate.

"Tales Told Out of School" expose the meanness of the clergy and their contempt for women. Under the vulgar teachings of the Bible they can find no way to put an end to the oppression and "quiet agony" of the female sex. If women would arise and defend themselvs these sensual hypocrits could soon be silenced. I fear I forgot to state that Saint More, who is about to be canonized, persecuted James Bainham for his religious opinions, and had him racked and burnt at Smithfield. James Bainham was an honest and talented lawyer who lived three hundred years ago, during the reign of Henry the Eighth. ALHAZA.

COLUMBUS, KAN., May 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: My friend Hiram Crum, of Baxter Springs, Kan., a liberal patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER publications, has offered the Methodist church in that place to pay one-half of the minister's salary, and another Liberal will pay the other half, if the minister or his church will prove that man has a soul to save, or that there is a God to save it. His offer has not been accepted, and no attempt has been made to prove that man has within his organism an individualized entity called the human soul, or that such a being as the orthodox God is anything but a myth, an assumption, an absurdity. Seventy thousand priests in these United States stand up in their pulpits and pray to and "talk to God almighty as though he was a little boy," and tell their deluded blinded dupes what they know (?) about him, what he has done, can do, and will do for and to his rebellious subjects, and the value of man's immortal soul.

The priest's God is always behind him, hidden from the view of his hearers, and can only be seen by "the eye of faith." No man hath seen God at any time, except that Moses once saw a part of his posterior. In the light of science, the Christian's God and all other gods vanish, as ghosts flee to churchyards at the approach of daylight. A teacher asked a boy to define chaos. The boy said: "It is a great pile of nothing, and nowhere to put it." So to me God is "a great pile of nothing, and nowhere to put him," and nothing for him to do. God, said Jefferson, is a "hocus pocus phantasm." God is not found in Humboldt's cosmos, for he had not found him in all his life-long observations and rigid investigations and interrogations of nature. Laplace told Napoleon I. that he had no place for a God in his philosophy. The word God is early introduced to the child's ears and imagination, and he hears it so often on all sides that he takes it for granted that there is such a being. Volumes could not tell in detail what I suffered when a boy, when my vivid imagination, coöperating with fear, pictured upon my impressible brain God and his judgments and vengeance. "Remember, child, remember that God is in the sky; remember he will punish the wicked by-and-by," my pious parents used to sing sixty years ago, alluding to the awful judgment day. "Parents and children then shall part, part, part to meet no more," at the command of God. God is in nearly all the text-books of schools and colleges, in nearly all our literature, and now the priests especially want God in the national Constitution, to be recognized, believed in, and worshiped by law, and all compelled so to do by the combined power of church and state.

I hav been a godless man forty-five years, and wish I had never heard the senseless and cruel word. I became a godless man that I might be human and humane. Down with God and up with humanity. Down with inhuman absurdities, and up with divine realities and possibilities of nature, which, in the language of Tyndall, "contains the promis and potency of every form and every quality of life." As long as "the priests bear rule, and my people will hav it so;" as long as their poor, blind dupes are diverted from their real bodies to their imaginary souls, from this real, tangible, visible, organic life to the imaginary, fabricated, unproved, and, to me, impossible orthodox heaven and hell, so long will this life, its resources, responsibilities, possibilities, and significance be kept in the background, ignored and disparaged.

If these seventy thousand priests could be paid out of the national treasury to be silent and get out of the way of human progress, and the churches could be turned into temples in which to teach nature and science, teach truth and how to liv, and make the most of life, what rapid progress would then be made in human development and toward heaven on earth! In the place of all this let us proclaim liberty to all the people, and raise the standard of humanity. Millions for humanity, not one cent for God or priests. If this is treason, make the most of it. J. H. COOK.

SAN DIEGO, April 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Yesterday, Saturday, I received my paper and was thankful to again get something to read that is worth reading. I landed in San Diego the same day, I think, that Mr. Putnam did, but was unable to go to hear him. Now I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER what he thinks of San Diego, and would beg leave to slightly differ from him. True, I admire the mighty ocean, the great mountain, and the fine climate, but San Diego and neighborhood is but a desert; there is not a tree on the streets that is worthy the name, and few of them at that. The streets are dusty, dry, and bare. With the exception of some houses lately built the town is an unsightly mass of old wooden buildings. The immediate vicinity of the place is no better; the hills are bare or almost so. Were it not for irrigation it would be nothing. True, there are some fine places, but it is only now and then, like an oasis in the desert, that you meet them. Still, if the improvements spoken of are carried out, San Diego will be something at no distant day. I would like to say a few words on another subject, and am a little afraid to tackle it, as I am not very well posted. Still, you can take it for what it is worth, as I know it will be an advantage to the numerous readers of your paper who don't know the true state of things here; I giv my own experience, but unfortunately it is the experience of a good many more. Newspapers and circulars are sent to all parts of the United States and Canada setting forth the advantages to be gained by immigrating to this country. If the plain truth were told, it would be all right, but when they say, as those papers and circulars say, that work is plenty and wages high, they are only deceiving the people. I know a good many in this town who would be glad to get back to their old homes in the East but cannot. Work certainly is plenty, but, as one employer remarked to me, there are plenty to do it. They are coming here daily by the hundreds. There is not work for them, and the wages are barely half they expected, and lucky is the man who gets work at that. There is a land boom also going on. The papers are full of that, too, setting forth the advantages of California as a farming country. The most glowing descriptions are given of climate, soil, products, markets, etc. The land agent meets you at the station; he is installed, and she too, in the hotel where you put up. He is on the street, in the office, in the tent; he is everywhere. He finds you out, and if you hav no money, or not enough to satisfy him, he quits. Board is high, lodging is high. Every likely spot of land, and what is not likely, is in the hands of these land grabbers. I was reminded of Dickens's Martin Chuzzlewit. Zephaniah Scadder is here in all his glory. This is a fine country, I don't dispute that, but where is the man of slender means that can settle and make it his home? I wanted to get a few acres—five would suit me—but, as I said, in this locality it all wants irrigation; it is of no use without it. The price those agents want for the land! It is higher here—wild land—than the best cultivated farm, with good buildings, in the East and Canada. I don't want to encroach on your space, but I would like to say a word to those who read your paper and who may likely be beguiled into coming here, to think well before they make the move; there is not enough work now for those that are here, and if they intend to buy land they must hav lots of money. There is one question I would like to ask; that is, How did those men that now hold and control the land become possessed of it? Who sold it or gave it to them? These are things I don't know. It looks as if something was wrong somewhere. There is a Unitarian church in this town. I heard they had a meeting last week and framed resolutions to keep the Chinese and Eastern paupers from coming here. The Eastern paupers are the unemployed workingmen. I thought by what I hav heard and read that labor organizations in the United States were able to control and keep interested parties from deceiving them. Alas, for the workingman and his labor organization! Capital gets ahead of him every time. It has full control of everything here; the land is theirs, the money is theirs; they can bring all the men from other places they like, and keep wages at a starvation point. Why don't some one lift his voice in their behalf? The daily papers here are full of what the capitalists are doing. When any one arrives it is duly noticed, who he is, and where from, but the man that does the work is never noticed. There is something rotten in Denmark. I may be wrong in what I hav written; if you think so, throw it out. I hav given my experience and the experience of others, and I want to warn my fellow-workman if he has a home at all to think twice before he believes the lying notices he sees and hears. Wishing you success in your effort to banish superstition and help to benefit the workingman, I bid you good-night.

GEORGE MIDDLETON.

EUBANKS, KY., April 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We like the idea expressed by the words, "Liberal," "Freethought," "free expression," etc., because they admit a Christian, a Jew, an Infidel, and all views of science, religion, and politics to enter the field of investigation. It is possible, however, that some may be too liberal and free with subjects that are vital to society. We apprehend that we notice this tendency in the Freethought literature. The Anarchists of Chicago and the position of E. C. Walker, of Kansas, are examples in politics, while the "New God" of Mr. Putnam is an example in theology. In view of the fact that great and needed reforms may be retarded and smothered by extremes, and with the idea that society is now under the full influence of our civil laws and the Bible theology, we suggest prudence in Liberal circles. Men who simply disobey civil laws are only subject to the annexed penalties, but the man who attempts to stand against his government or aid its enemies is guilty of treason. Even if men's principles are right who may thus act, still, their policy is wrong, and will do more of injury to reform than all their reasoning will do of good. A man who is really a philanthropist and wise in policy will act with reference to surrounding circumstances. We liv in an age when every man's system of religion and politics requires a definit explanation. It is not satisfactory to the people for a man to fight everybody's religion and politics and hav none of his own. The people hav a right, and will ask, If you discard all religions and put the people under rule of Mr. Putnam's "New God"—then what? If you hav a system called "Secularism," what is it? The human mind, from its constitution and its historic revelations, should discard the idea of Mr. Putnam's "New God," and call it the old God of the past. Still, if Mr. Putnam or anyone else chooses to believe there is no personal God but man himself, it is all right and consistent with Liberalism and Freethought. But it should be remembered that a man does not stop and reflect his teaching back to the fountain. It is humanity in its better interest that a man's teaching affects. Society, among us, is now fixed on a constitutional government that has cost millions of lives and dollars. To maintain its form and civil laws the people are ready to sacrifice their lives. Any teaching that ignores these facts in politics is, for the present, premature and inconsiderate. Society, also, is fixed on Bible theology. While clerical sects are a curse to the Bible itself, and while many defects may be found in the book, yet we must express our free thoughts with reference to the fact that the masses are Christians and that Infidelity is very odious to them. Now, if this be true about Infidels, what about Atheists and Mr. Putnam's "New God?" The idea that society is the product of either religion or politics is a wrong view of facts. The natural wants and duties of mankind which arise from their associations are independent of all religious and civil governments. Whether there be a New God, an old God, my God, your God, or no God at all, the people will be born into this world all the same, and will eat, drink, sleep, sicken, and die all the same. This is equally true if there were no human governments. It is the duty of Liberals to protect and teach freedom of thought in all things, but too great latitude of action and expression should be guarded against. We hav evidences sufficient in the frailties of humanity to warn us of theoretical extremes. Man is man after all. He has conceits enough without being called his own God. One great mind of the past penned the thought that "a man must know a little of everything to know anything," and when we consider the connection and dependence of one thing on another in the universe of matter and mind, the expression is not far beyond a possibility. My own mind runs in the line of a complete separation of church and state, and this is suggested from history and the present attitude of religious sects. In this separation, we desire the wisdom in our amended Constitution fully and practically carried out in legislation—that Congress shall make no law to establish religion of any kind. Liberals should properly discuss natural rights, and show where religion ends and politics begins. Liberals must also show that they are friends to civil government and religious tolerance.

We express our opinions from no dogmatic standpoint. We are sentimentally liberal in all things. I feel the necessity of free discussion too much to ever bind my mind to any certain creed or theory of politics or religion. The full degree of human progress can only be achieved through reason and tolerance. Tolerance is demanded in order that reason may do its proper work. Great reforms, heretofore, that might hav been accomplished by time and reason, hav usually travailed in human garments baptized in blood. A civil government or a religion, holding the masses in subordination to clerical or political power without reason and the right to reason, is not only destructiv to natural rights but stops the mainspring of human progress. The discussions in the halls of legislation hav developed questions that a monarch or a pope could keep concealed for ages; and, in like manner, Liberal discussions, if properly carried on without extremes, may develop facts that hav heretofore been ignored. On abstract questions, the mind, by necessity, must march by induction. No one can work out the problem of the universe by analysis. Therefore let Liberals be reserved, wise, and prudent in all things. W. BAKER, M.D.

Creeds.

These rites of creed-idolaters,
The hollow shams of social forms—
What are they but a work of waste,
A fire that burns but never warms?

Our crude supports of social creeds,
The weak supports of weaker minds,
Too seldom known for what they are,
Act not as lenses, but as blinds.

What soul is there would creep again
When once its powers of flight are known,
Or rest upon another's strength
With conscious power to stand alone?

Come out with me, beloved one;
Drop creeds like unto garments cast.
Let nature be our guide; let us
Love more and wiser to the last.

An Entering Wedge.

A bill was introduced in the Senate at Albany early in the present session by Senator Murphy, the main purpose of which seems to be to make a beginning in the diversion of public school funds to the support of the sectarian institutions of the Roman Catholic church. It extends to the court of special sessions the power now exercised by committing magistrates to commit "idle, truant, vicious, or homeless children" to the Catholic Protectory, and raises the limit of age of those who may be committed to that institution from twelve to fourteen years, and ends with the provision that "the schools established and maintained by the New York Catholic Protectory shall participate in the distribution of the common school fund in the same manner and degree as the common schools of the city and county of New York."

The Catholic Protectory and its schools are nominally charitable institutions, but mainly they are a recruiting agency for the Roman Catholic church. So far as the "idle, truant, vicious, and homeless children" committed to the Protectory are concerned, it can hardly be called an institution of charity, for the city pays out of the public funds $2 per week for the support of each child so committed. Last year the Protectory received $242,000 from the city, and in the last twelve years nearly $3,000,000 of the public money has been appropriated to the support of that institution. Of the reformatory effects of its teaching and disciplin little can be said, for little is definitly known, apart from the fact that in spite of the efforts of that and numerous other Roman Catholic institutions for the care of children, it is said that about eighty per cent of the paupers and criminals of the city continue to be nominally of the Roman Catholic faith. In the educational methods of all these institutions it is well known that the first place is given to religious instruction in the nurture of the Catholic church. Their main purpose is to make Catholics of those in their charge, and the general education imparted to them is of an altogether inferior quality, and often very much perverted in its character. It is a kind of education that ought not to be promoted at the public expense.

The anxiety of the Protectory and other Roman Catholic institutions to increase the number of children committed to their care by public magistrates and courts is due in the first place to a desire to use their power so far as possible in proselyting for the church, and, in the second place, to get the largest possible share of the public funds for their use. It is extremely doubtful whether the money which they get is not more than sufficient for the support of the children committed to their care by the city. There are sixteen Catholic institutions in the city which obtain a share of the public money on account of children committed to them by magistrates, and last year the total appropriation on this account exceeded $1,000,000. They all seem to thrive and grow on this public aid, the propriety of which is questionable.

But the policy which has prevailed so long of committing vagrant and homeless children to institutions that are devoted primarily to training them in the Catholic faith, and of paying those institutions for the care and training of such children, is harmless compared to the purpose of this bill to divert to such institutions a part of the funds raised by taxation for the support of the common schools. Should this bill pass, a beginning would be made toward a policy for which the Catholic church has long been contending, that of allowing to the sectarian schools of that church a proportionate share of the public school funds. Such a policy would be in violation of the distinctivly American principle of the complete separation of church and state, and the freedom of education at public expense from sectarian influence and control. Should the schools of the Catholic Protectory be permitted to share in the distribution of the common school fund, the barrier will be let down, and it will be claimed that other Catholic institutions of a charitable or quasi-charitable character are entitled to the same consideration, and this claim will be speedily followed by a demand for allowing the church to come in for a share of the public money to support its parochial schools. The bill is intended as the entering wedge for the destructiontion of the public school system, and the establishment of the policy of bestowing public funds upon sectarian institutions for the propagation of their various forms of religious faith. The pending bill appears to hav been opposed thus far mainly by the Evangelical Alliance, but a protest against it should be raised by every believer in the principles upon which American institutions are founded.—New York Times.

Books.

MR. EDITOR: Can I say a few words in your columns for the marvelous work, "Helen Harlow's Vow?" It shines into the realm of social confusion, falsity, hypocrisy, and evil passions with a prophetic light. Malice, denunciation, phariseeism, a brood of unwholesome spirits unconscious of the truth that more than one virtue is essential to a noble life, fail to crush the grand woman's soul who persistently holds to her self-respect and faithfully performs to her child the parental duty which the father shirks. Were all legal wives and mothers of so noble a type as Helen Harlow, we might look for a rapid advancement of the race to grander hights. The literary excellence and the lofty conception and triumph of the heroin make "Helen Harlow's Vow" a book of absorbing interest from first to last, even while its graphic portrayal of social deformity is painful. It should hav wide distribution and reading. The world would be the better for it.

LUCINDA B. CHANDLER.

Professor Pierce, the great American truth-teller, dropped in at the office of this paper one day last week. He is the author of a little book on the use of hot water as a cure for all diseases, and givs what he calls psychometric readings of character. His readings are based upon the physical structure and form of the features, so that perhaps he has not struck the right name for them, but no doubt they are as psychometric as things will average that go under that name. The professor finds his lot to be like that of most reformers of the world. He has been thrice arrested by malicious persons either on the charge of practicing medicin without a license or telling fortunes for pay, but has got clear on the ground that he doesn't use any medicin or charge anything for his character readings. Those who buy his book for thirty cents get their horoscope cast for nothing. He has done some healing in cases given up by the doctors, but the largest fee he ever received, he says, was $3. In his little book he givs directions for the cure of diseases by water, and avers that everthing in it is founded upon experience. He has traveled for twenty-three years, and makes a practice of attending prayer-meetings and talking heresy in such a manner that the hearers don't know it until they get outside and think it over. Years ago he was an agent for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but since he adopted literature as a profession and became an author he has confined his labors to the distribution of his little book. He possesses many testimonials to the value of hot water as a curativ.

"The New God," by Samuel P. Putnam, is a book which will interest religious people. It tells how to make a new God and a very good one, as gods go. The price of this information is only ten cents, and he must be a very covetous man who would want more for his money. Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette Place, New York.—Winsted Press.

In Memory of D. M. Crane.

The following resolutions in memory of D. M. Crane were adopted by the Seattle Liberal League at a regular meeting held in Odd Fellows Hall, Sunday, April 10, 1887:

Resolved, That it is a just tribute to the memory of our deceased brother, Daniel M. Crane, a member of Queen City Assembly of the Knights of Labor of America, and also one of the organizers of the Liberal League of Seattle, and its president for over four years, to say that in regretting his removal from our midst we mourn for one who was in every respect worthy of our esteem and affections. Our departed brother had a well-cultured mind; he was one who took great pleasure in the investigation of truth; he was an admirer of nature, a student of the grand and unchanging principles of the universe; his mind was unusually clear, and his reasoning powers of a high order; he was singularly free from the blight of superstition; he was fair and candid in an eminent degree; he accepted like an honest man what his reason approved; he was no slave to mistaken dogmas, antique fables, or mythological fictions; his mind soared into the realms of truth; he accepted the teachings of science as the most reliable facts within the grasp of the human mind; he was untrammeled by the chains of priestly creeds and fables; he sought to know the truth, and imprinted the same on the tablets of the hearts of his now bereaved wife and family, with a reason, love, and sincerity that will cause them to remain as shining beacon-lights during their existence in this troubled world.

Resolved, That we sincerely condole with the family of our deceased brother, who, through the unchangeable laws of nature, has been removed from our midst, and has gone to rest, believing that whatever nature has provided for our future he will share with the brightest and the best.

More Munhallism.

There are men who are doomed to everlasting woe before they die! There is a time when it becomes impossible to turn around, and preaching, even, to such has no more effect on them than pouring water on a duck's back (Evangelist Dr. L. W. Munhall, Boston, March 26th).

It is such preaching as this that drives many to madness, murder, and suicide, fearing they hav committed the "unpardonable sin," though no one pretends to tell what that sin is. It is almost equal to Elder Knapp, in Boston, over fifty years ago, when it is reported that in one of his exhortations he said:

Sinners, it will be harder for you to get to heaven than it would be for a shad to climb a greased pole tail foremost.

Evangelist Munhall consoles the debtor with the assurance, "Christ pays all our debts if we only ask him," but he wants no half-way work about it, he declaring that "the man who is on the fence is on the devil's side, because the fence is on the devil's side." Doesn't "it beat all our first wife's relations" how much these preachers hav to do with the devil, and how flippant their expressions concerning his satanic majesty! It is reported that some five hundred people hav joined the Baptist churches in Boston in consequence of Evangelist Munhall's labors among them this spring. The "Two Sams" did such valiant work for "the master" in the M. E. church that the Baptists, not to be outdone, employed Munhall for like purpose. "Great is Allah, and Mohammed is his prophet!" ## Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

News of the Week.

It is stated that Miss Rose Elizabeth Cleveland, the president's sister, will become first assistant teacher in Miss Reed's school for young ladies, in New York, and will lecture on American history. The term begins the first of September.

George Francis Train is about to begin suit in Omaha, Neb., to recover $10,000,000 worth of property there.

Paul Grottkau, of Milwaukee, Wis., has been sentenced to one year at hard labor for making a speech.

The Labor party has called a convention to meet at Syracuse. August 17th, to organize the party throughout the state.

An explosion in a coal-mine near Nanaimo, B.C., buried nearly two hundred miners, whom there is little prospect of rescuing alive.

Graves, the slayer of the Maine game warden, Hill, last November, was arraigned at Calais on the 7th. He pleaded not guilty. He says he killed the warden in self-defense.

There was no liquor to be bought in New York last Sunday, and a great many religious people were thereby put to much inconvenience. The usual amount of drunkenness was noted.

At a baptism in New Orleans last Sunday a railing around a wharf gave way, precipitating fifty persons into the water, eight of whom were drowned.

A split is foreshadowed between the Knights of Labor and the Henry George Labor party. The information is not definit, but it is certain that inharmony exists.

Queen Kapiolani of the Sandwich Islands and her daughter, the Princess Lilinokalani, are visiting this country. Her royal highness expresses herself as much pleased with American institutions.

The Rev. Mr. Ward, who shot his wife at Englewood, N. J., committed suicide with chloral. It would hav been much more thoughtful in Mr. Ward if he had taken the chloral before he did the shooting.

Henry George's Anti-Poverty Society had its second meeting Sunday night in the Academy of Music, which was crowded. Mr. George led the singing and made the address. McGlynn lectured in Boston.

Disastrous floods prevail in Maine. The water of the Kennebec and Piscataquis rivers is reported higher than it has been before for forty years. Washouts hav stopped the running of trains on the Maine Central between Bangor and St. Johns.

Samuel Ruppert, a farmer of Bowmanstown, Pa., has just discovered that John Steigerwalt, who has worked for him a year, is a woman named Lena instead of John. She has been sending her wages to Germany to bring her parents to this country.

The New York Sun notes that May 4th was the first anniversary of the throwing of the bomb at Chicago. The result was seven policemen killed, eleven crippled for life, twelve so injured that they are still unfit for duty, and seven men are in prison sentenced to death.

A German woman named Neustadt keeps a beer saloon in this city. On the 7th inst. a policeman detected her brother in the act of practicing his music lesson on a piano in the rear of the saloon, and at once arrested Mrs. Neustadt, who will doubtless be fined, and the majesty of the law vindicated.

There was a tremendous mass meeting in this city last Saturday evening, addressed by the excise commissioners and others, to protest against the tyranny of the law which prohibits music at reputable places where wine and beer are sold. An act has already passed the New York Assembly licensing the sale of these beverages at concerts.

MRS. LOT'S TRANSFIGURATION.

But his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt.—Gen. xix, 26.

Odds and Ends.

There is a dentist in a Michigan town the sign over whose door reads: "Teeth Extracted Without Enny Pane. Laffin Gas (10) Cents a Ha Ha!"

A Chicago man paid $1,000 for an Indian Bible recently. It is peculiar how much more a man will giv for a Bible he can't read than for one he can.

Lawyer (to client): "You want to sue Robinson for $500 for libel, you say?" Client: "Yes; he has blasted my character forever." Lawyer: "You think $500 the proper amount?" Client: "Well, make it $250. I only want what's right."

"I hav three witnesses who will swear that at the hour when this man was robbed I was at home in my own chamber, taking care of my baby." "Yes, your honor," glibly added the prisoner's counsel, "that is strictly true. We can prove a lullaby, your honor."

Old minister (to young minister): "Paul was a wonderful man, my dear young brother, a wonderful man; and thousands upon thousands flocked to hear him preach." Young minister: "Yes, if Paul were alive to-day he would only hav to name the salary he wanted."

A preacher who used to hold forth in Sangerville was wont to be rather wandering in his remarks. One day he asked a lady what his hearers thought of his sermons. "Well, if you must know," said she, "they say that if the text had the small-pox the sermon was in no danger of catching it."

POINTING A MORAL.

Wife (witnessing the play "Ten Nights in a Barroom"): "What a terrible curse rum is, John!"

Husband (feeling for his hat): "Awful, awful! Such a play as this ought to point a moral of incalculable good."

Wife: "Where are you going, John?"

Husband: "I'm going out to see a man."

His Satanic majesty (to applicant for admission): "What may I call your name?" Applicant: "I havn't got any. I'm the man who has been writing anonymous contributions to the newspapers." His Satanic majesty: "Who sent you to me?" Applicant: "Peter." His Satanic majesty (indignantly): "Well, Peter ought to know better. You can't get in here, my friend; this place is too good for you."

COYOTE CHARACTERISTICS.

In the unsettled interior of America, on the great plains, is found the coyote. The coyote is about two-thirds the size of a yellow dog, and looks like a second-hand wolf in straitened circumstances. He bears about the same relation to the genuin wolf that the buzzard does to the eagle, or that a chicken-thief does to a modern bank cashier. He has a perpetual air of being ashamed of himself, or of something he has done. As you catch a glimpse of him, trotting away from one motte of timber to another, looking back over his ears, and with his tail furled around his left leg, he looks as if he was aware that the police had a clue to his whereabouts, and were working up his case. No one ever saw a fat coyote. You may catch a young one, civilize him as much as you can, feed him on canned groceries, and put a brass collar on him, but his ribs will still be his most prominent feature, and at the first favorable opportunity he will voluntarily and ungratefully leave your hospitable roof, and from choice become a roving vagabond on the prairie, living on carrion and sharing his meals with the buzzard. These predatory shadows are not at all dangerous. There is no fight in them.

That a popular fallacy regarding the ferocity of the coyote exists, was illustrated not long since in the remarks made by a Northern preacher in a sermon he preached shortly after his arrival in the state. He said: "Dear friends, methinks I see two men walking out on one of your bee-utiful prairies. They enjoy the perfume of the flowers, the songs of the innocent little birds, and the calm, quiet beauty of your g-lorious Indian summer evenings. Communing together, they walk along heedless of danger. The sun sinks to rest beyond the distant horizon; the curtain of night gradually descends and closes out the light of day; still the two men walk leisurely along, feeling safe and secure. But hark! What sound is that in the distance? What blood-curdling howl makes them arrest their steps? It is, dear friends—it is the cry of the wolves on their track—the fierce and bloodthirsty coyote in hot pursuit, ah! And what, think you, do these two unfortunate men do? One of them, my beloved congregation, realizes his danger, and running to a tree, climbs up, by the aid of a convenient branch, out of the reach of the cruel fangs of the relentless beasts of prey. He called unto his companion and said unto him, 'O my brother! reach out and take hold of this branch, climb up beside me, and be saved!' But the other said, 'No, there is no danger; the wolves are still a long way off—I hav time enough.' Alas, dear hearers, while he was yet speaking the dreadful coyotes came upon him, and rending him limb from limb, devoured him even in the twinkling of an eye. Thus it is, O careless and heedless sinners, that you to-night stand," etc.

When the preacher concluded the services and was leaving the church he was accosted by old man Parker (who has lived in Texas since '36), who said:

"Parson, the front end of your discourse was grand and gloomy, and calculated to bluff the unconverted sinner. Yon had a full hand, and might hav raked in all the mourners in the pot; but, Lord, bless your soul, you played a nine-spot when you chipped in with that coyote yarn."

Gems of Thought.

I hav not been fighting a personal warfare. I hav battled for human rights, for mental liberty and freedom of the press, and I trust the friends of liberty and equality will not forsake me in my hour of trial.—D. M. Bennett.

Let us see just what it means "to believe in the Bible." One man means by it the acceptance as literal truth of everything in the Bible—e. g., the account of the creation in six days, the story of the garden of Eden, of the universal flood and the story of Jonah—and that it is all the perfect, literal word of God. Another man thinks, etc. A third person thinks, etc. Still other persons look on the Bible as a natural book or collection of books, composed by men writing as other men do, guided by their natural faculties, and not inspired in any miraculous sense.—W. L. Chaffin.

"The rationalistic school certainly does not believe in results without material causes," said Richard Fullerton quietly. "And you are quite correct—it does believe in law." "The miracle of Jonah is, I fancy, a typical stumbling-block to you all?" the vicar asked blandly. "No whale could hav swallowed a man," answered Richard; "not to speak of a man living three days and three nights in the whale's belly [Mrs. Linton reads, "body," and the esthetic preacher spoke of the whale's "society." But I prefer the Bible word "belly." It is quite good enough for the story in which it is imbedded.—Hylax.] if he could hav been taken into it." "Not by God's power?" "Not according to the limitation of a whale's anatomy and the necessities of a man's." "And I believe it firmly," said Lady Maine emphatically: "for the Bible says, 'And God sent a great fish.'" "Yes, we may rest assured that all the miracles recorded were wrought," said Mr. Lascelles, addressing Lady Maine. "The speaking of Balaam's ass among them." "Perhaps that is the least incredible of the series," said Richard drily. "And the consuming by fire of the false priests of Baal! That, too, one may believe?" said the vicar, with a cruel gleam in his sharp gray eyes. "Yes, you priests of the dominant faith hav always been ready with fire and slaughter when you were afraid of rivals," said Richard. —Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord?

Death truly is then met with the greatest tranquility, when the dying man can comfort himself with his own praise. No one dies too soon who has finished the course of virtue.—Cicero's Tusculan Disputations.

"Fool," he answered, "death is sure
To those who stay and those who roam,
But I will never more endure
To sit with empty hands at home.

"My mother clings about my neck,
My sisters crying, 'Stay, for shame!'
My father raves of death and wreck;
They are all to blame, they are all to blame.

"God help me! save I take my part
Of danger on the roaring sea,
A devil rises in my heart
Far worse than any death to me."
—Tennyson's Sailor Boy.

We rejoice in the widening thought that marks this age of ours, in the broadening and sweetening sympathy that extends itself further and further where grace and compassion are needed; in the increasing fortitude and courage, in the growing determination to hold evil at bay and compel the world to giv up its long hidden secrets of knowledge and beneficence. We rejoice in all the spread of truth, in the deepening love of liberty, in the higher respect for order and harmony and peace, and in that grand vision of a nobler and better time coming that floods with light all higher spirits and touches with its beams of radiance even the dark and stubborn ground where poverty and misery hav their abode. Be it ours to feel that we liv in a world full of light and grandeur and glory; full of promis, full of coming joy. May it be the wish and purpose of our hearts to liv in such a world, not basely and meanly, but in a manner worthy of men and women, lifting up our song of praise to that which is true and beautiful and good.—Frothingham's Consolations of Rationalism.

For the man
Who, in this spirit, communes with the forms
Of nature; who, with understanding heart,
Doth know and love such objects as excite
No morbid passions, no disquietude,
No vengeance, and no hatreds, needs must feel
The joy of that pure principle of love
So deeply, that, unsatisfied with aught
Less pure and exquisit, he cannot choose
But seek for objects of a kindred love
In fellow-natures, and a kindred joy.
—Wordsworth's Excursion.

Truly a thinking man is the worst enemy the prince of darkness can hav; every time such a one announces himself, I doubt not there runs a shudder through the nether empire; and new emissaries are trained, with new tactics, to, if possible, entrap him, and hoodwink and handcuff him.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

On reaching the church Sunday morning they found that one of the officers of the church had spread one of the flags along the aisle. "Who put that flag down there?" angrily asked the leader of the sailors. "Mr. ——," said a bystander, "to save the carpet." "It has to come up. You may be good Christians here, but you are d——d poor Americans. Come aboard the Dale, and you will see every hat taken off as that emblem comes down." The flag came up.

ACCORDING to the Diario Romano, it is now precisely 2,641 years since Mr. Romulus, C. COLONEL INGERSOLL tells a new story of the first time he ever heard of Philadelphia—a place which, by the way, he does not like, because the Quaker City folk once threatened to put him in jail. The scene of the tale is out in Illinois, and the time many years ago. A schoolmaster had just been brought out from Philadelphia, and he at once set to work to find out where his new scholars stood in the matter of enlightenment. He tried them first on old Independence Hall. "There is a building in my city," he said, "that ought to make every one's heart throb with patriotism on seeing it or hearing of it. It is a grand building, full of the nation's life blood." Then he asked those scholars who knew the building he meant to raise their hands. Not a hand went up. Astonished and grieved at this woful ignorance, the Quaker City pedagog once more expounded the claims of the unknown building to fame, and then called for another raising of hands. This time a little Hebrew lad over in one corner of the room said that he knew it. "What is it, then, my little patriot?" said the gladdened schoolmaster. "The mint!" yelled the little fellow.

IN the debate on the interminable side issues of the Irish question in the British Parliament two weeks ago, Mr. Bradlaugh found an opportunity of paying some of his debts to Lord Randolph Churchill. "Mr. Bradlaugh," says the correspondent of the New York Sun, "has never forgotten the exciting times when Lord Randolph Churchill took high moral ground, made himself the champion of Christian morality, and exulted over the unpleasant experiences through which the unbelieving member has passed. Churchill has the bad habit of changing his mind very often, and of thinking different things on different days. In this debate he cheerfully expressed sentiments directly opposit to those which he had avowed but a few months previously, and then came Bradlaugh's opportunity. He arose on Thursday afternoon, and tore the erractic Churchill, surnamed 'The Stormy Petrel of the House of Commons,' most thoroughly into pieces. It was evident to every one, and especially so to his lordship, who was present, that he was in hands so powerful as to make his squirming useless. For over an hour Mr. Bradlaugh continued his torturing process, permitting not one weak spot in the ex-chancellor's moral armor to escape him, while the Irish and Liberal members cheered and laughed as they hav not done this session; for Bradlaugh was witty as well as severe. Pious strangers in the gallery shook their heads mournfully that so bad a man as the Infidel Bradlaugh should be allowed to score such a victory. The speech was, in many ways, the best heard in the House this session. Upon its conclusion Churchill went out for an extended walk among the lobbies and corridors. His failure even to attempt a reply lent emphasis to the fulness of his defeat."

The Age of the Earth and Man.

It is quite refreshing in this age of religious doubt and unbelief, and especially of ingenious sophistry on the part of eminent theologians in regard to the interpretation of the early chapters of Genesis, to find an intelligent and able man like Mr. J. W. Grabill, your correspondent, prepared to defend biblical chronology and biblical science against the latest views advanced by biblical commentators and men of science.

In my article on "The Age of Man" I affirmed that "the records of the Greeks and Romans show these great empires to hav been inhabited by civilized people as far back as 800 B.C." I further declared that the Chinese might be "found in a highly civilized condition, with a monarchy and a government, as far back as 2500 B.C.; while, according to such eminent authorities as Lepsius and Bunsen, the Egyptians hav a history that carries us back more than four thousand years B C."

To this statement Mr. Grabill demurs. He alleges that there is no evidence in support of it; that neither written records, architectural monuments, fragmentary remains, tradition, nor indeed anything that may fairly be regarded as evidence can be adduced in support of my statemeut. Now, in respect to Egypt, Mr. Grabill is good enough to cite the authority of Manetho, an Egyptian historian who lived in the reign of Ptolemy I., to demonstrate that the "first rulers in Egypt were gods, spirits, etc., and therefore that the early history of Egypt, to use his own very accurate language, "is shrouded in ignorance and fabulous conjecture."

It is quite true that in connection with Egyptian history and tradition there are a number of religious fables, such as we find associated with the early history and tradition of all other nations; but while Mr. Grabill quotes Manetho to discredit him, we find an eminent scientist like Quatrefages—himself opposed to the Darwinian theory—on the authority of Mariette-Bey, declaring that "the lists of Manetho go back to 5004 before our era" (Human Species, page 130) in proof of the great age of the Egyptian race.

And if this be true we are at once taken back a thousand years before the alleged creation of the world and man, and hav the further difficulty that, even according to the Bible, the Egyptian people were in a fairly advanced condition soon after the deluge, with a powerful monarchy and an army sufficiently strong and well trained to conquer the Jews and put them into subjection.

Mr. Grabill, to be thoroughly logical and consistent, believes in the historical accuracy of the biblical flood, with its manifold absurdities and impossibilities. He does not, it is true, say whether he believes in a local or a universal flood, but if he believes in the latter he must assuredly believe that the Egyptians, if there were any before that time, were swept off the face of the earth, and that this ancient race must hav been established afresh after the deluge.

But, according to Nott (Types of Man, page 211): "When Egypt first presents itself to our view, she stands forth, not in childhood, but with the maturity of manhood's age, arrayed in the time-worn habiliments of civilization. Her tombs, her temples, her pyramids, her manners, customs, and arts all betoken a full-grown nation. The sculptures of the fourth dynasty, the earliest extant, show that the arts of that day, some 3500 B C.—date of Menes, more than 3400 B C. (Humboldt), 3643 B.C. (Bunsen), 3892 B.C. (Kenrick), 3893 B.C. (Lepsius), 3895 B C. (Hincks), in each case more than a thousand years before the Usherian date of the deluge—had already arrived at a perfection little inferior to that of the eighteenth dynasty, which until lately was regarded as her Augustan age."

On the other hand, if Mr. Gabrill believes in a local flood—a flood which drowned the Jews, but respectfully refused to touch the Chinese—when he has explained why God should require Noah to gather all the animals into the ark, while many of them might hav remained unhurt on their nativ soil, or why Noah and his family did not emigrate to some other country, and thus avoid being caged with wild beasts in an ark for forty days and forty nights—while God mercilessly destroyed "every creature that had the breath of life"—I will begin to consider seriously how, regarding the Bible as true, there could hav been an Egyptian race before the flood, and from which of Adam's children they descended. Till then, however, I will let the above quotations, with one other, stand as my reply to your correspondent's first point. My other quotation is this. It is from Kenrick's "Ancient Egypt," page 131. The writer says: "The glimpse which we thus obtain of Egypt in the fifth century after Menes, according to the lowest computation (still a thousand years before the deluge), reveals to us some general facts which lead to important inferences. In all its general characteristics Egypt was the same as we see it a thousand years later, a well organized monarchy and religion elaborated throughout the country—the system of hieroglyphic writing the same, in all its leading peculiarities, and it continued to the end of the monarchy of the Pharaohs."

And now we come to the second point. Mr. Gabrill says that my declaration as to the Chinese being "found in a highly civilized condition, with a monarchy and government, as far back as 2,500 years B.C. is a wholly gratuitous statement."

Indeed! Mr. Gabrill is surely not stupid enough to imagin that I made such a statement on my own responsibility, apart altogether from authoritativ evidence on the subject.

Now, the Duke of Argyll, who certainly is not biased in favor of the view I take, in his "Primitiv Man" actually quotes Meadows on this very point as follows: "There is another civilization which appears to be almost as ancient as that of Egypt, and which has been far more enduring. The authentic records of the Chinese empire are said to begin 2,400 B.C.—300 years before Abraham. They begin, too, apparently with a kingdom already established with a capital city and with a settled government."

But according to Bunsen, another great authority, it took 5,000 years to form the Chinese language, which was begun about 20,000 B. C.

If we pay any attention to the theory that the age of man on the earth is less than 6,000 years, we are confronted with so many difficulties of an insuperable character that unless we set aside altogether the testimony of modern science, and common sense inferences from obvious facts, and open wide the mouth of credulity, the Mosaic story of the age and development of man on the earth is simply incredible. If Adam was the first man, what sort of man was he? Was he Jew? Then I am not his descendant. Was he Chinese? Then I am not his descendant. Was he Hindoo? Then I am not his descendant. Of what color and type was Adam? I confess I do not know, but neither does Mr. Grabill; but it is certain that he could not hav combined in himself all the diverse characteristics of the numerous races of men now on the earth; and though I am not disposed to argue for more than one species of man, I think that no man of science would go as far as to declare that it was possible for the numerous and diverse types of men to hav emerged from one single pair within the limits of the time claimed by biblical chronology. Moreover, as most men of science believe that man is the off-shoot of the ape, it is quite within the range of probability that one branch of the genus homo went off in one direction, and another in another, and from these, through the slow evolutionary process, the various races of men of diverse types descended. And as Haeckel well says (Pedigree of Man, page 80): "In that long chain of many generations that formed the transition from the men-apes to the ape-men, and from these last to actual articulate-speaking man, no single pair can be designated as 'the first pair of human beings.'"

But because Moses, in an age of ignorance, said that man originated from one pair, Mr. Grabill asks us to conclude that "either he (Moses) was gifted with faculties far surpassing all human experience, or else his knowledge was divine."

But what does Mr. Grabill mean by divine? Do human beings possess faculties that are not human but superhuman? The word "divine" has no meaning except to persons who hav had a theological training; that is, persons who hav been trained to accept everything as gospel which they cannot understand. Besides, I deny that Moses says that man originated from one single pair. If Mr. Grabill will look in the first chapter of Genesis (which, by the by, was neither written by Moses nor by anybody acquainted with the alleged facts it contains) he will find that "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he them; male and female created he them."

That is, God did not create one single pair, but numerous men and women.

In the second chapter, which also was not written by Moses, I know we are told that God created one man, and then, as an afterthought, one woman to be his "helpmeet;" but a manifest contradiction like this surely does not demonstrate that the writer was gifted with faculties far surpassing all human experience, or that "his knowledge was divine," unless, indeed, "divine" means something approaching foolishness, which in many cases I hav found it to be.

All that Mr. Grabill says about the time it has taken to produce many varieties of dogs and pigeons is quite beside the question.

Professor Haeckel has traced the dog back to the jackal and the wolf as clearly as Huxley has the horse to the bear. Then, again, Mr. Grabill says: "Oriental scholars hav by patient diligence deciphered the inscriptions which the temples, palaces, and fragmentary remains of Egypt, Assyria, and India bear, and what is the result? They hav added immeasurably to our knowledge of those ancient times, and both corroborated and explained in a wonderful manner the brief allusions of the Bible."

That the investigations of oriental scholars hav added immensely to our knowledge I am not prepared to dispute, but I deny altogether that they corroborate what Mr. Grabill calls "the brief allusions of the Bible." What brief allusions? What could oriental scholars corroborate in reference to the Mosaic account of the origin of man, by reference to monuments, inscriptions, or fragmentary remains? Certainly not that man was less than six thousand years old, and most assuredly not that he was of one type and one race? What then? Let Mr. Grabill reply.

Then your correspondent on his own responsibility, and presumably of his own superior knowledge, disputes Humboldt's calculation that a cypress-tree in New Orleans was six thousand years old, though there were four fossil forests above the root of said tree, under which the skeleton of a man was found.

If Humboldt's calculation stood by itself, it would not be without value, but when it is corroborated from a hundred other sources, the degree of probability attaching to its truthfulness is very much hightened. Mr. Grabill disposes of Wm. Pengelly's "three hundred thousand years as the lowest estimate for man's existence in England" by cutting off two naughts from the right of this scientist's calculation, and thus by a very easy process takes three thousand years as a period "approximating correctness."

Mr. Pengelly's calculation he calls "mere guesswork." But is this true? How was the calculation made? "We know," said this scientist in his lecture on "The Time that Has Elapsed Since the Era of the Cave Men of Devonshire," "that in Kent's Cavern there are inscriptions on the granular stalagmite, and we know further that the lines of drainage of the cavern (Kent's Cavern) hav not changed. Now, if it takes two hundred and fifty years to form the twentieth of an inch in thickness in a part of a cavern where the stalagmite has been formed with unusual rapidity, judging from these bosses, you perceive clearly enough that it would take twenty times that amount of time at that rate to represent an inch—that is, five thousand years, and we hav fully five feet to account for in the granular stalagmite only. Now, ladies and gentlemen, are you prepared for that amount of time? Five thousand years for an inch, and sixty inches—sixty times five thousand years."

Does Mr. Grabill doubt that scientifie men can calculate with marvelous precision and accuracy the movements of the heavenly bodies? And if he does not doubt this, surely he should be able to advance a reason why he should discredit the statements and calculations of men of science who make geology and paleontology their special studies.

Your correspondent concludes by admitting "that it is true that the remains of man are found in the deposits of the quaternary age, but no such remains hav been found which carries the human period back more than a few thousand years."

A few thousand years! Yes, Mr. Grabill, truly a few thousand; a considerable "few," however, longer than the biblical six thousand.

Mr. Grabill's statement reminds me of the lines:

> In our Sunday-school they told
> Man was not so very old,
> For God formed him from red mold
> Years ago, six thousand.

But science teaches that

> When youth and young manhood came,
> This seemed not so very plain;
> Oft we thought and thought again,
> Only just six thousand?
> Then when history we read,
> This can never be, we said;
> More in number must hav fled
> Than some mere six thousand.
> For th' historic scribes aver
> Egypt's older, and for her
> Claim a full ten thousand year
> More, this, than six thousand.
> Now upgrown, we scan more wide,
> Nor can dogmas false abide.
> Science bears us on her tide
> Far from years six thousand.
> Bone needles, and knives of stone,
> Flint tools formed in ages gone,
> Up dug, are in triumph shown.
> Foolish, fond six thousand.
> Thus we come to clearly see,
> As we ask, When first lived he?
> That man's years more likely be
> More than six hundred thousand.

But Mr. Grabill must not suppose that all the paleontological evidence can be set aside because he is not satisfied that the Mosaic theory has been refuted.

When the German scientist, F. F. Esper, in 1774 discovered some human bones mingled with the remains of the northern bear and other extinct species in Gailenruth, Bavaria, the Mosaic story was rendered doubtful. When Tournal in 1826 gave to the world the result of his discoveries in a cave in Aude (France), where he found bones of the bison and reindeer cut and carved by the hand of man; when Schmerling in 1833 made further discoveries of the same kind in Belgium; when in 1858 Pengelly supplemented these discoveries by finding human remains under stalagmite in England; when in 1863

Boucher de Perthes, of Abbeville, discovered at Moulin Quignon at a depth of fifteen feet, in a virgin argilo-ferruginous bed belonging to the later Pliocene or early Pleistocene period, the half of a human lower jaw-bone, by the side of a flint hatchet and not far from it two mammoths' teeth; when Dupont in 1864 found in the Tesse valley three different layers of human and other remains, side by side with bones of the mammoth, rhinoceros, and other extinct animals, the Mosaic story by rational beings was no longer doubted—it was discredited and denied. And no argument Mr. Grabill has yet advanced has in the smallest degree weakened the force of these and similar facts which I advanced in my former paper to demonstrate the vast antiquity of man.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

McArthur's Challenge to Lambert.

MR. LAMBERT'S REPLY TO MR. M'ARTHUR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: McArthur seems to be much irritated at my neglect of him. He is not the first to take up the defense of Ingersoll. He has been anticipated by Mr. B. W. Lacy, who wrote a good-sized book which he called "Reply to Lambert's Notes on Ingersoll." I hav written a rejoinder to this reply, which is now going through the press in Buffalo, and will be on sale in the course of a few weeks. This will explain my reason for ignoring McArthur; I was dealing with an abler and better informed man.

But as McArthur is evidently spoiling for a fight, I see no reason why he should not be accommodated, providing he accepts it on the lines indicated by my challenge. In the concluding paragraph of the "Notes," I made the following statements:

> We hav said enough to convince our readers that Mr. Ingersoll is profligate of statement; that he is not to be trusted; that he is unscrupulous; that as a logician and metaphysician he is beneath contempt; that he is a mere galvanizer of old objections long ago refuted; that he is ignorant and superficial—full of gas and gush—in a word, that he is a philosophical charlatan of the first water, who mistakes curious listeners for disciples, and applause for approval" (Notes, page 200).

These are the points which I claimed to hav established in the "Notes." I then continued as follows:

> Of course, we do not expect him to reply to us, and for several reasons. First, he will not want to; second, he cannot; third, he can pretend not to notice an obscure country pastor. Very well, then let some of his disciples or admirers try to rehabilitate his smirched character. We hold ourselvs responsible to him and all the glib little whiffets of his shallow school.

I now repeat the charges and the challenge, and address them directly to McArthur. It will be well for him to observe, if he accepts this challenge, that the discussion between him and me is not whether Christianity is true or false, but whether my charges against Ingersoll are true or false. Both Mr. Lacy and McArthur hav mistaken the issue raised by my challenge. They seem to think that they can defend Ingersoll by attacking Christianity. This is a great mistake on their part, for I hold that my charges are true whether Christianity be true or false. Hence, even if they were to prove Christianity to be false it would not in the least effect my charges against Ingersoll. Ingersoll's chicanery, double-dealing, misrepresentations, and contradictions would be equally reprehensible if directed against Mormonism or Mohammedanism.

My charges can be answered only by being taken up seriatim and disproved. When McArthur disproves or admits them, it will be time to consider the propriety of discussing with him the claims of Christianity.

Both he and Mr. Lacy erred when they imagined that I volunteered as a sitter to be talked at by every Tom, Dick, or Harry who suffers under the hallucination that he has something to say worth listening to.

"I hav no doubt," says McArthur, "that Mr. Ingersoll had good and sufficient reasons for declining to meet Mr. Lambert." There are very many who are of McArthur's way of thinking.

Again he says, "It is not customary for a leader to go out of his way to answer every charge, even if made by a clergyman."

Men of character and standing do not consider it "going out of their way" when they defend themselvs against charges so serious as to affect their honor and veracity. It is their custom to meet them, and when they fail to do so they favor the suspicion that they cannot.

Again, McArthur tells us that "the curious reader of the "Notes" will find a reason on its every page, and may possibly determin that Mr. Ingersoll simply declined to 'stoop to conquer.'" I tried to put a reason on every page why he should decline to stoop to conquer, and it appears that he has deemed them sufficient. But to the sneer of McArthur, I retort that the intelligent reader of his article will see in it good and sufficient reasons why I should pay no attention whatever to what he may say. For instance, when he meets Dr. Brownson's psychological argument for the existence of God by a sneering reference to his poverty, and a malicious insinuation that the doctor was not sincere in his convictions, he proves that he is more of an adept in slander than in logic. Yet this is the gentleman who insists that arguments should be "impersonal." The fact that Brownson is dead makes it all the more safe for McArthur to indulge in his sneers. The jackass can kick with impunity the dead lion.

L. A. LAMBERT.

MR. M'ARTHUR'S REJOINDER.

The above answer, if answer it may be considered, shows the true animus of the "Notes." Christianity is not to be defended, but a blackguard attack on one who is the peer of any living man is the question, and the only question, this reverend self-confessed smircher deems worthy of consideration.

To the millions who are acquainted with Mr. Ingersoll, either personally or by his lectures, it is now obvious why he declined to "stoop to conquer;" why, as a clean man, he viewed with loathing one who, though called of God, dealt only in the most scurrilous language, and ignored all the usages of decent society.

His God, so this reverend smircher fondly believes, called him to his present position as a teacher; and having been educated, possibly, by the charity of the hundreds of thousands of Irish servants throughout this country, anointed with holy oil, and his mind illumined by the Holy Ghost, he rushes unsolicited into a controversy carried on by two gentlemen, and slings at one of them the epithets of "ghoul, blatant blasphemer, mountebank, philosophical charlatan, ignorant, superficial, full of gas and gush," etc., etc. The gentleman thus maligned had among other things remarked, "Water always runs down hill." For this unphilosophical assertion he is anathematized, and all the loving terms this Christian gentleman had ever heard of or could possibly manufacture were bestowed on him with unstinted hand.

I, also, poor I, thinking it possible there was an honest priest in this country—one who was true to his convictions, one who dared to defend in public what he was supposed to practice in private, one who could satisfy me that I had an immortal soul which could be saved only through the holy Catholic church—I dared to address a note to this vicegerent of God, and in answer am assured that I am a jackass.

Well, possibly that may be, but my opinion of the "Notes" still remains unchanged, and I think if they are on record in the "New Jerusalem," that God has exclaimed, "Save me from my friends!" for I feel certain that no honest God could read them without feeling convinced that in securing the services of this Waterloo theologian the world's people had lost, and he had gained, simply nothing.

Of late years this seems to be the ending of religious controversies. Ever since the discussion between Pope and Maguire, embryonic theologians of the Catholic stripe hav hesitated arguing the merits of their system. It seems to giv too much publicity. Publicity causes thought; thought is destructiv of arbitrary creed, and Rome trembles at the possible consequences. She would rather hav her dogmas expounded from the pulpit by her trained servants. They are to be the only enlightened ones, or, as the Catholic Review of late issue more graphically puts it:

> We do not, indeed, prize as high as some of our countrymen do the ability to read, write, and cipher. Some men are born to be leaders, and the rest are born to be led. The best ordered and administered state is that in which the few are well educated and lead, and the many are trained to obedience.

To which I would add an oriental proverb, and attract the attention of the reverend smircher to it: "The man who knows something, and who knows that he knows something, is a happy man; the man who knows nothing, and who knows that he knows nothing, is comparativly happy; but the man who knows nothing, but does not know that he knows nothing, is a wretched fool."

The reason is patent why the reverend smircher declines to argue on cold facts; why he loads his opponent with abuse. It is simply because he knows that if the inner workings of his system were laid bare they would shock the sensibilities of a Digger Indian. He knows full well that the claims of his masters will not bear the light of investigation, so he would rather remain a slave to a parcel of Italian lazzaroni, and retain his easy situation, than boldly strike out like a man and earn his own living.

Rome is gradually undergoing the process of disintegration. She has ceased directing the policy of nations, and the presumed successor of the meek and lowly Jesus no longer has armies and navies at his command. Her God has deserted her, and, like Patience, she sits on a monument smiling at grief—not her grief, but that which she has caused humanity for so many years.

Her anathema sit (which, being anglicized, means God damn you, or go to hell) is now a meaningless ecclesiastical term, and having played its part as a boomerang, has been relegated to its proper position among the low and vulgar.

She still retains her dogmas, wealth of ritual, pictures, music, incense—in fact, all that appeals to the eye, but her strength has been sapped by the printing-press and public school, and her last hold on the credulity of her followers is of such a slight nature that her priests dare not let in light, but hav recourse to vilification, and that alone, when they meet an opponent.

Attacked on all sides, she has received the worst blows from her own children; in fact, from those who would sacrifice health, fame, wealth, family, all that man holds dear, rather than deprive her of even one of her many claims.

When M. le Maistre was preparing his work, "Du Pape," every facility was accorded him for gathering facts. Archives closed to the outer world were opened to him. As he proceeded he became gradually aware of the character of these vicegerents of God, and he hesitated at completing his task. But the work had been promised, the world expected it, and this good son of the church was forced to groan out, "At the time when courtesans, monsters of licentiousness and wickedness, taking advantage of the public disorders, disposed of things at Rome and contrived to place their sons and lovers on the seat of St. Peter, I most expressly deny that those men were popes."

Is it any wonder that under such a showing the reverend smircher declines to argue on cold facts? Bearing allegiance to such a power, as depicted by one of his own people, is it strange that his only recourse should be vilification and abuse? Who blames him for not having accepted my one hundred dollars offered if he would meet Mr. J. E. Remsburg for five nights? It might hav been made a thousand, yet the reverend smircher would hav declined. I simply desired to show his admirers that he had been masquerading for two years in a lion's skin.

In regard to the insinuation that I sneered at Dr. Brownson's poverty, I will simply say, I did not. I stated facts, and anyone acquainted with the New York Catholics of forty years ago knows my statement to be correct.

Mr. Donnelly, a wealthy merchant, first conceived the idea of this Review, and it is notorious that O. A. Brownson undertook its management and became a Catholic only after several thousands of dollars had been subscribed. At that time he was living in the upper portion of a rather obscure tenement house in a very unsavory part of the city. His son was educated for the priesthood, and on several occasions was severely reprimanded for drunkenness. The Review fell to pieces of its own weight, but not till after Archbishop Hughes had felt constrained, on several occasions, to notify this profoundly philosophical editor that his articles were not only too heavy, but that they trenched on forbidden grounds. That Bronson died of an over-dose of chloral is, or was, an open secret; my informant being his physician, a prominent Catholic.

I am thus particular, Rev. Smircher, because, being a pagan, I am true to my church, which teaches, De mortuis nil nisi bonum, and I do not desire to hav even you think there is one particle of Christianity in or about me.

In this treatment of the dead, we differ essentially from you Christians. One of the most powerful sermons I ever heard was a vilification of Thomas Paine, delivered by the Rev. Mr. Walworth. I adverted to it in my letters to "D. C." Not many years afterward, the nephew of this Rev. Smircher invited his own father to visit him at his hotel, and then and there murdered the old man. I mention this incidentally. Possibly, if I were a Catholic, I might say it was a punishment from God for the vilification of the memory of one of the noblest characters in history—a man who rose to the sublime when he said, "The world is my country, to do good my religion."

In conclusion, Rev. Smircher, I will simply add that I am not open for an argument with you. My few friends are ladies and gentlemen, people unaccustomed to either smirch or be smirched, and valuing their society very highly, I am disinclined to introduce a new element.

Your admirers hav received copies of our correspondence, and will also receive a copy of this, and you can, if you so desire, explain to them by mail any other points you may wish to elucidate.

You digged a pit,
You digged it deep,
You digged it for your brother.
But it so fell out
That you fell in
The pit you digged for another.

Yours, MCARTHUR.

There is a great laugh going around town at the expense of ex-Public Printer Rounds. When Mr. Rounds went out of office he went to Omaha and assumed charge of the Omaha Republican. Fortune has smiled upon him in his new field of labor, but it is evident that his early piety has been sadly neglected. In the Easter edition of his paper there appeared a very full and elaborate account of the Easter services, but, unfortunately for him, it was "love's labor lost," for his readers were so taken by the head-lines that they never got any further. Here they are: "Echoes of Easter—How the Savior's Birthday was Beautifully Observed in Omaha."

One of the Coons Comes Down.

The Executiv Committee of the American Museum of Natural History has sent the following letter to the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of this city, and a copy has also been forwarded to the Department of Parks:

"Your honorable bodies hav on former occasions called our attention to the desire that our museum should be open to the public on Sundays, and stated that if such an opening was made an additional sum would be appropriated by the city toward defraying the expense thereof. In order that a full discussion of that subject by our trustees could be had, at the invitation of the mayor (who is one of the trustees), a special meeting was called at his house, March 21st last, to discuss the subject of Sunday opening. A resolution was offered to open the museum on Sunday, and the same was rejected.

"The mayor expressed his own opinion, and supposed he did also that of other members of your boards, that unless some arrangement was made to open the museum on Sunday probably no additional money would be voted by your boards to the museum hereafter for any purpose.

"It was with this view of the subject that on further discussion a resolution was adopted declaring the museum open on Sunday, and asking the executiv committee to confer with us.

"In pursuance of the instructions of the trustees embodied in the resolutions, the executiv committee hav carefully considered the whole subject as to what the additional cost of the museum would be by opening on Sunday from 1 to 6 o'clock, and hav come to the following conclusions, which they desire to present to your honorable boards:

"The present yearly expense of the museum, including the salaries of the curators, clerks, engineer, janitor, night watchman, and attendants, labor, coal, supplies, repairs, etc., is $23,889,88. Of this the city pays $15,000 for value received by opening to the public free four days in each week, and the balance is made up mostly by gifts from the trustees, they having contributed during the past year, for this purpose, $7,500. This year the expenses will be increased at least $5,000 for additional superintendence, labor, and clerical force that will be required, making probably a yearly expense of about $29,000, irrespectiv of Sunday opening.

"To open the museum on Sunday the committee, after a careful investigation of the whole subject, and full conference with the curators of the different departments, janitor, and engineer, giv the estimate of what the increased cost will be. It will be about $9,140.

"If it be true, as is stated by the papers and individuals who favor Sunday opening, that great crowds will flock to the museum on that day, you will readily see the increased responsibility of the trustees for providing for extra care of the collections. If, on the other hand, crowds do not come, it would seem that there would be no necessity for opening the museum on Sundays, and the city might be saved this expense.

"We also assume that contributions and subscriptions now received from friends of the museum who are unfavorable to the opening on Sunday will be withdrawn.

"We hav, therefore, come to the conclusion that if the museum be opened on Sunday, in accordance with the demands of the city authorities, the city should assume the expense. We therefore respectfully ask that you arrange to giv us $15,000 additional per annum for opening to the public free on Sundays, thus making a total of $30,000 annually."

Mr. Morris K. Jesup is president of this museum, and he has been the head and front of the opposition to Sunday opening, the other officials merely clinging to his coattails. His descent is not performed very gracefully, and the evident intention of the museum officers is to squeeze the municipal orange for all it is worth, now that they are crowded into offering Sunday opening. The figures set are about twice or three times the extra cost entailed by continuous opening, and if the offer is accepted by the city the trustees should not be allowed to set apart two days in the week exclusivly for the visits of the five-hundred and one-thousand-dollar a-year patrons of the museum. Little credit is due the officials for the offer. They know that without Sunday opening they must giv up all hope of getting the four hundred thousand dollars which the legislature granted providing the Board of Estimate and Apportionment agreed. This board, which has absolute power to giv or withhold the money, is well known to be stoutly in favor of Sunday opening. Hence the come down of the coon. The surrender, however, the animal wishes to make with as much profit to itself as possible.

After all, it might be best for the city to pay all the expenses of the museums, and take charge of them. The time proposed by the trustees of Sunday opening—from 1 to 6 P.M.—is not sufficient. It should be from 10 A.M. to 7 P.M. If the city owned the institutions in whole, the matter could be arranged to suit the convenience of the people. By not opening the doors until 1 o'clock the trustees think they hav avoided placing temptation to stay away from church before the people of the city, and thereby saved what little conscience they may possess. This higgling and bargain-driving simply shows that though the trustees may be very religious, they are not extraordinarily honest; for if their objections to Sunday opening were based on honest adherence to principle, no amount of money that could be offered would induce them to violate their convictions.

But though the city pay a high price for a limited concession, it is better than sinking half the money and getting no return at all. The present trustees cannot reasonably hope to liv forever, and in the twentieth century New York may enjoy the treasures which it has cost so many hundreds of thousands of dollars to possess.

The Two Tyrannies of Russia.

In a little book recently published by Demas Barnes are found many important facts concerning that imperial despot among nations, the Russian empire. Mr. Barnes was traveling through northern Europe in search of cooling breezes—traveling, too, with wide-open eyes, and judgment unclouded by superstition—and what he found besides the breezes he recorded for the benefit of the readers of a Brooklyn newspaper. But with that calm omniscience which distinguishes the usual editor, the gentleman who controled the Brooklyn journal cut out the most interesting portions of the correspondence, and Mr. Barnes, who is a gentleman of wealth as well as of talent, has given us his book to set himself right.

Russia is generally known to be in civilization the most backward of the nations, and its government is the most atrociously despotic. Her rulers riot in wealth, her peasantry grovel in poverty. There is no freedom, and none of the people seem able to comprehend the meaning of the term. The czar is a father with an enormous family of children, most of whom are bad, and the rod of correction is never idle. The prisons are always full; Siberia's population is steadily increasing by accession and decreasing by death; no person in power feels secure from the bomb or bullet of the Nihilist, and no man in the realm can tell when he may be hauled before a magistrate and charged with treason. The empire is chaos, kept from bursting by the application of an enormous pressure of physical force.

As a student trained to seeking causes of phenomena, Mr. Barnes endeavored to find out what keeps Russia, naturally so prolific in food and raw material for manufacturing purposes, in such degradation. He found surface indications showing two causes —government and religion. The last analysis would, however, show but one—religion. For if it were not for their religion, or rather superstition, the people would never submit to the present government. The territory of Russia includes about one twenty-fifth of the globe, and her natural resources are inexhaustible. In a condition of savagery, she is still the most formidable competitor of the United States in the production of cereals, wool, flax, hemp, tobacco, salt, the precious metals, and petroleum. Eastern Russia is naturally as rich as any portion of this country. On the alluvial lands of the Volga and other rivers the soil is deep and enduring. Some labor-saving machinery is used there, but it is all imported from America. Russians do not invent. The railroads are built by foreigners. Men who in America would be managing banks and manufactories are in Russia porters at hotels, cooks in kitchens, or at best painters of madonnas and chiselers of images. A young man cannot change his vocation, as with us, but he must continue as his father lived before him. The cobbler's bench and the plow-handles are hereditary, like the czar's crown. Manufacturing privileges are farmed out by the government as monopolies, and public works carried on by favored agents of the district governments. And the imperial government takes good care that things shall remain as they are. Intercourse with the outside world is almost impossible—clearly so without the knowledge of the government spies. Russia is fortified on all sides by fortresses and guns, and a secret espionage is zealously maintained. The people are taxed to support a standing army of hundreds of thousands of men, and upon the castles and palaces of royalty and the nobility has been wasted, says Mr. Barnes, money sufficient to hav created a rebellion anywhere except under a tyrannical government like that of Russia. To obtain money to pay their taxes the peasants liv in hovels, plow with a forked stick, and thresh grain by whipping handfuls of straw over the end of a board. In the Kremlin museums there is wasted wealth sufficient to develop the resources of the whole empire. Silver and gold, malachite, jasper, rubies, diamonds, and sapphires are not only worked into crowns, thrones, and vestments, but they are formed into furniture, and make fire-places, walls, and ceilings. The rapacity and avariciousness of the government and the nobility are infinit. Within the Kremlin walls, where are the palaces of the czar, the treasury, public buildings, and royal churches, the wealth squandered appals the beholder. Some of the walls are plated a sixteenth of an inch thick with gold. Seventy thousand pearls are worked into a suit of clothes, worn, perhaps, once by a czar. The military fortifications which protect Moscow and these treasures are twenty-three miles in circumference. The peace army of Russia is eight hundred and twenty thousand men. In time of war she can put into the field over four million. Seldom are there less than a million and a half of men under arms for the people to support. The wage of farm laborers is about twenty cents per day, the pay of female servants about three dollars per month. The peasants liv upon lentils, rye bread, potatoes, and though a sheep may be purchased for the price of a day's work, so poor is the peasantry that the laborer seldom tastes meat. Women work in the fields, and the children are never educated. Seventy millions of Russia's population liv in log cabins, the individual cost of which would not exceed one hundred dollars. A log cabin for a home; rye bread, lentils, and potatoes to eat—that is the portion of the peasant for a life of toil; the balance that he can earn is grabbed from him by the government and the church.

The church in Russia is back of the government, and the two can scarcely be separated. The church, however, as well as government officials, comes in direct contact with the people, and the tyranny of their religion is, says Mr. Barnes, worse, if possible, than the tyranny of the government. The Greek Catholic church is the original Catholic religion, and claims to inherit the true succession from Christ. The people of Russia believe this; they believe in patriarchal infallibility, and readily and submissivly do whatever the priests command. And the first commandment of the church is to giv to the church a large portion of their earnings, and a last commandment is like unto it—giv to the priests half of what remains. To show the superstitious submissivness of the people, Mr. Barnes relates that when at one time the church issued an order that, as potatoes are not mentioned in the Bible, the people must not eat potatoes, potatoes were banished and the people went back to eating more weeds!

There are over forty thousand Greek Catholic churches in Russia, besides numberless religious institutions, such as monasteries, where the monks liv on contributions from the people. No person is permitted to change his religion, except in case of marriage, when the husband must embrace the religion of the wife. The churches of Russia are as gorgeous as the homes of the peasants are squalid. Their domes and minarets are gilded, and each church costs more than the homes of a hundred thousand of the people who worship in them. The churches of Moscow—about a thousand in number—are the grandest in the world. Most of them hav from five to twenty-five domes and minarets, and some hav from fifty to one hundred. They are colored white, green, red, or blue, or are covered with silver or gold. The Cathedral of the Assumption, in which the czars are crowned, is decorated with columns of porphyry and jasper, with the floor paved with agates and carnelians, and walls covered with mosaics of priceless materials. Aside from this, the money paid to support the priesthood, from the patriarch in Jerusalem to the priest of the parish, is frightful in amount. Untold wealth is lavished upon shrines, pictures, vestments, and other ecclesiastical paraphernalia, and the army of idle priests and monks numbers scores of thousands. These must all be supported by the people, seventy millions of whom are but just emerging from the slavery of serfhood, and living upon rye bread and potatoes, cultivating the ground with the rudest kind of tools, and considering themselvs fortunate to escape the long tramp to Siberia!

Is it any wonder, when we know these things, that the most familiar message that comes over the wires from Russia is, "Another attempt upon the life of the czar?" As the head of the church and absolute owner of the lives of his subjects, he unites in himself the two brutal forces that are crushing the life from the people. But the murder of a czar will little affect the people until they destroy the ecclesiastical system back of him. When they learn that kings are not divinely appointed they may hav a government that will leave upon their tables something better than potatoes, and allow them to hav a few of the necessaries of life in their log cabins.

God and His Slaves.

In the following paragraph the editors of the Independent giv away the whole basis of Christianity:

"Dr. Charles S. Robinson, of this city, has an article in the May number of the Homiletic Review, bearing the following rather startling title: 'Where was the Creator Before the Creation?' It is clearly a doctrin of the Bible, which reason finds no difficulty in accepting, that there is a God, one and only one supreme being, the Jehovah of the Old Testament, and that this one God is self-existent and eternal, without beginning and without end, and that all other forms of existence, whether material or non-material, are to be traced to him as the products of his power. What then about this God 'before the creation?' We do not understand the Bible to giv any answer to this question other than the fact of his existence as the same God that he is after creation. The passages referred to by Dr. Robinson manifestly refer to God in creation and after it, and not 'before creation.' Reason, leaping beyond its own bounds, may ask Dr. Robinson's question, but plainly it cannot answer it. The better way is not to ask the question. It is quite enough to know God as he is in creation and after it, without knowledge of him 'before creation.' 'Where' God was 'before creation,' what he did, and what he did not do, are matters which human beings at least must remit to the category of those 'secret things' that belong not unto us, but unto 'the Lord our God.' The Bible here givs us no light, and reason has none to giv. It is a good thing in reasoning on the subject of religion, as well as upon other matters, to know what are the boundaries of human thought, and always keep within them. If we get beyond them, we simply overwhelm ourselvs in the great deep of our own ignorance."

If God is eternal, then he must always hav existed somewhere. But if there was no somewhere till the creation of the universe, then the question, Where was he before the creation? is a legitimate inquiry and one which it is incumbent upon those in God's confidence to answer.

The Christian idea is that God created time and space when he created the matter of the universe. But it is simply absurd to say that there has been a time when time was not, or that there hav been places where space was not. Time is eternal; space is infinit. Human reason finds no difficulty in accepting this, but it flatly refuses to acknowledge that time or space could be created, or that a universe of matter could be manufactured from nothing.

If God existed before the creation, he must hav occupied space. That space he could not hav created. Time was also a factor in God's existence. That time he could not hav created. We thus hav time and space existing co-eternal with God. Those certainly are two things which he did not make. Next, we hav the universe of matter, filling space. Now, we never heard of anyone who could successfully confute the very simple proposition that "something cannot be made of nothing"—that matter can not be created from an absolute absence of anything. It follows, therefore, as the night the day, that inasmuch as matter exists to-day, there never was any period when it did not exist. This is very simple, easily understood, and incapable of refutation by any theologian. If, then, God did not speak himself into being contemporary with the creation—an unthinkable theory—and if he exists at all—which we are by no means prepared to admit—he must hav used space in which to exist, time must hav elapsed, and his residence must hav been amid the matter he is supposed to hav created. If His Infinitude filled all space, this could not hav been; for two substances cannot occupy one place at the same time; if he just resided in one corner of the universe, then he is limited, and therefore could not be capable of creating all things.

The Bible is no authority at all, for the men who wrote it knew much less concerning nature and her phenomena than the people of the present day. The writers of Genesis believed God to be an exaggerated king, and they accounted for the existence of the universe in the childish manner narrated in the first chapters of the Old Testament. No sensible white man believes the stories to-day. The question asked by Mr. Robinson is, therefore, the wildest of wild inquiries, for until the present existence of God is first proved, and the creation account is indubitably attested, there is no call to go further back. A better question would hav been, Where has he been since the creation? when so many millions of his supposed children are dying of want, disease, and horrible accidents. Where was he when his believers were fed to wild beasts? when they died in the desert on the way to his son's tomb? when famins hav depopulated countries? when earthquakes hav entombed whole cities? when his children hav been murdering millions of their brothers? Where was he, and where is he, when desolation and wretchedness are universal? when human suffering passes the bearable? when agony shrieks in impotent frenzy, and death is the only kind thing in the world? Cold, blind, deaf, and dumb, he is either cruel beyond comparison or powerless beneath contempt.

The theologian of the Independent opens the well-worn path from this dilemma, but it is the only path out. It must be traveled, however, at the sacrifice of manhood. Ask no questions about God, is the only way to believe in him. Believe what the priests say; beyond that the mind must be blank. Reason knows him not, nor can it allow that he exists without accusing him of criminal acts of omission and commission which, if a human being were responsible for, would make him welcome eternal unconsciousness as the most blessed of states. The truly consistent Christian will say when affliction comes upon him, God doeth all things well, and then go to sleep. If he reasons upon the why and wherefore of it, he must in the end deny God or his providence. Therefore, to save his faith he must say "there are boundaries of human thought," and we must "always keep within them." This last conclusion is the one the priests desire all men to arrive at, for then these holy folks can still fatten on man's unreasoning foolishness.

But what a confession for the Christians is this, that they worship a being about whom they cannot reason, and upon whose existence his own word throws no light! Superstition can ask for no more pliant knee than the Christian of the Independent type possesses.

Mr. Reynolds's Case.

Between the going to press of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the date of issue will occur the trial of C. B. Reynolds. When Mr. Reynolds, his counsel and bondsman, appeared in the Morris County court last Monday morning, District-Attorney Cutler was not ready for trial. He had not had time to prepare. But he had found ample opportunity to get out another indictment against Mr. Reynolds for distributing the pamphlets in Morristown. This he handed Colonel Ingersoll with great deference, just as though it pained him. The trial was then set down for Thursday, May 19th, at 11 A.M.

For this second indictment Mr. Reynolds is probably indebted to the friendly offices of the Methodist editor of the Boonton Bulletin, who was on the grand jury for the present term, aided by the pleasant and pious Mr. Cutler.

A daily paper of this city says that in several of the churches of Morristown prayers hav been offered touching this trial, and in one church in particular divine assistance was implored to enable the young men of the church to restrain themselvs from attending the trial, on account of the pernicious influence it might exert upon their minds.

Our readers will know the result next week.

SAYS Brick Pomeroy: "THE TRUTH SEEKER names Robert Ingersoll as its choice for the presidency. Get out, man! Bob Ingersoll is a man of brains. A man of ideas. A man with a great big heart. A man who has long since outgrown his party. A man who does the larger part of his own thinking. A man who—but pshaw! he is too good a man to be president, especially when he has no powerful organization to run a successful campaign in his behalf."

A CATHOLIC journal says the workingmen should honor Cardinal Gibbons for having defended their cause "before the highest tribunal of the world." Why? The pope has no authority. He cannot imprison a man nor fine him. He is utterly impotent as a ruler in this country unless his slaves bow to the rod. The pope is a creation of his creatures. Yet the man who should carve out a wooden image and then worship and fear it would be called a fool. What are the Catholics who prostrate themselvs before the pope?

E. C. WALKER can see a point. In Lucifer of the 6th instant he says: "Eugene Macdonald is getting impatient with his stupid readers who are determined to hav him an Anarchist because he advocates justice for all classes of people, including Anarchists and Socialists. If the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER should protest against the burning alive of Catholics, I hav no doubt that some of his readers would swear he was a Catholic and tell him to stop sending them the paper! It is so difficult to make m ost people see an abstract principle, even when they are pointed to any number of concrete illustrations of it."

THE reason why Mr. Lambert's reply to Mr. McArthur, and the latter's rejoinder, which appear in another column, hav been so long delayed is that the manuscript has been lost in some of the offices of the International Express. In printing discussions we like, whenever we reasonably can, to giv both sides in the same issue. When Mr. Lambert's reply was received, we forwarded it to Mr. McArthur, who promptly wrote his rejoinder and started it on its way. But it reached us only Wednesday of last week, and the manuscript had been torn in two and pasted together. Perhaps some Catholic agent caught a glimpse of its contents and thought it incumbent upon him to suppress both the priest and the heretic.

COURTLANDT PALMER, president of the American Secular Union, presided at the last meeting of the Nineteenth Century Club, of which he is also the head. Governor Hoadly spoke on "The Bible in the Schools." He said he understood that the question referred simply to the schools of the state, and not to private or parochial schools. The state does not take the place of the parent, and has no call to teach theology and religion as against the parents. It is the sole duty of the parents to teach religion to their children. If the state should teach religion to the young, why not to the old! The age of twenty-one is a purely arbitrary division, and as a man grows older and approaches the grave perhaps he needs more religious teaching. It is proper that the Bible should be read as literature in the schools, but not as religion. Governor Hoadly was followed by Dr. McGlynn, who holds the most sensible views upon the question of any Catholic priest known. Dr. McGlynn said: "I do not propose to attack the Catholic religion. I am still a Catholic—a Catholic priest—and shall always remain just as I am. I believe that the Bible has no proper place in the public schools. The demand for the reading of the Bible in the schools was originally intended as an affront to the Catholic church, which holds that it alone is the expositor of its sacred truth. Read without comment it is simply a fetich. Accompanied by a hymn and a prayer, the school service comprises pretty much all the church service of the dissenting churches, and naturally they are satisfied, having got pretty much everything. It is claimed that these services are non-sectarian. The Hebrew certainly has a right to object to a hymn praising the name of Christ. He has a right to protest. It is the same with the Agnostic. Suppose the Catholic majority of the state should insist upon having the greater part of their services introduced in the schools, what an outcry there would be! The mere perfunctory reading of a chapter of the Bible can accomplish no good whatever, and there are many things in it which should never be read. Catholics believe that there ought to be religion in the schools, and a great deal of it. There is not enough religion in the reading of the Bible or the singing of hymns to make a child religious, although it often affords an excuse to parents for neglecting to teach religion to their children. The Plenary Council of Baltimore directed that when the priests could not hav parochial schools they should oppose reading of the Bible in the public schools. It is a forcing on a large body of the people a something tha is displeasing to them. However, if it doesn't do much good, it doesn't do much harm. If you must hav religion in the schools, you hav not enough of it, and if you hav too much, why force it on people who do not want it?"

Letters from Friends.

MOUNT FOREST, CAN., April 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which will pay for two years. I hope that subscriptions are coming in good this spring, and that your readers are Liberal in paying for their paper as well as calling themselvs Liberals. WM. LEWIS.

VALLEY FALLS, KAN., April 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Moses Hull, of Des Moines, Iowa, and Mr. Braden, a "Christian" minister, held a discussion here during the past week. Mr. Hull impressed the people here with the fact that he is a courteous, learned gentleman, and I wish to "testify" that in my opinion (and I find that most of those whom I hav conversed with on the subjcct are of the same opinion) he literally mopped the floor with his opponent. F. W. B. SMITH.

627 TWENTY-FIFTH ST., OAKLAND, CAL., April 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I send you by the mail a picture or group of Oakland friends, with Mr. Putnam, taken while he was here in Oakland; also a view of Lake Merrit and its surroundings. The picture is a pleasant reminiscence of a Freethinkers' Sunday picnic, and might adorn the walls of the editorial sanctum, as we are all truth seekers. When I send my next subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will send enough to pay for a frame to the picture, so that all visitors can see our pioneer Putnam having a good time on the Pacific shore. His visit has done us good. The cause is looking brighter, and we intend to go ahead. If any friends desire a copy of this picture of California scenery and our secretary among a group of Liberals, the undersigned can furnish a few copies. A. H. SOHOW.

ROCHESTER, MICH., April 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Hav just finished reading the second instalment of "Tales Told Out of School." It seems rich in truth —graphically told—of what might be said. But when I find it purporting to come from a (merely) Dr. Jones, as a committee of one, appointed by a conference of ministers of no denomination, place, or date given—said Jones with a memory capacious enough to retain, verbatim, a TRUTH SEEKER column and a half of remarks upon the same subject by "the venerable Dr. M. at another privaie conference of ministers," I think I am warranted in denouncing the whole thing an elegantly written canard, and, however cute the take-off, using a method unworthy of a cause that needs no chicanery or make-believe for its successful propagation.

C. H. GREENE.

SPRINGVILLE, UTAH, April 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find stamps to pay for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1887.

As our wants are more than our means, they hav to be curtailed and brought down to proper limits. For this reason I hav to deny myself the luxury of reading a few of the good books for sale in the TRUTH SEEKER office until money is more plentiful with me. But I can enjoy the anticipated pleasure of reading them in the future, while I am reading your paper from week to week. It it a real, every-day pleasure, and the best journal in existence that I know of. It works for our good all the time, so we should sustain it by increasing the number of its subscribers. But it contains too much truth to suit people who cling to erroneous ideas; that is what is in the way in most cases.

LUKE WM. GALLUP.

HAMMONTON, N. J., May 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your notice at hand; you will please find inclosed one dollar to continue the visits of your valuable paper to my address. I cannot dispense with so interesting a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER—the editorials, "Letters from Friends"—yes, all; even the fault-finders.

I see Father Hacker is yet able to hew to the line. I said years since, and when the infallibility scheme was gotten up, that Catholicity was doomed, as it would be the wedge to divide; and now it seems there are important members seceding and pleading for important rights. Well, let the good work go on. I wish I were able to help it on with means. I think Heston must be a genius. I look at those cartoons and smile, thinking how exactly they show up the tomfoolery. May his pencil be wielded till all see the ridiculousness of all the schemes supported by that rusty old book. D. R. WOLLISON.

FORT BAYARD, N. M., April 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You hav kindly trusted me for a half-year's subscription. I will trust you for the other half; inclosed find $3.

While THE TRUTH SEEKER may not reflect the views of the more modern Liberals, its place could hardly be filled among a most deserving class, the "old-timers," those who hav done the "hard hitting," and made it possible for the present good work to be done. How I love to hear them speak out, and defy the enemy who once took delight in their torture! I regard the old heroes for their courage as I do Abraham Lincoln for his integrity. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER, Heston, pictures, monkey, and all.

I find in it philosophy to make me think, humor to make me laugh, cruelty to make me sorry, and encouragement to make me work.

It strikes me that from the manner the old orders are bouncing our sturdy brothers, we should hav a benevolent order within our own ranks. Friend Reynolds has spoken of it, and others hav said Amen, but who will be the founder? Friend Beal, of Portland, Oregon, has a beautiful scheme; it is hardly meeting the acceptance that I should like to see.

It seems not to accord with Liberal views for any one person to be "big chief." They, having ceased to worship gods, cannot learn to deify men. Instead of the divine right of kings, they believe in the free voice of the people; hence they will accept from a society what they might reject from an individual. Why could not the American Secular Union propose and organize a scheme for this purpose? It commands the respect, and it will certainly gain the confidence, necessary for the promotion of such a scheme.

Most truly, D. G. CROW.

BURNETT, NEB., May 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We had W. F. Jamieson here again on the evenings of April 18th, 19th, and 20th. The audience was small, but very appreciativ. We were unable to get any of the Christians out—that is, not enough to speak of. They hav very much to say against Infidelity, but they hav so little faith in their own creeds that they dare not go to hear what they know in their own heart is true, for fear they would come away with less faith—as they surely would.

I would hav liked to hav every Christian in the land hear the six lectures delivered here, but they are too selfish; they know so much in their own conceit that they don't care to learn anything more. That makes the biggest fool on earth. The lectures were just immense. No one ought to begrudge fifty cents to hear Mr. Jamieson. He is able to handle any subject he undertakes to. I only wish I was able to employ such speakers as often as once a month as long as I liv. I hav been in nearly all the Western states and territories, and hav had a good deal of experience in human nature. I hav seen nearly all nationalities, and, take them as a class, the most devout Christian communities are the most detestable to liv in. The moment a man embraces religion, he forsakes his own freedom, and wants to deprive everyone else of theirs. D. W. WHITNEY.

BURLINGTON, KAN., May 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Last fall a soul saver came into Burlington, and the missionary colored Baptists employed him to proclaim the news of glad tidings for them. They had a church edifice which they had constructed, worth about two thousand dollars, and they endured many privations to erect their temple of worship. But there resided a sister within sight of his residence, with whom he formed an acquaintance, and she hung a white cloth in her window to notify him that all was right for the shepherd to make his pastoral call. It so happened on a time when he was to dispense the gospel to his flock (one evening), that he tarried too long, and in his haste became bewildered, and missed his way, and was recognized at a farm-house. But at a late hour he arrived at his appointment, and in tendering his excuses for his being tardy he created suspicion, and they cited him to appear before their quorum of deacons, and his defense was so unsatisfactory in regard to his keeping late hours in his pastoral calls with his Delilah, and disappointing his congregation, that they discharged him. A number of his members adhered to him, and the first favorable opportunity, his opponents say, they fired the church edifice, and burnt it up. From this circumstance we learn that revenge is sweet for the man of God and his followers, although they are covered with a colored skin. CHRIS BROWN.

FT. WORTH, TEX., April 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav only a short time been aware of the existence of your excellent journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER, but hav resolved not to miss a single copy of it in the future. I buy it at a news-stand here. My efforts to secure some new subscribers hav so far been without success, although here is a goodly number of people liberally inclined. I hav made strenuous efforts to awaken an interest in Freethought among my countrymen (the Swedes) here, but with little success. The superstitions of their childhood are still too deeply rooted to allow them to entertain even a shadow of doubt as to the supernatural origin of their alleged revelations. This community is very religious, and infested with a swarm of professional advocates of the different creeds, whose "one business" it is to uphold and advance the cause of superstition and soul-murdering theories that hav for so many centuries been a curse to mankind, and the sole obstacle in the way of progress and development of the race. A close student of history is forced to arrive at the conclusion that the onward march of civilization does not advance in a straight line, but revolves in a circle. Nothing short of a complete annihilation of superstition in all its hideous shapes will suffice to attain a higher standard of civilization. The barriers built by the liberty-destroying institution, the church, for the purpose of chaining the intellect and prevent investigation must be completely demolished, and the supremacy of reason over "divine revelation" universally acknowledged.

Surely there was never a cause more deserving, more worthy and noble, than the one in which you are engaged, and for which you are doing such noble work. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER! Long liv the editor of this mighty organ in the campaign against the degrading superstitions of the man of Nazareth. Many falsehoods about Ingersoll and other prominent Liberals are circulated by the press of this priest-ridden part of the country, but the people are beginning to see a little beyond the surface, and the pious liars are awarded the well-deserved contempt of all truth-loving people. The wholesale fabrication of lies for the glory of God is becoming a dangerous occupation, and the investigating spirit of the general public has caused many a pious "man of God" to come to grief. The latest recorded stories of "visitation of God upon blaspheming Infidels" show signs of being the work of amateurs, displaying a great lack of judgment on the part of the inventors in locating the scene where investigation could be easily effected.

The report that Colonel Ingersoll has decided to lay down his armor and cease his attacks on Christianity has caused jubilant demonstration among the orthodox faction and considerable depression among the Liberal element. I still entertain hopes to once again hear the voice of the great apostle of truth, the ablest living exponent of Liberalism in the world—the immortal Ingersoll! Long liv this noble champion of our cause! With sincere wishes for the success of Freethought and a speedy downfall of superstition, I remain,

Yours respectfully, GUSTAVE A. SWENSON.

FOND DU LAC, WIS., May 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 to continue the paper as long as that lasts. I wish you would discuss the questions of the Interstate Commerce law, passed last session of Congress, and indicate to the shippers who are complaining of increased freight charges that they are charging the cause to the said law, when if they will open their eyes and read the law with one-one-hundredth part the care they do their catechism, they will find that before the law, the railroad companies made their charges without law, except in a few instances, and this only lasted till the companies could buy the legislature, and then they were without rule except their own; and if the growlers now against high and increased freights will stop swearing about the law, and read it, they will find that the railroad companies now fix the rates the same as before, only higher, and the purpose they hav to serve in charging higher rates now is to make the law odious, and create a spasm among shippers, and get Congress to repeal it, and then you would see the scalpers come down on their freights, and donate their passes to all the parasites in the land, and will then hav a rest and will continue again to rob the people until we shall elect members to Congress who will know enough to pass a law fixing the rates of passengers and freight, and make them liv up to it, and send the commission's idea to hell, and let them sell out to its governor. Then will come a revolution that will do some good.

DE W. C. PRIEST.

ADRIAN, MICH., May 3, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I see by your London correspondent that the Infidel smasher, H. L. Hastings, of Boston, is hammering away at his old trade in the British metropolis. I myself hav had some little acquaintance with this valiant and renowned son of thunder, as Brother W. H. Burr calls him. A few years ago I was out West on a visit, and the family I was stopping with were taking his paper, The Christian. I took some copies home and read them. I found so many misstatements, and so many glaring falsehoods, and so much slander and abuse of Freethinkers, that I made up my mind to call his attention to some of them, and you may be sure that I did not mince matters much with him. I told him in plain words that he was both a slanderer and a falsifier. After an interval of about three months I received an answer from him. I replied, but he took no notice of the second letter. About two years after I was in Chicago, and they were then holding a great Christian convention there, led on by that prince of lunatics, D. L. Moody. H. L. Hastings was there to contribute his part in the performance. I thought it a good opportunity to get acquainted with Hastings, and made it a point to attend one of the meetings held at lower Farwell Hall. I requested the janitor, who knew him, to giv me an introduction. He did so, and when I told him my name he seemed very much surprised for some reason. He did not seem inclined to say much, and finally I told him that Charles Watts, the eminent English Freethinker from London, was going to speak at Hershy's Music Hall in the evening, and that Mr. Watts cordially invited Christian ministers of all creeds and denominations to attend and take part in the discussion. And what do you think this valiant champion of the Bible said in reply? Why, he plainly intimated that he would not disgrace himself enough to even be seen in the company of such vile blasphemers. His answer, of course, was just what I expected it would be. How very couragcous these Christians are! There were present about five hundred ministers at this meeting, and I thought it a good chance to show Mr. Hastings up. I said, so as to be heard by all in the room: "Gentlemen, behold your great champion! He publishes an anti-Infidel library in Boston, and is forever charging Infidels with ignorance and cowardice, and now, when there is an excellent opportunity to meet one of the very ablest of them on a free platform, he basely shows the white feather and ingloriously backs down." And of such is the kingdom of heaven. P. B. REASONER.

LOGAN, KAN., April 27, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In March I engaged Mr. J. E. Remsburg to lecture here on April 21st, I to advertise, engage hall, and hav everything ready, and pay him a certain fee for the lecture. Mr. Remsburg was on time, and lectured to a small but very appreciativ audience, some having come many miles by rail and wagon to hear Mr. Remsburg's lecture on "False Claims," at the close of which he was greeted with a hearty shake of the hand and appropriate remarks from many. The causes why we did not hav a crowded house are these: At 6 P.M. a severe thunder storm set in, which lasted until 10 P.M., and there was a trial in the justice's court that evening of what the people supposed to be murder, and they were wild with excitement over the brutal treatment and cause of death. The court-room was crowded, and people stood in the rain outside the door and windows, trying to catch every now and then a word of the evidence, they felt so outraged by the occurrence, so that proved to be a free side-show that attracted and interested many real Liberal-minded people who would hav heard Mr. Remsburg's lecture under any other circumstances. But we hav still the sentiment of the dungeon, the thumbscrew, and the rack existing among us, as you will see. On the second day after the lecture I was pounced upon in the streets of Logan by the city authority, saying: "That man should hav paid a license that lectured here, but he did not, and as you acted as his agent, we want you to pay it." I asked him how much it would be. He said, "Come to my office and I will tell you." I walked in, sat down, waited seemingly half an hour for him to search and research, but he acknowledged he could find no price, nor even anything to justify him in taking anything, so he adjourned for one week, when I should return and be gibbeted. Going to break me of sucking eggs, you see, and nip free speech in the bud.

Mr. Moody lectured here, Com Kames, and others, and many entertainments, all of which carried away piles of money from the citizens of Logan, and they were not required to pay a license—not even mentioned to them. Mr. Remsburg's lecture brought moneyed men to the hotels, and teams to the livery barns, and otherwise put money in the pockets of the citizens of Logan. I paid for the hall, and paid Mr. Remsburg, according to agreement, and threw the doors open free to all that heard the lecture, and had sent out complimentary tickets enough to hav filled the house, as it would hav been had it not been for the bad weather and the murder trial. Mr. H. N. Boyd, our very Liberal-minded editor, did the advertising for the lecture free, and volunteered to stand one-half the other expense, but I declined the latter offer. He owns and edits the Phillips County Freeman. The head and body of his paper is free and untrammeled. Mr. Remsburg fired the first gun for intellectual freedom in Phillips county, and we want him again when circumstances are in our favor. J. McKINNEY.

ANADARKO KIOWA AND COMANCHE AGENCY, I. T., March 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I picked up a few old numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER lately. I find much in it that interests me. However, the same being two years old, and changes being liable to be made, I will not send more than enough to cover a sample number with this letter.

I am a crank, no doubt. When about eighteen years of age, I caught a missionary spirit. I wanted to be useful and do good, especially to those who hav "a hard row to hoe." When quite small, I sailed out of Boston, and this spirit was active in showing unlettered sailors how to read the names of ships and other matter. When older, I became acquainted with Eastern Indians, and the spirit moved me to help them in all ways in my power. Finally, I resolved to giv the Indian the benefit of the life before me, teaching all things that tended to help him change from a barbarian to a civilized man.

Then came the question of, How shall I be enabled to do this good work? I was delighted with the accounts brought home by missionaries from away across thousands of miles of waters. I saw that many good people contributed much money to make such missionaries comfortable, and I, too, wanted and needed support. But how? Easy enough were I a true orthodox believer, which I was not. Wishing to avail myself of aid, I made an especial study of creeds and the Bible, and could not honestly believe in the doctrin of endless misery. Neither could I be a Universalist. So I settled on the doctrin of future life for the right-doers, and everlasting oblivion to the evil-doers. And all the hope of life depended on a belief in Christ, as none could attain to the future life except Christ claimed him as one of his true followers. I hav rested thus, alternating between an acceptance of the same as the teachings of the Bible and occasional doubts in regard to its truth, the result of which left me to do my work alone; and, thanks to a good trade, I hav been able to help Indians about one-half of my time.

I am now fifty-eight years old, and still helping Indians, showing them how and why they must eventually change, and the sooner the better.

In all these forty-two years, I hav not received $40 that I did not earn with my own hands. I do not work, as others, with my tongue only, but my hands are always full. I do things, and instead of asking the Great Spirit to work for me, I take hold of the work and ask Mr. Indian to follow suit. This has always been my "mission."

I am now engaged in making pictures of the Indians' universal sign language. When completed, we can print books that all unlettered wild tribes can read from paper as well as from their hands—a truly remarkable work, costing me years of study. Should you remain engaged in truth-publishing, I shall be glad to receive sample paper, and if interested, I will send you samples of "Sign Talk."

Next time I will tell you how the great agencies of Christianity hav not helped me—will not even notice my work as a matter of interest, etc. Nevertheless, I am aided in giving this matter to Indians, and when I recall my patrons, I do not believe there is one of them who makes any pretensions to Christianity. I never thought of it until lately. But so far it is a fact—not one is a church-member that I know of. Yet, they giv liberally to aid me put the sign talk into the Indians' hands. And maybe so, all matter in sign talk will be governed by reason and Liberal views. Who knows? I hold the key, but soon it will be available to all. And I invite reason to lead in reading matter for Indians when printed in the Indians' own sign language.

LEWIS F. HADLEY.

KENT, O., May 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I saw an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER last week, taken from the Christian Advocate, purporting to hav been written by one of the members of J. R. Keyes's church (although I think he wrote it himself), showing his bravery and zeal in defending his cause. The Ohio town alluded to was Kent, and this brave minister is an old fossil of the Methodist persuasion that seems to think that he is especially ordained by God to stamp out the Kent Secular Society and the Kent Library Association, together with the fifty TRUTH SEEKERS and a number of the Ironclad Age, Secular Thought, and other papers that come weekly to our place; and to crush out and stifle the spirit of inquiry and investigation that is abroad in our community, having been induced in a great measure by those various agencies. You suggested that perhaps Mr. Keyes preferred to reply to Infidels after they were away. That is the style of man he is, and he would much rather reply to them after they are dead than while living. In a sermon some time ago he enlightened his people by telling them that Thomas Paine did not believe in a God, and that Liberals were trying to demoralize society and open the flood-gates of vice by doing away with the judicial oath in court. Every one that is at all conversant with the writings of Paine knows that in making that statement he showed himself to be either an ignoramus or a wilful and malicious falsifier and slanderer of the dead. It is certainly laughable to hear a Methodist priest talking about Liberals demoralizing society when the statistics of our country showed a few years ago that the seventy thousand priests in the country furnished the calendar of crime with a percentage of 13½, while that of the entire population of the United States was only 3 7-10; and the report of the directors of the Ohio penitentiary for the year 1879, as published in the Cleveland Leader, showed that out of over 1,300 prisoners confined in the institution at that time, there were 133 Catholics, and 178 Methodists, and that there was not a Spiritualist or Infidel in the institution; and a similar state of affairs existed in Kansas. When Mr. Remsburg, Mr. Putnam, Mr. Reynolds, and Mr. Watts spoke here he was on hand with his note-book, and although a free platform was given, and he was invited and urged to come forward and defend his cause, he remained as dumb as an oyster until after his adversary was a thousand miles away. Mr. Watts, when he was here, tried hard both nights to gets Keyes onto his feet, but it was of no use. He said to him that if he did not come forward and defend the cause of Jesus against the Infidel Watts, perhaps when the hour of dissolution came and he needed Jesus he might desert him. When Mrs. Reynolds was here the good Christians sent and got a strolling temperance lecturer to come here and speak at the very hours at which her meetings were appointed. Mrs. Reynolds, despite the united opposition of the churches, gave us two good discourses to good houses. Her lecture in the afternoon was upon the "Past, Present, and Future of Woman," showing the status of her sex under Bible and Christian rule, and showing conclusivly that the Bible and church instead of being woman's best friend has been her worst enemy. This man Keyes has been limping around on a cane with rheumatism a good part of the winter, and I understand that he is importuning Uncle Sam for a renewal of a pension which he thought proper to discontinue. If Mr. Keyes has any faith in Jesus or his promises, why does he not exercise his faith by laying hands upon himself and healing himself, and by asking Jesus to supply his pecuniary wants and not be bothering Uncle Sam? B. F. CONAWAY.

BROOKHAVEN, MISS., May 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: There is a class of people, largely endowed with self-esteem, who readily accept the doctrin of immortality, and advocate it with much pertinacity, for no other reason than that it accords so well with their own self-love. So highly do they rank themselvs in the scale of personal importance that, in their opinion, the universe indeed would exist to little purpose if such as they, the very salt of the earth, were, like ordinary forms, destined to die and cease to be. These are the ones who are pleased to speak of a sweet communion with their savior, accompanied by a peace of soul, an exaltation of joy, an illumination of mind, of which common mortals engrossed with the sordid concerns of this world can hav no conception.

If there is any one thing more than another tending to foster and develop human selfishness to its most repulsiv proportions, it is a zealous belief in the doctrins of the Christian religion. That belief has done more to fill the fanatic's small soul with rancorous intolerance, and to blind his reason to its endless follies and absurdities, than any other of the many religions that hav distracted and disgraced the world. With what complacency do the self-righteous ones contemplate their own imaginary merits, their privileged intimacy with celestial society, and, above all, their immeasurable superiority over that pitiable object, the worldly man, the merely natural man, whose eyes hav never been opened to the glorious light of spiritual truth!

To the selfish person, whose mind is crazed with religious zeal, it is a delicious privilege to approach his God in familiar prayer, and feel himself to be a special object of divine attention, and even interest, while enumerating his petty trials, and asking for blessings upon his head. To ingratiate himself and secure answers to his prayers, he labors to propitiate his deity with abject tones and fulsome praise. What a stupid, what a monstrous conceit on the part of such a supplicant to fancy the supreme power of the universe, when thus addressed by him, instantly withdrawing his attention from everything else in order to humor him and listen to his drivel and nauseous flattery!

When the earth quakes and heaves, and massiv buildings fall, crushing and killing thousands in the ruins, the terrified religionist, dropping on his knees, lifts his voice in entreaty for protection to his tender heavenly father, the very same compassionate father who at that instant is at work maiming, mangling, and destroying the old and the young, the good and the bad, the saint and the sinner, with indiscriminate cruelty. What insane fear must possess the soul of one who under circumstances so horrible can appeal to such a monster for special protection! In the tones of a sniveling sycophant, with every limb shaking in an agony of fear, he cries out: "O God, in this dreadful disaster I recognize a visitation of thy holy wrath, an infliction of thy righteous judgment; but my blessed God, my sweet savior, my dear redeemer, whom my whole soul loves and adores, do hav mercy on me, shield me, save me, whomsoever else thou mayest doom to die."

As a means of stultifying the understanding, and bringing it under easy subjection to the controling influence of priestly guile, no exercise, no disciplin equal in efficiency to habitual prayer, could hav been devised and enjoined upon the dupes of an insidious imposture. Many a one there is, by nature gentle, good, and honest, whose life is overcast and chilled by the dismal cloud of popular superstition. From childhood the unhappy dupe has been taught that he has about him a mysterious something, an immortal soul, which, without due circumspection, without much deep meditation without an humble, contrite heart, without steadfast faith, piety, and habitual prostrations before the throne of grace, will, when he comes to die, hav an unpleasant experience, a veritable hell to encounter. The imaginary glare and roar of its lurid fires confuse and daze his poor brain, so that he goes through life groaning under a crushing load of anxiety, and grieving that he was ever born. S. F. SMURR.

MT. HEALTHY, O., May 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am seeking for a Liberal Freethought paper—one that is not afraid to discuss all subjects that interest mankind, or ought to interest them, whether popular or unpopular, holy or unholy. I do not ask the editor to indorse popular or unpopular doctrins, but I do ask the privilege, if I am a patron of his paper, to discuss any question of morals or any system I think will improve the race. A Freethought paper cannot lay much claim to liberality that will not discuss, or let be discussed, any subject that does not coincide with the publisher's views. I hold that patrons hav a right to be heard. Truth, and truth only, is divine, and the only way to arrive at truth is by free, untrammeled discussion. Show me a town, a village, or even a city, where discussions are not free, or the press is muzzled or subsidized, I will show you a people who are very low in intelligence.

For sixty years I hav patronized the so-called Freethought papers, beginning with the New Harmony Gazette, of 1828, in the interest of Robert Owen's community. Then the Free Enquirer, by Frances Wright and Robert Dale Owen, 1829; St. Louis Examiner, by Mr. Rob; Boston Investigator, by good old Abner Kneeland; O. S. Murray's Regenerator; Vale's Beacon, and some others. All of these papers were Freethought papers, and deserved the name. The Owenses and Miss Wright spent a great deal of money to elevate the producers of all wealth.

The last pretended Freethought paper I hav patronized is the sectarian, Calvinistic, Atheistical Ironclad Age, of Indianapolis, Ind. The editor is an M.D., a purger, and a blood-letter. He says that the letting of blood is a great moral purger for all social evils. Herbert Spencer's theory for social evils must fall to the ground when compared with this M.D.'s remedy. He adopts the Christian halter and the gallows as another moral reformer. I think he will adopt their hell next, instead of Atheism, to moralize humanity. He says any sympathizer with those Anarchists ought to be hung on his Calvinistic gallows with those Anarchists of Chicago. Any Christian will tell him that Atheism leads to Anarchy, and that his seven half-brother Anarchists are all Atheists. The doctor must look sharp, or he will get his head into the halter. If Atheism leads to Anarchy, as the Christians say, I think Dr. Monroe ought to be hung with those seven Anarchists of Chicago, for he has taught Atheism thirty years. Goodness knows how many Anarchists and Socialists his teachings hav made. The doctor ought to know when he demolishes the Christian God the people begin to think that they hav rights as well as his friend, Jay Gould; that they are entitled to a fair share of the wealth they hav created; that a certain portion of the earth belongs to them. Judge Gray, in sentencing those seven Anarchists to death, admitted that they did not commit murder, but it was the doctrins they taught that incited to murder. Now, as Judge Gray is a good Christian, and sincerely believes that Atheism leads to Anarchy, Socialism, and all kinds of crimes, I don't see how Dr. Monroe, if he should be arrested, could save his neck from the gallows if tried before Judge Gray. I believe Dr. Monroe is an honest man, and would not hav advocated Atheism if he had known that it led to Anarchy, Socialism, and Freelove. Neither would God hav created man if he had known what a boodler and land-grabber he would turn out to be, for God says even the heavens belong to the Lord, but the earth belongs to the children of men. Dr. Monroe says the land belongs to the land-grabbers. He turned up his nose at Colonel Ingersoll for hinting that the earth belongs to the people who liv upon it. He sneered at the Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER because they let some of their correspondents show up the unfairness of the Anarchist trials. He says THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator are losing subscribers in consequence. It must hurt his feelings terribly. The Ironclad says they would rather join the Christian ranks than defend the Anarchists. They are not far out of the Christian ranks now. Their methods of punishment are the same. John Calvin, who all say was an honest man, could burn Servetus with white-oak saplings for a difference of opinion on the subject of religion. Dr. Monroe could hang his seven half-brothers for a difference on social government and the best means of improving the condition of the creators of all wealth.

Christians say Anarchists, Atheists, and Socialists are all Freelovers. Dr. Monroe despises Freelovers, but has great respect for free haters. Christians will not discuss Atheism, only by calling hard names. Monroe will not discuss Anarchism, only by vilification.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will hav to thank Dr. Monroe for my knowledge of it and a new subscriber, for I did not know of its existence. I thought when Mr. Bennett died that was the end of that paper. I never was a subscriber to the paper. I hav no knowledge of the price of it. I inclose $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I am in my 80th year, a pioneer in the great state of Ohio, born in Litchfield county, Conn., of Puritan stock.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Knee Deep.

They are calling "knee deep! knee deep!" at night in the marsh below,
Down by the bank where the rank sword-grass and calamus grow;
Like an army of silversmiths, forging bells for the northern sprites,
And, keeping time to a rhyme, they work through the summer nights,
Steadily up from their swampy forge the sparks of the fire-flies rise
In the pool where the wading lilies make love through half-shut eyes
To the whip-poor-will who scolds, like a shrew, at the fluffy owl;
While the nighthawk shuffles by like a monk in a velvet cowl,
And the bat weaves inky weft through the white starbeams that peep
Down through the cypress boughs, where the frogs all sing "knee deep."

I hav known a song to lead a failing, elderly man like me
Back through the gates of the years to the scenes that used to be,
When the world was fenced from heaven by one rose-hedge, and through
This bourne the blessed angels looked and the asphodel odors blew.
So these syllables of the song, from the singers among the reeds,
Hav made me to walk again, knee deep, in the clover meads,
And I see the storm king riding the summer clouds in state,
With his chariot whip of livid flame and his thunder billingsgate;
And I watch the strong tawny tide through the flags like a lion creep,
Where the frighted inhabitants cling to the rushes and sing "knee deep."

Knee deep I bend in the rippled creek with buttercup blooms o'er blown,
Like the gold on beauty's billowy breast, its color half-hid, half-shown;
Knee deep in the saffron marigold flowers that prank the meadows fair,
Like a procession of Saxon children, blue-eyed and with yellow hair;
Knee deep in the whortleberries, sun-browned, in the sun I stand,
With my torn straw hat half filled and a quail's nest in my hand;
Knee deep in the topaz chestnut leaves, I rustle toward the place
Where the pert and upright rabbit sits, washing her innocent face.
Song of the quivering culms and osiers! I am wading again, in truth,
Knee deep in the stream of Memory that flows from the land of Youth.

—Robert McIntyre.

Ponto.

Our Ponto was only a common dog, and yet he had such an uncommon adventure in his doggish career that it made his name something more than mere memory, in our family at least. An old heirloom in the house was a pale red earthen jar, shaped after the manner of oriental water-jugs, small at the bottom and top, with bulging sides a few inches below the mouth. This vessel was used for oil for harness, wagons, and other farm implements, it being in the "good old times," before the advent of prepared axle-grease. Once when the men had been using it, the jar was left on the ground and was not missed till Uncle William came and asked if we knew where our dog was. No, we didn't. We only knew that he had been off for four days and it was the first misdemeanor of his life. When Uncle William told us he had seen something going through such eccentric maneuvers down below his shop that he ran to see what it could be, and found Ponto with a jar on his head, but still crawling backward, trying in a feeble though unsuccessful way to extricate himself.

It was but the work of a moment to go to the shop for a hammer, one blow from which made him a free dog once more, but not the happy dog he had once been. Imagin, if you can, having your own head and face in such close quarters, even for one hour, and you will hav a faint idea of his suffering for four dreadful days. Uncle William (who was the jolly smith in the poem of Ballynaghfad published in THE TRUTH SEEKER about two years ago) was quite a philosopher in his way, and had learned to know men and the world generally from the reading of Burns's poems all his life.

On this occasion he recited some lines from the "Tale of the Twa Dogs" to demonstrate how much more unfortunate some dogs are than others, and went on to explain that Ponto had begun by lapping the oil, and, going down deeper and deeper as the oil disappeared, he had got beyond the narrow opening and was thus unable to free himself, as a boy or girl would hav done had they been fastened in the honey-jar. In his extremity, the crawfish movement was the only remedy that came to his doggish mind—if he had a mind—and in this fashion he had floundered through the pond where the blue lilies grew in the summer, and the musk-rats built their cunning little brown houses in the autumn. He had undoubtedly quenched his thirst, though he did so under protest, and his stolen sweets had furnished him a meal that was anything but a "square" one to him. Notwithstanding, he came out of his queer prison-house resembling a living skeleton. His anguish, which must hav been mental as well as physical, had reduced him to such a state of heart-broken imbecility that it was but an act of kindness to make an end of what was only a miserable existence. To all approaches he turned sadly away, and would bound off with an ambling, sidelong motion and lie for hours in the deep grass more like a wild dog than our Ponto. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—REBUS.

Scriptural.

2.—NIHILITY.

How does space annihilate God here?

"God is now here?" the preacher shouted.
An Atheist shook his head and doubted;
But when I whispered "What's your creed then?"
He wrote the very same, indeed, then.
No letter was transposed or wanting,
Yet it denied the preacher's vaunting.
And even thus while Atheist doubted,
The preacher in his pulpit shouted,
And loudly made the bold assertion,
"That space affecteth not God's person."
The "printer's devil" even, knows better;
It nihilates nor drops a letter.

Correspondence.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 24, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My cousin has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I am a girl eight years old. I am in the eighth grade. I like the paper very much. I hope to see my writing in print.

MAY GOLDMAN.

DESDIMONIA, TEXAS, May 6, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first attempt at writing a letter to you. I am fourteen years old, hav two sisters, Minnie and Ida, both older than myself. My father is the only one who takes THE TRUTH SEEKER here, but he is constantly giving copies of them to others; we all read it. I like the pictures very much, and love to read the Children's Corner. Father keeps THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 29th tacked up so all who come may see Thomas Paine's picture. We hav Colonel Ingersoll's and Mr. Bennett's pictures in large frames. I am just back from my grandma's, some twelve miles from here. I hav four uncles, all Freethinkers; hav one little cousin named Robert G., and one named Bennett. My uncle let me go with him to Dublin, his nearest railroad town. I went into a large store there and the merchant, thinking, perhaps, that I looked green, said, "Good-morning, Henry Ward Beecher." I raised my hat and replied, "You are mistaken, sir, I am Col. Robert G. Ingersoll." The crowd laughed at the merchant, and my uncle said I answered him just as I should hav done. Long life to you and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

GUS C. MARTIN.

May 8, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I saw so many girls and boys writing to the Corner, I thought I would write a letter too. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for eight years. We milk thirteen cows and feed thirteen calves. I help my father feed the calves. I am a little girl 9 years of age. If you can make this out I would like to see it in print. Your little Freethinker friend,

SARAH BELLE STICE.

PATCH GROVE, April 24, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My uncle has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it was first published; we could not do without it. I think the pictures are very nice.

I received "Little Lessons for Little Folks," and I am very much pleased with it. I liv on a farm; we hav nine calves, and I milk two, and sometimes three, cows.

I hav a dog—his name is Huckleberry Finn. A little boy, came to visit me and he would call him Waterberry. I also hav a cat I call Dolphin.

If you think this fit to publish, I would like to see it in print. Yours respectfully,

GLENNIE BAILEY.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

MY LODGER'S LEGACY; OR, THE HISTORY OF A RECLUSE. Written by himself. Compiled and arranged by Robert W. Hume, and published by Funk & Wagnalls.

The subject of this work and its imputed author, Roland Hardeman by name, is an Agnostic, and though by birth an aristocrat is by inclination a British Radical or Liberal. The sketch of his life therefore givs several openings for the exposition of difficult problems on the incoming changes, religious, social, industrial, and educational. Both in design and style the work is far superior to most of the trashy light literature of the day, inasmuch as it treats of important matters well worthy of the attention of the public.

Social reform is attended to by a Scotch doctor who, it must be admitted, givs Roland Hardeman very sound advice on his marriage, which eventuates unhappily.

In the course of the tale the educational and industrial questions are not forgotten. A word with respect to the dramatic interests of the story, which are exhibited in the sad results that sometimes follow marital infidelity, and in a subsequent attempt at and trial for murder. The details of all the abovementioned incidents are very interesting, and are vividly and very naturally described. Copies of "My Lodger's Legacy" can be obtained at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Bound, $1; in paper, 25 cents.

SOLAR BIOLOGY: A Scientific Method of Delineating Character, Diagnosing Disease, Determining Mental, Physical, and Business Qualifications, Conjugal Adaptability, etc., from Date of Birth. By Henry E. Butler. Boston: Esoteric Publishing Co. Octavo, 350 pp., price $5.

This book is worth five dollars as a curiosity if not for any other purpose. "Solar biology" might readily be translated into everyday English to mean the influence of the sun and its system upon human beings as determining their character and destiny. The author believes that whereas the sun and the moon and the planets affect the motion of the earth and things on its surface, as the tides, etc., therefore they equally affect the lives of men and women. This is not a new thing; it is astrology. The book says that the date of birth fixes the character, certain stars or planets with a malign or beneficent influence being in the ascendant at that time.

The positions of the other heavenly bodies on the day of a person's birth, of course, will determin what his luck will be, and otherwise modify things. About a hundred pages of the book are devoted to showing where the stars stood and will stand on all the days from 1820 to 1899, and for twenty-five cents the publishers will send to any address tables covering the years 1900 and thereafter. The book shows a great amount of astronomical knowledge on the part of the author, and the mechanical work is elegant and expensiv.

THE CRISIS. By Geo. W. Bell. Des Moines, Iowa: Moses Hull & Co, publishers. 12mo, pp. 351, price $1.

This book comes accompanied by a cover upon which are printed numerous press notices. One of these notices says that the book "reads like a romance." Another calls it "a most brilliant and scathing review of the political situation." A third, more enthusiastic still, and slightly ungrammatical, says, "We began at the beginning, and there was no good place to stop, no abatement of the interest that held us spell-bound, and read right on, on to the end; then for the first time we were awake to surrounding objects, and was mad because the captain had not gone right on and made his book longer. It reads with all the thrilling interest of a fairy tale!" To which we would respectfully say, "Chestnuts." The "New Crisis" is a book worth reading, though it is to be feared that the author has failed in his purpose to "prove the existence of a class conspiracy the design of which is to subvert the principles of our government by a monopoly of all wealth." We doubt the existence of any such "conspiracy." In the scramble for wealth and power there is too much of every man for himself to make a conspiracy probable. Otherwise the author has set forth the condition of things about as it is, and proposes the reforms which he deems necessary. Like all who go to the bottom of the difficulty, he believes in free trade, and would giv American genius and skill a chance to "explore the world, and feed and clothe humanity with our abundant products." The land, he holds, should be restored to the people; transportation lines must be controled, if not owned, by the government; a great majority of officers now appointed should be electiv; the Senate must be elected by the people, and all class laws should be repealed. He denounces the doctrins of Malthus as a canting philosophy, and lays about him lustily and eloquently in various other directions. As remarked, the book is worth reading.

THE GENESIS OF SCIENCE. By Herbert Spencer. Humboldt Library No. 89. Price 15 cents. Sold at this office.

Mr. Spencer begins this work by pointing out that there is not so much difference between scientific knowledge and ordinary knowledge as is generally supposed. The simplest kind of knowledge is scientific—for instance, that an unsupported body will fall or that smoke will ascend. At the same time, this is mere unreasoned knowledge and appeals only to the perceptions. It is the province of the next step in science to extend the perceptions by means of reasoning. This brings us to that stage of knowledge where we are enabled to affirm with certainty that it will take more force to lift a piece of lead than a piece of wood of the same size. That is undeveloped science, or qualitativ prevision. A third step enables us to tell how much more force will be required, which is developed science, or quantitativ prevision. Moreover, a further distinction is that as we pass from qualitativ to quantitativ prevision, we pass from inductiv science to deductiv science. "And this," says Mr. Spencer, "is the unexpressed difference which leads us to consider certain orders of knowledge as especially scientific when contrasted with knowledge in general. Are the phenomena measurable? is the test which we unconsciously employ. Space is measurable: hence geometry. Force and space are measurable: hence statics. Time, force, and space are measurable: hence dynamics."

Mr. Spencer finds reasons for doubting the truth of all philosophies of the sciences which tacitly proceed upon the common notion that scientific knowledge and ordinary knowledge are separate, instead of commencing, as they should, by affiliating the one upon the other and showing how it gradually came to be distinguishable from the other. As illustrating the false method of classifying the sciences, Mr. Spencer takes up the arrangement propounded by Oken, who appears to hold ideas in common with Hegel. To comment on Mr. Oken's propositions, he says, would be as absurd as the propositions themselvs. Hegel is next dissected, and then we reach the Comtean scheme of the sciences, distinguished from the Hegelian by the fact that it is worthy of respectful consideration. In truth, however, M. Comte fares little better finally than Oken and Hegel.

Having thus to some extent cleared the ground, Mr. Spencer goes on to develop his own theory of the genesis of science, which, he says, is to be found in the simpler forms of knowledge, the sole origin of which is experience. It should be the first duty of Positivists to read this analysis of Comte's classification, and then rearrange the order of historic development. Mr. Spencer has left it somewhat askew.

HOW TO STRENGTHEN THE MEMORY; OR, Natural and Scientific Methods of Never Forgetting. By M. L. Holbrook, M.D. Sold at this office. Price $1.00.

If experience did not demonstrate otherwise, it would be generally believed that people with good memories are born, not made. Dr. Holbrook, in this work, givs instances where memory has been strengthened and built up by practice with that object in view. He also tells how the result sought for may be achieved. The first thing necessary, when a thing would be remembered, is of course attention—the fixing of the subject firmly in the mind. Then an occasional repetition will serve to revive the memory. But what Dr. Holbrook appears to place greatest reliance on is suggestion and association, especially the latter. Remember things in connection with other things, and then when one of them is recalled, all the rest come trooping around as though fastened together. One story told in a company suggests another perhaps totally different. An instance of memory by association is given: "The date of the great fire in London is 1666, easily remembered from the repetition of the figure 6. This date enables one to name the time of the Great Plague, which was the year previous; it also serves to indicate the beginning of fire insurance, which sprang like a phenix from the ashes of the city." "The year of the fire in London was that in which tea was introduced from China into England." A good way to keep a name in mind is to write it down and remember how it looks; thus two senses reinforce each other. Many persons hav learned to spell chiefly by recurring to the appearance of words as they stand upon the printed page of the spelling-book. Proceeding mainly in this line, the author tells how to strengthen memory of faces, of places, of music, of facts and events, of figures and dates, and even applies the same principle to the learning of new languages. The book is written in an admirably plain and straightforward style. Here is his definition of memory:

> Memory may be defined as that intellectual power which enables a person to recall, with more or less distinctness and accuracy, past experiences, facts which hav been before the mind, forms, faces, figures, words, phrases, emotions, sounds, and colors, which hav previously exercised the brain. Or it may be defined as a kind of resurrection or reproduction of the past, or a perception of anything with reference to its past existence, or a vision of time past.

We hav given the foregoing in order to contrast it with the definition of memory given by Professor Loisette, who calls it

> The primordial property of the protoplasma differentiated as nerve ganglia, similarly as contractility is the primordial property of the protoplasma differentiated as muscular fiber.

The difference between the two writers is that one tells what memory is and the other does not. Dr. Holbrook's book appeals to the reason and to common sense at once, and can be heartily recommended as both instructiv and interesting.

In a 55-page octavo pamphlet, E. F. Ring, of Milwaukee, Wis., givs "Forty Reasons Why I Am Not a Christian," and they are all good ones. Price 25 cents.

There are fifty 12mo pages in Mr. L. Record's treatis on "The New Theology," and he charges $1 for it. His address is 67 Springfield street, Dayton, Ohio.

J. Fitzgerald, publisher of the Humboldt Library, presents "Science and Crime and Other Essays," by Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., as No. 88 of that series. It deals with the aid which science has given to justice in courts of law, and other subjects. Price 15 cents.

Dr. W. H. Benson, 1225 Filbert street, Philadelphia, will send to any address in the United States or Canada, on receipt of six cents, his little pamphlet entitled, "Easy Lessons in Socialism." He counsels his brothermen to abandon the doctrins of orthodox theology, and return to the simple religion of Jesus the Socialist.

E. B. Waldo, 20 Shonard street, Syracuse, N. Y., believes in temperance in all things, and under the title of "Self-Control" has published a pamphlet of 39 16mo pages on that subject, which he sells for 25 cents. An admirable feature of Mr. Waldo's work is that, so far as we can discover, he does not ask for any statutory enactments to stultify the self-control which he advocates.

This being the jubilee year of her majesty, Queen Victoria, the "Jubilee Prize Poem," which we hav received from a loyal subject, is quite appropriate. It is published by the British Association for the Diffusion of Common Sense, with notes by a workingman. It is immense. We would not part with our copy for anything except another just like it. Price 5 cents.

The limitation of wealth is what John H. Keyser calls "The Next Step in Progress" in his new pamphlet bearing the title quoted. A limitation of wealth, he holds, with graduated taxation upon accumulating and accumulated fortunes, is the only hope of the republic. Among the great number of political propositions the adoption of which is the "only hope," Mr. Keyser's looks as promising as any we hav heard.

"A Proletary" takes for his text an article from THE TRUTH SEEKER on "The Natural Sciences in Our Common Schools," by H. M. Cottinger, and writes a pamphlet of "Hints about the Teaching of Natural History," which is published by M. Harman, Valley Falls, Kan. There is a wild Western recklessness about the typography of the work, but the author has uttered some ringing truths. Send ten cents to M. Harman for it.

"Saladin," the knight-errant of Freethought chivalry in Europe, is performing deeds as illustrious in their way, and as disastrous to the Christian hosts, as were those of his great namesake. His latest tilt he rides as the champion of woman against her enemies, the priests and the Bible. Under the title, "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God," he has published as a pamphlet 64 pages of his articles from the Secular Review on "Christianity and Woman." In England Part I. sells for sevenpence, or about 15 cents. In this country, owing to the way our minds are protected at the expense of our pockets, the price is placed at 30 cents. Order the book of W. Stewart & Co., 41 Farringdon street, E. C., London, England.

Mrs. Annie Besant and G. W. Foote, editor of the London Freethinker, recently held a four-nights' public debate on the question, "Is Socialism Sound?" Mrs. Besant affirming, and Mr. Foote denying. The debate is published in a pamphlet of 153 pages, price, in America, 50 cents. Knowing the able character of the disputants, the reader may be assured that the best that can be said for or against Socialism is to be found in this pamphlet.

Some time ago THE TRUTH SEEKER printed Mr. J. E. Remsburg's lecture on "The Fathers of Our Republic," and has since published many commendatory notices of it. The space could not hav been devoted to a better purpose. Mr. Mendum, of Boston, has issued the lecture in pamphlet form, at 15 cents per copy. It makes 45 good-sized 12mo pages, and is printed in an attractiv style, with a picture of Paine Hall on the cover. Author and publisher are entitled to the thanks of the Liberal public.

"What is Thought?" asks Miss S. C. Clark (Cambridgeport, Mass., 12mo., 15 pp., price 15 cents), and she answers:

> The breath of the soul, the vital respiration that sustains the spirit's embodied existence. Thought is the cradle in which the man-child is rocked; it is the finger of the Father to which his children tightly cling when striving, with frequent failure, to walk alone. It is the guiding voice heard above the tempest of life, the spray from that Eternal Fountain which floweth over and dashes in musical, rippling fall on every fevered breast.

An evidently earnest, if not clearly successful, attempt to answer a vexed question.

"Isaure and Other Poems" is a collection of verse by W. Stewart Ross, editor of the London Secular Review. Mr. Ross is a man of versatil talent, and his verses show that he has the literary faculty highly cultivated. There is something wild and weird about them, however, and they are not of the sort that the poet wished to hav read to him on that evening when he longed for rest. They are distinguished by strength rather than melody. For instance:

> Her white feet are swathed in the linen and shavings,
> My head pressed her bosom, the worm is now there,
> And the blast o'er her tomb mingles wild with my ravings,
> And the gravel is mixed with the gold of her hair.
> . . . . . .
> And the ribs of the clouds widen wide with a moan,
> And through them the winter winds yell;
> And the thunder's red heels, as from heaven he reels,
> Ring bass to the chorus of Hell.

"Tri-Square; or, the Church of Practical Religion," is the title of a book by an anonymous writer who shows evidence of a disciplined mind and a large experience.

It purports to be a record of the experiences attending the attempt to establish a church upon a broad and comprehensiv basis—somewhat after the plan suggested by the Rev. Washington Gladden, and were it not for THE TRUTH SEEKER imprint upon the title-page, and the prejudice resulting therefrom, the book might pass among orthodox readers for the work of some enthusiast only a little more advanced than he in the new theology.

The author, although extremely liberal, does not entirely discard creeds or the necessity for them. He even formulates a creed for his church, but makes it broad enough for all people who would do good to stand upon. It is not based upon belief or unbelief. It is this:

"Every act or word that will result in injury to anybody is wrong and is prohibited."

The object of the "church is to teach mankind all things essential for their proper guidance and happiness in this life, which is deemed to be the true service of God."

No person who does not in good faith believe in this rule, and practice in accordance therewith, shall be accepted as a member of this church; all members who wilfully violate this rule, or the law of the land, shall be expelled.

He does not reject the Bible, but regards it purely as the work of men; neither does he believe in the divinity of Christ, but as a reformer. The trinity he acknowledges is matter, force, and law. The living strictly within the letter and spirit of the law, is the surest way to prepare for a future life.

The author's idea is to unite all moral, well-disposed persons in the work of improvement and reform. It matters not if a man believes in a God or not, so his life proves correct by the "Tri-Square"—he can become a member of his church; if he is a bad or immoral man he cannot be fellowshiped without first reforming. He favors the investigation of all matters pertaining to this life, particularly Bible history and writings, believing it is not God, but the devil that is afraid of inquiry. Rewards and punishments are justly awarded, but whether in this life or the life to come, or in both, he does not pretend to know—but "somehow, somewhere they must surely come." It may be no being is yet sufficiently advanced to inherit eternal life.

We advise all who feel interested in this subject to read the book. It is not dry nor prosy. The interest increases as the reader advances, and it does not prove convincing it will furnish food for vigorous, activ thought.

"The Clergy on Divorce" is Judge R. B. Westbrook's latest "booklet." The judge denies that marriage is a sacrament, or that it is a Christian institution; that the only just cause for divorce is adultery, or that the federal government has any right to interfere in the matter—all of which is claimed by the clergy. Incompatible law-enforced relations, he holds, are productiv of discontent, temptation, disease, and vicious tendencies in offspring, idiocy, insanity, and numberless other evils. The system of "limited divorce," which leaves both parties in the anomalous position of being neither married nor single, bond nor free, is most unwarranted, and is characterized as a disgrace to the statute book of any enlightened state. On this subject the judge uses vigorous language. As a reform in marriage laws, he recommends something like those in certain European states which provide for divorce by mutual consent of parties, but prohibit haste and rashness, and allow the referee to withhold his decision for one year, the parties meanwhile living separate. Reconciliation not taking place, the divorce is granted. The fickle and unprincipled might sometimes take advantage of existing laws, and seek separation for trifling cause, but the many should not suffer for the want of a reasonable and legal way of escape from bondage because the few abuse it. The judge has treated the matter further in his larger book on "Marriage and Divorce."

Colby & Rich hav published a bulky volume of 433 pages, entitled, "Unanswerable Logic: a Series of Spiritual Discourses given through the Mediumship of Thomas Gales Forster." The introduction is by Carrie Grimes Forster, who says that the author "now bathes in the brightness and effulgence of the upper sanctuary of the Father, the glory-land of righteous compensation." The book is designed to define Spiritualism and set forth its truths. The author says:

Spiritualism rolls its warm, sparkling waves of thought across the cold gray sea of material skepticism, just as the Gulf Stream weaves its mystic length across the latitudes and the oceans, exercising an influence, imperceptible to many, perhaps, but none the less powerful and extensiv because as yet unappreciated in its full bearing. For, amid the more exalted enterprises of human genius characteristic of the present age—amid the holier utterances of the press, the pulpit, and the rostrum—amid the loftier conceptions of the poet, the artist, and the man of letters—the mental eye of the spiritual philosopher can perceive the inculcations and direct influences of this school of thought beginning to manifest themselvs with a persistent truthfulness not to be mistaken, and with a conclusivness well-nigh irresistible. And this condition of things, we are encouraged to believe, will be increasingly apparent as mediumistic facilities are afforded for a clearer understanding of its phenomenal presentations, as well as a higher appreciation of the ethical and philosophical deductions which are the legitimate sequences of an intelligent investigation.

From the foregoing the reader can judge of the author's style, as also from the following sentence of 133 words:

In attempting an elucidation of the fact of man's existence as a spirit entity while in the material body—the fact claimed in my text as a fundamental tenet of the spiritual school, but denied by many who are unwilling to accept of the phenomena of Spiritualism as sufficiently satisfactory testimony in favor of the same—permit me, in addition to the phenomenal phases familiar to most of you, to offer further testimony by adverting somewhat in detail to the wonderful agency exerted in the realm of conscious individuality by the nervous system of the human body especially, and the important duties devolving upon it in the animal economy, as an efficient agent of the thinking principle which so evidently animates and controls this wonderful piece of machinery amid the conditions of time.

A few pages further on is a third sentence covering sixteen lines of eleven words per line. Apart from the difficulty of following the leading idea through these long arrays of words, there is nothing in the book objectionble to the Freethinking Deistical Spiritualist, and it certainly contains much that every sensible person must indorse. No doubt Mr. Forster was possessed of a clear and activ brain capable of holding a thought while he draped and decorated and frescoed it with other minor thoughts, but he should hav been more regardful of the infirmities of his readers. A flight of one hundred and fifty steps should hav an occasional landing where the climber may pause for breath. The mechanical part of this book is above criticism, and it contains a fine steel portrait of the author.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

News of the Week.

As yet Archbishop Corrigan has not received the communication from the pope in regard to the McGlynn case. It is reported that his holiness will excommunicate McGlynn if he declines to obey and make the journey to Rome inside of the next forty days.

HIGH license has become a law in Pennsylvania.

JACOB SHARP was called to the bar on Monday.

TALMAGE is announced as the Decoration Day orator in this city.

QUEEN KAPIOLANI, of the Sandwich Islands, spent Sunday in New York.

THE great flood in Maine still continues, and railway traffic is impeded.

THE Saturday half-holiday is not being so extensivly observed as it ought to be.

GENERAL GRANT'S widow is just recovering from a severe attack of malignant diphtheria.

The Anti-poverty Society's third meeting, Sunday night, was largely attended. Henry George addressed it.

THE legislature has passed a law permitting the indulgence of beer and music under the same roof, and it is now legal to whistle between drinks.

EVANGELIST PETER DWYER, of this city, is under arrest for abandoning his wife.

MARTIN F. TUPPER, the author of "Proverbial Philosophy," for several weeks past has been scarcely able to read or write.

AT a cattle fair in Madison Square Garden, this city, 483 head were entered in all, upon which the owners place an aggregate value of about $1,000,000.

THE Rev. J. Edgar Brown, a Methodist preacher at Allentown, N. Y., is being investigated. He is charged with promiscuous hugging and kissing.

PARSON BRISTOR, tried at New City, N. Y., for assault upon his housemaid, was acquitted. The jury did not believe that the girl resisted to the extent of her powers.

CHURCHGOING people in Madison county, Ind., are scandalized by a free fight at a church meeting in Union township last Sunday, in which several persons were injured.

THE lockout of New York silversmiths has lasted three weeks, and the employers remain firm in the demand that the workmen must abandon their labor organization before they can come back.

GOVERNOR KNOTT, of Kentucky, exercised executiv clemency in the case of a murderer sentenced to be hanged, and the crowd who came to see the hanging were so incensed that they hanged the governor in effigy.

AT the last meeting of the Nineteenth Century Club, the Rev. W. S. Rainsford, of St. George's Episcopal church, said he did not believe the story of Elisha and the bears. Concerning which the Sun observes that this is substantially the position taken by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

WHILE the Rev. D. I. Marks, of the Irving Methodist church, New York, was preaching in his pulpit a week ago, he was suddenly stricken with paralysis. Though improving, his recovery is considered doubtful. The moral in this case is as obvious as in any other of a similar character.

THERE were no saloons or gardens open in New York last Sunday, and it is estimated that from 50,000 to 100,000 persons crossed the Hudson to New Jersey, where saloons, theaters, fairs, and base ball were in full blast. The wary Jerseyman is making hay while the sun shines, but the blue cloud of sabbatarianism is likely to overshadow him at any moment. The laws of New Jersey are the same as those of New York on the Sunday question.

LOT FINDS REFUGE FROM A WICKED WORLD.

Odds and Ends.

INDIANS never kiss each other, and no one who has ever seen an Indian can blame them much.

WHEN a heathen gets abont half full of Massachusetts rum, the Christian religion strikes him as being faultless.

OLD lady (to wicked little boys who are playing marbles on Sunday): "Little boys, what are you playing marbles on Sunday for?" Little boys: "We're playing for keeps."

MRS. DE HOBSON: "What a lovely prayer-book, Mrs. Hendricks. Is it a present from your husband?" Mrs. Hendricks: "No, I won it at the progressiv eucher party at Deacon Smith's last week."

MRS. GRUNDY: "So you've been left a lot more money, I hear, Miss Luckie?" Miss Luckie: "Yes; quite a lot." Mrs. Grundy (with a sign of resignation): "Well, it's true what the good book says—'Them as has gits!'"

ON THE BACK STOOP.

Young wife: "I wonder the birds don't come here any more. I used to throw them bits of the cake I made, and—"

Young husband: "That accounts for it."

OUR pastor (to new arrival in town): "Perhaps you would like to join our Mutual Improvement Union? We should dearly like to welcome you." New arrival: "That depends on how big you gag your limit. I'd a been eatin' nuggets in Reno today 'f 't hadn't been fer th' 'Sons of Faith' there."

A TERRITORIAL editor says in his paper: "Yesterday we were again married. It will be remembered that both of our former wives eloped with the foreman of the office. To avoid any future inconvenience of the kind, we hav this time married a lady who is a compositor, and she will set the type while we hustle for the ducks who still owe on snbscription."

YOUNG man (to sexton, at church door): "Isn't the sermon nearly done?" Sexton: "About an hour yet. He is only on his 'Lastly.'" Young man: "Will it take him an hour to get through his 'Lastly?'" Sexton: "No, but there's the 'One word more and I am done,' and the 'Finally,' and the 'In conclusion' to come yet. Don't get impatient, young man. Your girl won't spoil."

A COLORED preacher was talking of prayer, and said: "Now, bredren, when you prays don't pray so much in a gineral way; pray more pertickler. And when I says 'more pertickler,' do you know what I means? Let me tell yer. If I prays de Lord to gib me a turkey, dat ain't nothin'—I ain't a-goin' to git dat turkey! But when I prays de Lord to gib me one o' Massa John's turkeys, I knows I'se gwine to git dat turkey 'fore Sat'd'y night!"

"WE didn't hold services in the church to-day," said a clergyman in a small town in Washabaugh county, Dakota, as he returned home. "Where did you hold them, then?" asked his wife. "Back of Joe Pinneo's barn." "Well; that's a strange place—has the church burnt up?" "Oh, no, the church is all right, but the congregation was all back of the barn, so I went there and stood up on a hay-rack and expounded the word for over an hour. You see Joe and Deacon Fumstock were trading horses out there, and I'm bound to take the gospel right to the people."

"BE of good cheer, Sister Jones," said the pastor to a dying member of his congregation. "You will soon be in heaven playing on a golden harp, and rejoicing with the angel throng." "Ah, no," faintly uttered Sister Jones. "I could never play on a musical instrument—not even an accordion—and I'll never be able to play on a harp unless it has a handle to it like an orguinette."

A PARALYTIC young woman, who had been unable to walk for years, was conveyed to a revival-meeting one night recently, and during prayer she suddenly arose, gave an ear-piercing shout, climbed over three pews, gained the aisle, and made a dash for the pulpit. It was not another faith cure, as many persons in the congregation supposed. She had simply seen a mouse in her pew near her feet.

TRUE ECONOMY.

A thrifty and most economical dame
Owned a pair of fine fowls whose fair qualities came Through a line of fine fowls of an eggsellent fame.

And madam, the hen, had a musical way
Of duly announcing an egg every day,
While Sir Cockolorum would join in the lay.

And once on a time in the cold of the year,
When eggs they were scarce and when eggs they were dear,
Still daily their cackle was truthful and clear.

And ere their commendable labors did cease,
A bountiful basketful showed the increase,
All fresh and all fair and worth four cents apiece.

Since eggs they were scarce and since eggs they were high,
The thrifty old dame, with a natural sigh
(For she liked a good egg) put the basketful by.

"In the list of my sins," with decision said she,
"The sin of eggstravagance never shall be,
Such eating is quite too eggspensiv for me."

It chanced, when the far-away farmers had heard
The price of good eggs, that their spirits were stirred
To send in by car-loads the fruit of the bird.

And long ere these efforts for profit did cease,
An overstocked market had felt the increase,
And eggs they were selling for one cent apiece.

The thrifty old dame with a heart that was gay,
Brought forth her full basket without a delay,
From where she so lately had stowed it away.

"The price has come down while the eggs are yet sweet,"
She said, "which will giv me a plenty to eat.
At twelve cents a dozen they're cheaper than meat."

Gems of Thought.

HAD England never had an established church, she might hav been spared the most deplorable periods in her history.—D. M. Bennett.

WE honor our ancestors when we liv better, think better, and do better than they did. That is a false veneration that builds a ship after the model of the Mayflower; that creates a house of Puritan architecture; that livs as they did in our grandfathers' days. Our forefathers showed their sense when they respected their own ideas. That is the lesson that Plymouth Rock inculcates. It is not a symbol of attainment; it is the rude attempt, the apprentice hand, that foretells the column of beauty, the full power of liberty. No form is so perfect that it should be copied forever; no method so fit that it shall never be supplanted. Life is progress; the world must be emancipated from models. Candles may be run in molds, but not human beings.—L. K. Washburn.

FULL eighteen hundred years hav passed since Paul imagined that the reign of death was almost over, and it is not over yet. Death is still absolute and universal. The most that has been accomplished is, here and there, to obtain a brief reprieve of the impartial sentence under which all lie together. But this reprieve has not been the work of the priest or the magician; prayer has not won it, nor any far off, doubtful resurrection. It has been the work of the physiologist, the physician, the sanitarian, the student of hygiene, of those who hav discovered the laws of health, and most of all, of those who hav obeyed them.—John W. Chadwick.

THE common Christian conception of the pardon of sin upon repentance and conversion seems to us to embody a very transparent and pernicious fallacy. "Who can forgiv sins but God only?" asked the Pharisees. There is great confusion and contradiction in our ideas on this subject. God is the only being who can not forgiv sins. "Forgivness of sins" means one of two things—it either means saving a man from the consequences of his sins, that is, interposing between cause and effect, in which case it is working a miracle (which God no doubt can do, but which we hav no right to expect that he will do, or to ask that he shall do); or, it means an engagement to forbear retaliation, a suppression of the natural anger felt against the offender by the offended party, a forgiving of vengeance on the part of the injured—in which meaning it is obviously quite inapplicable to a being exempt and aloof from human passions.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

CANT is useful to provoke common sense.—Emerson.

No good man can hav a realizing conviction of the truth of Christianity, and not be miserable. To be consistent, every Christian should be in a madhouse. "If men in general," says Leigh Hunt, "had ever seen a human being broiling in a real fire, writhing and groaning, men in general would fall on their knees to implore the quenching of hell-fire, or they would disbelieve its existence." Judge for yourselvs, my readers, whether the thought of unbroken everlasting sleep for all human kind, or such a future as Christianity teaches, is the more rational and ennobling.—Underwood's Lectures and Essays.

WHAT is there in this life that can appear great to him who has acquainted himself with eternity and the utmost extent of the universe? For what is there in human knowledge or the short space of this life that can appear great to a wise man? Whose mind is always so upon its guard that nothing can befal him which is unforeseen, nothing which is unexpected, nothing, in short, which is new? Such a man takes so exact a survey on all sides of him that he always knows the proper place and spot to liv in, free from all troubles and annoyances of life, and encounters every accident that fortune can bring upon him with a becoming calmness.—Cicero's Tusculan Disputations.

"YOU allow that it would hav been my vocation to be a nun had I been a Catholic?" Virginia asked in a strange voice. "Yes, and as a Catholic I would hav respected your choice," Ringrave answered, "though as a Catholic I should hav deplored the false view of goodness which takes from this life the purest and finest natures to shut them up in a living tomb where they can do no good to anyone!" "We are the last in the world to uphold the Romish church, with all its errors of doctrin and superstition," said Hermione, speaking as she had been taught. "But you must in fairness allow us Anglicans the same vocation." Ringrave shook his head. "No, I do not," he said gently. "A woman can do better for herself and the world than by incarcerating herself and renouncing all practical usefulness. A mother is of more value than a nun."—Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord?

Notes and Clippings.

THE manuscript of Burns's poem, "The Whistle," has recently been purchased for £283 by Lord Rosebery.

THE Boston barber arrested for cutting a man's hair on Sunday has been acquitted. His lawyer quoted 1 Cor. xi, 14, "Doth not even nature itself teach you that if a man hav long hair it is a shame unto him?" and the judges were overpowered and let the culprit go.

THE Canadian Pacific Railroad owns the heaviest locomotiv in the world. It weighs eighty tons. The next heaviest is the Southern Pacific's, seventy-seven tons; the third weighs seventy-two and a half tons, and is on the Northern Pacific; and Brazil owns the fourth, weighing seventy-two tons.

THE Rev. Mr. Ward, of Englewood, N. J., who shot his wife, though not fatally, and then some time afterward committed suicide, left a will disposing of property worth about $25,000, the proceeds of his two former marriages. His widow's name is not mentioned in the will, though it was drawn two days after the shooting.

A DAILY paper published one day last week the confession of the Methodist Janitor Titus, of the Hackettstown, N. J., Institute, who murdered Tillie Smith. The confession relates with considerable circumstantiality that the janitor and the girl had been criminally intimate, and that the killing was accidental. Before night on the day of publication Anthony Comstock appeared in the district attorney's office and demanded a warrant for the arrest of the editor of the paper for circulating obscene literature. The warrant was not granted. Titus's confession is full of pious asseverations, but is generally believed to be a pure fabrication.

QUEEN KAPIOLANI of the Sandwich Islands visited our schools last week. She was greatly surprised to learn that New York expends $4,000,000 annually for educational purposes, and that the pupils number nearly double her entire kingdom. The queen was royally entertained in Boston, that city having paid nearly $18,000 for hotel bills, carriage hire, flowers, and music for her and her numerous attendants.

TWO revivalists at Park Ridge, N. J., hav got into trouble by calling people indiscriminately "devils and sons of devils." One of them, named Mason, applied that epithet to a Sunday-school teacher, and the latter yanked him out of his pulpit by the beard, and a free fight followed. The place is in a state of excitement over the affair, and the evangelists are threatened with tar and feathers unless they moderate the tenor of their discourses.

THE joke in the following from the Sun will be seen when it is recollected that the thirsty New Yorker must ferry the Hudson to Hoboken if he desires to drink a glass of beer on Sunday: "Wife (returning from church): 'How beautifully the choir sang "One More River to Cross!"' Husband: 'Yes, and that reminds me that I hav an engagement in Hoboken this afternoon.'" A great many church-goers are having engagements across the river on these dry Sunday afternoons. If the object of the Sunday law in New York is to encourage church attendance, it is a failure. The worshiper could always get his drink on the way to church, so that his religious devotions were not interfered with. Now that he must go to New Jersey for the drink, attendance upon divine service is impracticable.

IN Louisville, N. A., and C. Railway Co. vs. Frawley, the Indiana Supreme Court has recently held that the mere fact that one who sustains an injury by the negligent act of another may hav been at the time of such injury acting in disobedience of the Sunday laws of the state, will not prevent a recovery from the party whose wrongful or negligent act was the proximate cause of such injury.

LAST Sunday, as I did my constitutional on the avenue, says a writer on the Star, I overheard one of those neat, lap-seamed, a la militaire, ecru spring jackets say to another ditto, outside one of the fashionable churches: "Why, Belle, I thought you were a Unitarian?" "Yes, we were," was the reply, "but ma and I hav joined the Episcopalians. We like their forms better." "Their forms?" "Yes; you get up and down so much, you know, your dress doesn't get crumpled."

THE Rev. Mr. Schabehorn, of Nyack, N. Y., tried by the presbytery for drunkenness, confesses his fault, but pleads in excuse that "at every wedding, christening, and social event beer and wine flow freely, and if the minister refuses to drink he givs offense." He promises, however, to risk giving offense rather than get drunk any more. Another charge against Mr. Schabehorn is that he has been guilty of "criminal conversation" with women, and his confession on that point is awaited with interest.

MR. BAYARD, United States secretary of state, has recently signed a treaty with the Russian government under which political refugees from that country may be arrested in this. In behalf of the Russian-Americans in New York a great many people are protesting against the treaty, and on Thursday evening of last week a mass-meeting was held at Cooper Institute. Among the speakers was Dr. McGlynn, who said: "I do not stand here to justify the assassination of the czar, although I should not put any crape on my hat if he should be killed. I hav the profoundest respect for conscience, and even though conscience should be erroneous a man is following a heroic part in following his conscience. There are noble, grand, and heroic men who believe it to be their duty to kill the czar, and I respect their opinions. It is not the duty of the Senate to decide this question of conscience for them." A letter from Col. R. G. Ingersoll was read as follows: "With every drop of my blood I am opposed to any treaty with Russia by which the United States shall be bound to deliver to the agents of that infamous government men who hav simply been charged with political crimes. A Russian who does not oppose the despotism of the czar is a criminal, and one who does is a patriot and hero. No such treaty should be made while Siberia is the tomb of the bravest and the best. This government should side with the struggling, with the oppressed, and no true American should hav the slightest sympathy with the tyrants, the usurpers, the enemies of the human race, called kings and czars."

VI.

THE ANDOVER CASE

Was just on the tapis at the time of this interview with my combatant, and more to gratify my curiosity in seeing what an intelligent Infidel would think of it, I asked his opinion of the case. "Thank you," said he, "for calling my attention to that subject. It proves and illustrates my position that the indefinable thing called religion has no power to make even cultivated men frank, honorable, and honest, but converts them, on the first temptation, into cunning tricksters. If in the matter of land or money wordly people would act as fraudulently as these Andover professors do, they would be sent to the penitentiary, like the New York aldermen, as unmitigated rogues. You seem shocked at what I say, but look at the case. Here was a large sum of money contributed by Calvinistic Christians of the Congregational church to endow a theological seminary where young men should be qualified to preach the orthodox system to the New England churches. Remembering how the funds of Harvard University had been stolen by the Unitarians, and prostituted to the teaching of a theology emasculated of all its stalwart and manly features; remembering, too, how the pious Jacob, the patron saint of all religious rogues, had robbed his nobler brother of his birthright and his father's blessing by simulating the hairy hands of Esau, these orthodox donors consulted the lawyers, and under their directions put every conceivable obstacle in the way of such another alienation. Then they died, believing that Andover, like Princeton, would, as a perennial fountain, send forth its streams of orthodox influence to the end of time, to keep sound and growing all the churches of their faith. The founders of the Andover school of theology knew what orthodoxy is. They were familiar with the teachings of Jonathan Edwards, the great Calvin of the New England states. They knew that the Five Points of Calvinism, as they are called, are as logical as the multiplication table, and that if one were admitted to be true, and he who made the admission knew how to reason, all the rest of them must be true also. According to this system, the heathen in foreign lands were in a totally and hopelessly lost condition, because 'there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved' but the name of Jesus, and the heathen, never having heard of this name, must of course be exposed to eternal damnation. The whole enterprise of foreign missions was based upon this scriptural tenet, and the churches proved their faith in it by contributing millions upon millions of money to put the heathen into a salvable condition at least, if by any means they might save some. But the sagacious heathen, when they saw that, by the new religion offered to them by the missionaries, all their ancestors were not only dead, but damned, because they had not believed in a Christ or a Bible which they never heard of, gave the cold shoulder to such a religion, and, to take the stumbling-block out of the way of their becoming Christians and joining the mission churches, the new doctrin of a second probation is cooked up, forming an olla-podrida, or incongruous melange, the like of which the world never heard of before. You see, these missionaries hav found a bonanza which they value at its true worth. They liv like nabobs in their bungalows, and are pensioned for life on the funds of the church. Nothing endangers them but the fact, if it were spread among the churches at home, that the whole foreign missionary enterprise is the most colossal fraud and humbug of the age, since the few conversions they make are among the lowest classes of the Eastern nations. And so, to gull the people at home, and keep their purse-strings loose, and with the hope of increasing their converts as proof of their success, they propitiate the heathen by teaching that the departed souls of their ancestors, now locked up in the prisons of hell, will hav a second probation or chance in the next world, as if they had had a first chance in this. But look at the monstrous absurdity and utter unscripturalness of the idea! Paul says of the present gospel, that it is 'the wisdom of God, and the power of God unto salvation.' That is to say, that the divine attributes of infinit wisdom, power, and goodness were exhausted in originating the gospel as a method of carrying out the purposes of God concerning the human race as fallen. Under this system the stream of human destiny, like the mighty Mississippi, has been flowing down from the date of the fall in the Garden of Eden through sixty centuries of time, bearing countless millions of unredeemed souls to the gulf of perdition, God saving by a miracle of grace only a comparativ handful, as the very best that he could do in the circumstances of the case. Could the imaginary church and gospel of the probationists, when set up in the next world, be and do any more than this? And if these instrumentalities, put in activ operation under a new dispensation, beginning with the Christian church eighteen hundred years ago, with the Holy Ghost to help, hav failed to the extent that the church containing the redeemed is still a very 'little flock,' what hope is there that it will be any better in the 'second' probation church of the future? No, sir," said my combatant, waxing warm, "the Andover men hav outgrown the creed which they swore they believed and would teach when they were installed in office. They hav snug, warm houses to liv in, and large salaries, and, like the missionaries, are pensioned for life; and to keep these privileges they hav resorted to tricks which, if a lawyer would practice in his profession, would cause him to be disbarred and driven from court in disgrace. The second probation idea is stamped with folly and childishness on its face, and would hav been laughed out of existence when first announced had it not been for the amazing credulity of the Christian people, which makes them like to be humbugged, and because there are vast funds and comfortable places at stake. For what can be a nicer berth in this world of ups and downs, and bread and butter, than a well-furnished house, out of which no landlord can warn you, a good, punctually-paid salary, and a chair in a theological seminary where the professor performs his perfunctory devotions for a few minutes every day, and reads over to a new class of students every year his old fox-tail lectures, reeking with the lore of the Dark Ages crammed into the Confession of Faith, which they are sworn to teach? If it were not for a conscience and a sense of honor which forbid, Infidel as I am, I might be tempted, for such a comfortable consideration as I hav mentioned, to do as the Andover professors do."

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

At this point I interjected a question as to his opinion of the foreign missionary enterprise itself. "Why, sir," said he, "it is the biggest swindle ever practiced on the credulity of this or any other age. It exceeds the imposture of the oracle at Delphos, where the Pythian priestess, on her tripod, levied willing contributions from the Greeks for ages. It is a meaner money-making trick than the one played for centuries and still kept up by the Catholic priests on the Neapolitans by the liquefaction of the blood of Saint Januarius. The way the church people in this country contribute money to the cause of missions proves them to be the most gullible of mankind. And the way the managers at home doctor up the reports of the missionaries abroad, so as to blind the eyes and bleed the purses of their dupes, proves what I said before, that the sentiment called religion allows its devotees to do the meanest and most unprincipled things. If the church, in her benevolence, would send a domestic missionary into some settlement on our Western frontier to save the souls of our countrymen, furnish him with a house, and good salary, and put him on the funds as a pensioner for life, and then find, after twenty years of 'labor' in his vocation, that there were more children born in six months thanthe adults he had converted in all that time; if, I say, the people would visit the field and see how they had been swindled and their benevolence abused, they would giv up the business of soul-saving in disgust. But the heathen are thousands of miles away, and all the knowledge they hav comes through corrupt channels. The agents of the missionary society at home, and the missionaries themselvs, conspire effectually to hoodwink the people and make them believe that thousands of the heathen are annually converted to Christianity, and the whole of them soon will be if the Christians at home only contribute liberally to the cause."

"But," I asked, "are not some of the heathen converted, and do they not join the church?" "Yes," said he, "but in India and China, where most of the missions are located, humanity swarms in millions, and is as cheap as dirt. The most of them belong to the lowest class, are ignorant, and poor as poverty itself, are of no account, and can be hired at a few pennies a day to dress up and parade as Christian converts. Who ever heard of any of the intelligent classes among the Hindoos or Chinese being converted? If there are any such they are as rare as white blackbirds. A friend of mine, in a city where was located the largest mission station in the empire, had a missionary periodical put into his hands which had just been received from England, containing the annual report of the condition and prospects of that mission, made by the reverend gentlemen who composed it, with the request of the merchant who handed it to him that he would read it carefully and compare the statements made in its pages with the facts in the case as he had seen them with his own eyes. He met the English merchant a few days after having read the document, and in conversation remarked that he could not believe it possible that men professing to be religious, and whom he went to hear preach every Sunday, could misrepresent facts as these missionaries had done. 'Why,' said the merchant, 'it is their very religion that makes them falsifiers of the truth. It is the old doctrin of pious frauds which the church has practiced from the first century of its existence, and which has always been justified because the lies told and the robberies committed are for the glory of God and the good of his blood-bought church.'

"While on this subject of meanness and dishonesty, which religion of all kinds allows its votaries to commit without blushing, I need not go to India for example. Look at the Tract Society, the Bible Society, which, I believe, are close corporations in law, that chose their own successors in office, and are not accountable to their constituents who furnish the funds they handle; the Methodist Book Concern, and all the other societies for the collection and disbursement of money for religious purposes managed chiefly by the clergy. What a revelation might be made if experts were sent to examin the accounts! But, as before remarked, the religious public like to be humbugged. The seamstress in her garret, where she works at starvation wages—provided she is pious—likes to contribute of her hard earnings for the support of the dear, self-denying missionaries, and for the maintenance and education of the able-bodied, pious young men who are studying for the gospel ministry; and she would frown upon me and call me an Infidel if I would undertake to show her the fact that she was robbed by the meanest kind of thieves, and that her pittance, no larger than the farmer's 'widows mite,' and so sincerely given, went, with thousands more like it, into the insatiable maws of a priesthood, who trade in religion as the brokers do in watered stocks and 'futures.'"

"My friend," said I, at the close of his utterance, "I thank you for the candor you hav manifested during this conversation in giving me the ideas and purposes of the Infidels. I must confess, if you are a representativ man, as I take you to be, that you are a people with glass breasts, whose opinions, motivs, and plans are apparent to all who wish to ascertain them. You hav no secret mental reservations; you don't seem inclined to force, distort, or explain away the facts of nature to round out your views into a system, but take them as they are. And while I am in deadly opposition to your doctrins and schemes, I must regard you as honorable antagonists. There is, however, one more topic on which I should like to hear you speak before we part, and that is, God. Do you believe in a personal God who created and governs all things?" To this he replied: "On this subject I am neither a Deist nor an Atheist, but an Agnostic. I neither affirm nor deny; neither do I believe or disbelieve, any more than I do the proposition that the planet Jupiter is inhabited by human beings, because there is no conclusiv evidence on the subject, one way or the other. If we are left without any positiv proof of the existence of a God, or if our faculties are too weak to perceive it, the most modest position a man can take is to say frankly, I do not know. To see the confidence with which each of the hundreds of sectarians declares that he knows all about God and the universe, one would suppose that he was on speaking and visiting terms with him, and frequently entertained him at dinner. But the Agnostic, when he stands before the illimitable universe, is appalled with a sense of his own insignificance and ignorance, and reverently says of its origin, I do not know. But I look with favor on the theory which attributes to matter itself, in its infinit forms, all the phenomena which for ages we hav been in the habit of ascribing to a personal God. Since the discoveries of Newton, thinking men, whose religion has produced in them no obliquity of vision, and who are judges and jurors, instead of attorneys at law with the church as their client, are coming to agree that matter is not only eternal in existence, but self-endowed with the force of attraction, which keeps the planets in their orbits, and prevents collision. Look at the force of matter in the human body which, when a man is sound asleep, pumps the blood by main force into the arterial system, carrying life and health everywhere from crown to sole; and when its oxygen is used up, bringing it back by the venous circulation to the lungs, where it is replenished with new life from the atmosphere. Cut and tie up an artery in a man's arm above the elbow, and immediately nature, as we call that force in physiology, will begin the anastomosing process of digging an artificial channel, and constructing a new pipe, for conveying the arterial blood to the parts of the arm below the elbow. This is an exhibition of the inherent and intelligent force of matter, and evidences design. A few centuries ago, before the birth of science, if a man born before his time had announced such truths to the world, he would hav been sent by the church to prison. Roger Bacon, in the fifteenth century, for the crime of knowing how to grind glass pebbles, and make magnifying spectacles, thus giving old people new eyes, was charged by the church with being in league with the devil, and put into prison. The phenomena of life were then attributed to miracle, but now we ascribe them to the infinit capabilities of matter. While I admit that in this whole class of subjects there are difficulties which science has not yet solved, I think there are fewer in the theory I favor than in any other. I am content, therefore, to wait for new knowledge. If it shall come to me before I die, or afterwards, how glad I will be to receive it! If my being is extinguished at death, I will share the fate, as a fact in nature, of all the countless millions who hav gone before me to the realms of shade.

"In your complimentary remarks a moment ago concerning the Infidels, which I duly appreciate, you spoke of our plans and purposes. Our purpose is to free the human intellect and conscience from the bondage of religion. And our plan, or method, to accomplish this purpose is free discussion. We aim not to form an organization with a creed as a bond of union, nor a political party to exercise power, but to make every human being consciously free to think, to weigh evidence, and to come to a conclusion. The church has the start of us by eighteen hundred years, during most of which time her authority was unquestioned. But we hav the freedom of speech and of the press, and what is more, with all due deference, a system of truth consistent with nature. And although you do not believe it, I think your grandchildren will see, if your children do not anticipate them, that the prevalence of our opinions will not result in Anarchy, moral or political, but in making our fellow-beings wiser, better, and happier than they ever were under the reign of the church superstition. Farewell!"

At the close of this meeting I took my leave, and while all was fresh in my recollection, made a record in my journal of the substance of the conversation as stated above. My experience with the Infidels thus far has convinced me of one thing, that the policy of representing them in our pulpits and journals as a class without character and influence, is not only a mistake but a dangerous one. They are wide awake, and know what they are about. But the church, asleep, and fortified by numbers, wealth, and organization, are as ignorant of what is going on outside as the Babylonians were when Cyrus, with the Persian army at his back, was breaking down the brazen gates of the Euphrates, and preparing to invade and conquer the city.

The Unsettled Question.

Whatever may be urged against it, no question is more important, or more imperativly demanding a settlement, than that which is caused by the relations of capital and labor. It is very evident that the present condition of things cannot long continue. The general dissatisfaction, which is not confined to the most ignorant and the poorest, is a proof that we are on the eve of some important changes in our common life.

Whatever allowances we may make for individual inequalities, no one can deny that something is fundamentally wrong when, in a land of plenty, such contrasts exist in the possessions of men. The recognition of this fact is, in itself, a great step for a nation to make in one century. Great wealth in the hands of the few is absolutely more dangerous than universal poverty. Its tendency is to constantly interfere with both legislation and commerce, and to conquer by one means or the other every weak competitor. The rights of the individual are second to the rights of property. Such a reversal of natural rights can end only in discontent and revolution.

Not only so, but the social and other distinctions brought about by such iniquitous means cause the extremes of society to look with fear or suspicion on each other. The great body of people who form what is called "the middle class" are in constant danger from any warfare between the two extremes. Whichever way we look, we may discern the serious results of any other inequality among men than that which is natural. No nation can be at peace with itself, even if it be a republic, when every state institution is controled by wealth. People may complain, then, of the restlessness of the laborers; but every violation of the rights of one by another class will but intensify the resulting uneasiness.

There is no wisdom in joining in the clamor against wealth, where it has been honestly acquired. No conceivable system of life will produce equality of wealth among men. And a coerced equality, could it even be thought of, would be the worst system of all.

The whole of this great controversy may be summed up in two questions: What should be done by the state to adjust the difficulties of the situation? and, What should the individual do? It is hardly possible for anyone to fully discern the respectiv duties of the state on the one hand, and of the individual on the other. One thing is very certain. That which can be done by the one should not be undertaken by the other. And any attempt to supplant each other from its proper sphere can end only in vexatious controversy. But how are we to ascertain what should be done by the state alone, and what by the individual? The principal consideration is that what is established for a national purpose should be owned or controled by the people collectivly in contradistinction to corporations owning and controling it. Take, for instance, the system of railroads. There can hardly be any question of the justice and utility of the national government having absolute control of it. Not that I suppose that the ownership of the railroads by the general government is perpectly free from objection; but that, under the present system of ownership, the people are exposed to the merciless avarice of railroad corporations. Every law that has been, or will be, passed, in relation to the control or regulation of railroads, will only show the increasing necessity of the state purchasing and owning them. The English people likewise are perceiving the same necessity. And if evils exist on either side, we hav to choose between an evil of monstrous extortion and interference from railroad companies, and industrial officialism. I do not believe in state Socialism; nor is this measure akin to it. No serious objection has been brought against the general efficiency and cheapness of our postal system; and its management by the general government affords a guaranteee of equal efficiency in a similar control of the railroads. I cannot recapitulate the numerous advantages accruing from this in a brief article. I will refer only to an objection I hav often heard brought against it. It is said that it would establish a tyranny inconceivably worse than that which now exists. How that can be so, I fail to see. Everyone knows that until recently no tyranny was more extortionate than that of the railroad companies in carrying freight to non-competitiv points. Not only so. The great amount of capital invested, and the insane desire for more, has been a constant menace to legislation and industry in every state of the union. That would be forever removed in case the people owned the railroads. It is not rash to say that if the people will not own the railroads, the railroads will own the people. It is not difficult to make a choice between such things. Now for the objection. Instead of establishing a system of tyranny of officials over employees, it would be the most successful method of civil service reform that could be adopted. Competency in each workman would be indispensable; and political partisanship as a condition of promotion would be insanity. Whatever other objections may be brought against this plan, the counter objection remains unanswered—that great wealth, that rich corporations, hav no pity for the laboring masses.

The land question calls for a few remarks. This is, perhaps, one of the most difficult problems of the day. Not simply is it difficult to devise an equitable system of land ownership, but after that is done, the difficulty of accomplishing it remains. We can more easily say what should not be done than what should. So far as the people collectivly are concerned, no individual or corporation should be permitted to enter the public domain and own immense tracts of land. I here refer to land grants to railroads, and to speculators in land. Evils innumerable hav been produced by these two causes. And no remedy is worthy of consideration that does not strike at the very root of the evil. Every ethical consideration shows the infamy of the state legalizing the wholesale speculation in land. In every instance the poor settler has suffered from the rich speculator. These and similar measures are what seem to me to be both necessary and right. To impose upon the state, as Socialism urges, the care of each and all would be intolerable. It may be that there would be no poor to care for if riches had no special privilege from law.

Now, what should the individual do? First and foremost, intelligence is imperativly necessary. We shall be cursed with fraud and imposition so long as the majority are hoodwinked with impudent flattery. Justice can never reign where ignorance prevails. Intelligence is a concrete force, and without it every man is exposed to the intrigues of his fellow-man. In a general sense, good laws and the spirit of freedom can exist only when the people are intelligent. It has become a duty for every man to inform himself on the issues of the age in which he livs. Ignorance is criminal.

It becomes necessary for everybody to rightly understand the purpose and sphere of government, and to protest against any invasion of individual rights. It is doubtful whether there is a city or state in the Union that has not continually interfered with personal rights. I am not here referring to those cases where all hav to contribute to the support of the government. But in nearly every instance, rings and cliques, composed as a rule of dishonest men, manage our city and state affairs. The only successful remedy for such an evil is intelligence. It is folly to attempt to abolish the government in order to rid ourselvs of the evils which accompany it.

The habits of industry and sobriety are essential. Each should contribute to the general good by devoting his abilities to that work for which he is best qualified. If every man were willing to work, there would be but little want, or misery, or crime.

Then the rights of men as corporations should be fully understood and zealously defended. The idea that a rich and successful man is necessarily dishonest, and that the poor man is necessarily honest, is both vicious and false. The past has proven that corporate wealth has been of inestimable value to man, and that the laborer as well as the capitalist has shared its benefits. And it is equally true of every invention and discovery that was ever made.

There need be no revolt against the rights of invested capital. But there is a need of more self-reliance, more personal temperance, more industry, and of strict attention of everyone to his own business.

Sympathy for God.

More than any person that I hav ever known, or read about, I pity God. There is somewhat inexpressibly sad in the existence of this divine being. He has absolutely no companionship that can cheer his solitude. I wonder if he does not sometimes wish he was a man, so he could enjoy life and hav a good time. What heart would not be touched at thought of this lonely being? Poor God! I pity him. He has been a widower for hundreds of years. Think of living all this time without a female compauion. It is true he has one son; and a ghost for a household attendant. But there can be no family comforts or joys without a person of the opposit sex in the house. No wife, no sister, no daughter! I do not see what God has to liv for. The divine household is composed of all males. It is a kind of monastery. When I think of God, I rejoice that I am a man. I cannot see much fun in being the "ruler of the universe." I would not swap places with the deity, even if he would offer boot. I would not be God for any consideration. From a human standpoint, God is a pitiable person.

All that makes human life bright, sweet, and desirable is denied the deity. It may be that there is compensation for his hard lot. I hope so. I will do anything to make it pleasanter for him. But what an undesirable life he must lead! He never takes a vacation; never leaves his business; never runs off for a pleasure trip. He can't. Think of being everywhere so as you can go nowhere. "God is everywhere, in everything." He cannot move an inch; if he did, he would step on himself. What a wretched feeling it must be, spread out all over the universe! I do not see how he can ever pull himself together. Think of a man having his head in Alaska, his feet in Brazil, one hand in China, and the other in England. Imagin having to lean over the whole of North America to pull your boots on. The thought that God is everywhere makes the divine existence "too thin."

If one wished to call upon the deity, where would he look for the door-bell? Think of God as you will, you must pity him. He may hav worlds at his feet, but if he never held his own baby on his knee, he has missed the highest happiness that the elements hav evolved. I never liked the divine way of bringing up a family, nor his employing a ghost to do his courting for him. A child running over the fields of heaven would hav brought a less orthodox expression on the divine countenance. God is a very solemn being. There seems to be an everlasting sadness in his face. Let us not condemn the deity for his coldness. Perhaps, if we knew all he has to suffer and endure, we should be as solemn and sad as he is. A man who has a pleasant home, a loving wife, and fair, sweet child knows nothing of the dark, terrible solitude where love sheds no light and warmth; where sympathy presses not its hand of cheer and courage upon the tired, weary brow. But I pity God most of all for being obliged to hear the complaints of mortals. I should think he would ring his chestnut gong on those ministers who hav been praying for the same things for so many years.

Instructions for the Lord's Supper.

A printed set of "Hints to Communicants" which has been forwarded to us, says the London Freethinker, is rather amusiug. The "Hints" are really most particular injuuctious emphasized by the language of priestly authoritativness and by the plentiful use of special large type for the most important part of each regulation. The authoritativ hints commence thus, the words italicized being in extra large black type:

"1. The Blessed Sacrament should be received fasting: this means that you should take no food or drink after midnight, not eveu a drop of water or a dose of medicin is allowed."

The thought of the precious body and blood being allowed to mingle in the stomach with an early rasher or cup of coffee, or in the intestins with a dose of jalap or castor oil, is too distressing for the Christiau to contemplate.

Passing over minor instructions about removing gloves and veils, and the mauuer of kneeling and bowing, we come to the following:

"7. Your hauds should be held up as high as your chin, and the Sacred Host should be received in the palm of the right hand resting flat upou the left, and so conveyed carefully to the mouth. Take care that no particle remains unconsumed on your hand."

The dreadful consequences of leaving particles unconsumed is illustrated in the tale of the rat, which we took from the colums of La Semaine Anticléricale. The parson of this East London church would hardly like to be compelled to swallow all the rats and mice that frequent his church; and to allow any of the sacred crumbs to be swept away with the ordinary dust would be the hight of impiety. "Hint" No. 8 givs a number of separate commands which run thus:

"8. Guide the Chalice firmly with both hands to your mouth.

"Do not take more than one small drop of the Precious Blood.

"Draw your lips together, so that no drop may escape.

"Men with hair on their lips should be most careful.

"Never wipe your lips with your handkerchief.

"Never take your hands away from the Chalice with a jerk, or bow your head suddenly; women with large hats or bonnets should be particularly careful about this."

News and Notes.

I lectured at Lodi Saturday evening, May 7th. Although short notice was given, the hall was full, and the discourse on "The New Heaven and Earth" was favorably received. Lodi is a pretty place of about fifteen hundred inhabitants, and in the midst of an excellent farming country. A system of irrigation is under way by which the resources of the soil will be materially increased, and without doubt this will be one of the richest producing sections of California. With plenty of water it will be almost unequaled for its wealth of fruit and grain.

I found some excellent pioneer workers in Lodi. Dr. Gordon is one who never flinches in the expression of his opinions. The ministers tackle him but once. They get enough of it at the first interview, and pay due respect thereafter to the doctor's ideas, and don't press him for a "change of heart." George Hogan, who presided at the meeting, is another stanch frontiersman of freedom. I was pleased also to meet Mrs. Laura DeForce Gordon, who is one of the most prominent lawyers in the state—a noble representativ of woman's genius and perseverance. Judge Callaway and others were present from Lockeford, where there is quite a gathering of Liberals. W. M. Bernard was present from Bartlett Springs. He arranged the debate which took place a few years ago at Elliott, a town near by, between Colonel Kelso and a Campbellite preacher, which created a big excitement, and our gallant colonel increased by hundreds the ranks of Infidelity. W. N. Moss, Amos Gove, etc., are of the Lodi phalanx, and I hope again to greet these generous soldiers of humanity.

Fully a thousand people were present at the Avon Theater, Stockton, Sunday evening, to listen to the "Glory of Infidelity." I guess I shall hav to put Stockton in the front rank of our Liberal forces. There are experienced leaders here, and they know how to giv prestige to the cause. Their Paine celebration last winter was a most brilliant success, and probably there was the largest attendance to it of any in the country, as at least fifteen hundred people were present. W. F. Freeman, Chas. Haas, A. Blossom, G. C. Hyatt, J. C. Gage, Emile Dreyfous, A. T. Hudson, W. S. Fowler, F. T. Baldwin, P. G. Sharp, I. S. Bostwick, with their families, and many others make an intellectual and social influence that is broad and deep for Liberal improvement. These friends hav contributed several hundred dollars to giv Freethought and philosophic literature to the public library of Stockton, and this is a noble instrumentality of agitation and progress. Mr. Freeman himself has sold nearly a thousand dollars' worth of Liberal publications at the lowest possible prices, receiving no remuneration for his own efforts, but sometimes being out of pocket, in order to extend the circulation of books and pamphlets for reform and education. Such work as this in every community would soon create a vast enthusiasm for justice, humanity, and radical ideas.

San Joaquin is, they say, the "boss" valley of the state. Its production of grain is enormous, and Stockton is the shipping-point mainly. It has direct water communication with Europe, and hundreds of ships transport to the markets of the world the produce of this vast and splendid valley. The climate is genial, like that of southern California, while there are more facilities for water, and a much larger extent of fruitful soil. Oranges, lemons, limes, grapes, apples, peaches, prunes, apricots, cherries, figs, almonds, etc., can be raised with profit, and almost every variety of grain and vegetable. Hitherto the farms hav been large, consisting of hundreds and thousands of acres, and they hav not been skilfully and carefully cultivated. The need is to break up the large farms into small farms of ten and twenty acres, and then the wonderful facilities of this valley will be developed.

I was pleased to meet Mr. and Mrs. T. J. Pope at Stockton, who liv about fifteen miles in the country, but who were present at both lectures. They take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that is the reason, I guess, of their liberality and enthusiasm. Nothing like a good paper to keep friends in the front rank. Mr. Pope told a Catholic neighbor of his that if he would read THE TRUTH SEEKER carefully for three years, and at the end of that time was still a faithful Catholic, he would giv him a ranch worth ten thousand dollars. The man did not accept the offer. He was afraid to take the risk, even with the prospect of a ten-thousand-dollar ranch provided he kept the faith. I don't think there is a single minister in the land who would accept the same offer. Not even Sam Jones could read THE TRUTH SEEKER three years and save his faith and win the ranch.

I had the pleasure of taking lunch with Fred Schuenemann Pott and his confrères around a table where he has gathered with friends for the last fifteen years or so, and he has kept a record of every meal of those present, etc., and the names of many a noted Freethinker, reformer, and scholar can be found in this remarkable list. Schuenemann Pott is a brilliant representativ of advanced German thought and genius. He has a permanent congregation at San Francisco, and lectures throughout the country in German and English and is equally eloquent in both. He is an attractiv and scholarly speaker, and it was a gratification indeed to meet around the social board so genial a man. Our German friends make a grand force for Liberal ideas. There will be a battle some time with the ecclesiastical forces, and when the issue comes the German element, American to the core, will be our strenuous allies for freedom.

I hav had a curious time at Ukiah, up among the hills, a hundred and thirty miles from San Francisco. I came to Cloverdale and took the stage, and the ride through the hills, along the winding Russian river, amid stately groves of oak, by the redwood-trees where the coach is frequently held up by the deft robber; by the enormous rocks, the Lovers' Leap, where the Indian maiden, they say, found refuge from disappointment in death—amid scenes lovely, grand, and romantic, ever opening into new views of wildness and splendor, now defiles and then broad expanses, and far-away pictures of snowy summits against the bending sky; amid these, along a fine road, the four horses pass with gallant tread, and I was not tired a bit when in the sunset light, gorgeous over the surrounding hills and green fields, I arrived at the really beautiful city of Ukiah—a city of course, though it has only fifteen hundred people, but it is the metropolitan center of a county one hundred miles long and seventy-five miles wide. The Ukiah Silver Band summoned the folk to the court house, and a fair audience greeted me at my first lecture. Two ministers were present. They kept quiet for awhile, but one of them, a Rev. Mr. Martin, soon felt constrained to leap up in the very midst of my discourse and demand an opportunity to reply. Mr. McCowen, the chairman, called him to order and assured him that he should hav an opportunity to state objections at the end of my lecture. When the time came, he was accorded the privilege of speaking fifteen minutes to correct me if I was wrong in my statements. Instead of doing this, he demanded an hour and twenty minutes for a reply, and also half the time on the succeeding meeting for debate. Immediately upon his heels the Rev. Mr. Connell, with voice of thunder, declared his purpose to answer me on the points I presented, and dared me to debate. He said I had flung the gauntlet down and he was ready to pick it up. For awhile these two clergymen had it all their own way. When one sat down the other got up, and so on, and if our chairman attempted to speak they glared at him as if he were an intruder, and ordered him to sit down. Although the Infidels paid all the expenses of the lecture, etc., these clergymen seemed to think it was all their own affair and they could run it to suit themselvs. However, I made out to edge in a few words and inform my clerical opponents that I did not come to Ukiah to enter into a general debate, but to giv a series of lectures on important Freethought subjects, and I intended to carry out that plan at the request of my friends and for their instruction and that of the community, but in order to giv them a chance to combat my points, I would giv them every evening one half-hour for criticism; and that was just thirty minutes more than they would allow me at any of their services. So I gave them a half-hour at each succeeding meeting, but they did not avail themselvs of the privilege. In order, however, to bring them to terms, I offered to return to Ukiah on certain dates and enter upon a general debate of the points advanced in my lectures. I flung down the challenge and dared the clergy to take it up and meet my facts and arguments. Well, the Rev. Mr. Connell went out of town and left the Rev. Mr. Martin to make arrangements for debate. So the Rev. Mr. Martin called on me Wednesday afternoon, and wanted to know my terms, etc. I said, "Make your affirmations, and I will meet them." "What affirmations?" he said. I replied, "This, for instance: 'Christianity is of supernatural origin.'" "I won't affirm that," he said; "but just put it the other way, 'Christianity is not of supernatural origin,' and I will meet you." The sly fox—I knew then I was dealing with a theological shark, and I meant to bring him to the book. I answered him: "I shall not undertake to prove a negativ. That is not in logic to do. I will make an affirmativ, and stand by it, or you make an affirmativ and I will meet you."

The Rev. Martin said: "We will not affirm. You hav come here to attack us, and we are ready to meet you." "All right," I said, "if you refuse to affirm, I will affirm." The Rev. Martin assented. He also insisted upon six sessions, one each morning and evening for three days. I also agreed, and said I would hav my affirmations ready that evening. He did not venture to my lecture, but met me afterward. I gave my six affirmations—namely: (1) The Bible sanctions immorality. (2) The New Testament sanctions persecution. (3) Human reason and experience are the only sources of knowledge. (4) Secular morals are superior to Bible morals. (5) Science has done more for civilization than theology. (6) The principles of American political liberty forbid the enactment of any laws for the observance of Sunday as a Sabbath. I had previously asked the Rev. Martin if he was in favor of the Sunday laws, and he had said yes. I told him I wanted a reply the following afternoon. His countenance was glum, and there was a coldness in his voice as he said: "I will let you know." On the following afternoon, Friday, a ponderous committee of three appeared to make answer to my propositions. In order to hav witnesses I had my good friends McCowen and McGlaschan present, for I had lost all faith in the honesty of my opponents. I knew they wanted to put me in a logical box and smoke me. Of course they did not accept my affirmations, so in place of them they gave me two negativ propositions and one affirmation for themselvs—namely: (1) The preponderance of evidence tends to show that there is no God. (2) The preponderance of evidence tends to show there is no future life for man. (3) The Bible is the result of a divine inspiration. They graciously allowed me the privilege of making the first two propositions affirmativ, omitting the word "no," so that they, the clergymen, would hav all the affirmations, thus changing entirely their plan of the previous day, when they would make no affirmation. Of course I refused their propositions, and at the evening meeting exposed their sophistry. I showed that their propositions did not cover a single point of my discussion. I had not affirmed there was no God or no future life, or no inspiration in the Bible. I had only opposed the authority of the Bible, not its inspiration. On the questions of God and immortality I took the Agnostic position, neither affirming nor denying. I had no desire and had not undertaken to convince any one that there was no God and no future life. I had no interest in these questions pro or con. They did not trouble and I would not waste my time in discussing them. I wanted something practical and positiv to talk about—definit points—points that I had put in my lectures. I said, "Gentlemen, meet those six affirmations, as you said you would, or back down."

Again they quibbled, and wanted in my first affirmation to put "The Bible as a whole." I refused the change as begging the whole question. The Bible is not to be taken as a whole. That is the false method of theology. Again, they wanted to change "theology" to "Christian and Jewish religion." I refused. I said, "I hav not declared against religion in my lectures; I hav declared against theology, and to that term I will stick." They utterly refused to accept the last affirmation at all, and after putting their heads together they finally declared they would not debate any of my affirmations. After a full explanation of the matter I left them to the judgment of fair-minded people. My affirmations were stated in plain English. I was ready to defend them, but these boasting clergymen put up their sword, and, without a blow, bit the dust. Their vaunted bravery was hypocritical cowardice. I went on with my lecture after the settlement of this question, and expected, of course, no more disturbance; but mirabile dictu! the worst was to come that has yet happened in my tour, and a significant revealing of what may be. I was explaining the Nine Demands, church taxation, etc., and was reading Remsburg's statistics in regard to the number of criminals belonging to the church, and had just concluded, when a brawny fellow stepped to the front and, in spite of calls to order, went on to speak. He spoke a couple of minutes and denounced me as a fraud and a scoundrel, and said I ought to be voted out of the community, as they ostracized in ancient Greece. Then, without warning, he raised a burning kerosene lamp and hurled it straight at my face with all the force he had. Fortunately he was no better marksman than God was when he hit the Young Men's Christian Association rooms with lightning instead of Ingersoll's law office, and the lamp went by and struck the window and dropped to the ground outside. He immediately seized another lamp, but his arm was grasped. He wrenched it away, and then hurled the blazing weapon in his hand, crying in frenzied tones, "Damn him, kill him!" and rapidly retreated, as the crowd tumbled on to him, to the door, and rushed down the stairs into the street, and for a quarter of a mile went like a whirling volcanic flame. Of course there was indescribable confusion for a moment, and women fainted; but I made up my mind to finish the lecture, and order was restored and I did so; after which a young man, more valorous than any one of the clergymen, made a very creditable plea for Christianity, to which I replied, and then dismissed the audience. Two ministers and two kerosene lamps were about as near having a "hell of a time" as a Secular lecturer could experience. Now, the curious part of the murderous affair is this, that it was not done by a border ruffiian, but by one of the city officials, a lawyer, a college graduate of gentlemanly bearing and smooth address, to whom I had been introduced, and who seemed to hav Liberal sentiments. But he was born and bred a Catholic, and the statistics I read bore hard on the Catholic church, and this, no doubt, excited his ire, and in that one vivid act he showed the inherited outcome of centuries of ecclesiastical teaching. He thought he had a perfect right to kill me, and this he intended to do. In his ungovernable fury he endangered the lives of all present, and half the audience were women. If the lamp had struck the wall instead of the window there would certainly hav been destruction.

In this terrific farce was seen the essentially brutal nature of Christianity. The wild beast was exhibited. That wild beast is all over our country, under many a smooth and cultivated exterior, as in this case, and it is capable of infinit destruction. It will not do for us to be blind to these underlying barbarities of our civilization. This madman for the time being I look upon simply as a victim, and a record of the latent murder that crouches in the chambers of the Christian church.

One thing is to be noted. My friend McGlaschan said to the Rev. Martin, an onlooker of the scene, "This is fearful." The reverend replied nothing. He kept silence. He had not one word of denunciation for the crime committed. Was he in secret sympathy with the onslaught? Was there a lurking gladness in his heart?

All's well that ends well. They didn't scorch me that time. They hang Anarchists who fling dynamite. What will they do with the pious Catholic who uses against the Infidel a weapon equally cruel? I don't think I shall soon forget my campaign in Ukiah. It is the queerest mixture I hav yet experienced. I shall go back again some day, but perhaps I had better wait until they tap the ministers and burn gas, and kerosene lamps go out of fashion.

This is a pretty valley, and productiv. The Russian river hops and wool are famous the world over. Noble cattle range the fertil fields. A railroad is to be built from Cloverdale, and then for enterprise in this delightful land, which is like the Garden of Eden indeed, and a devil of a time I hav had in it. His Snakeship has been spreading himself, and the old Adam has come to the top.

I shall be at Sacramento, Grass Valley, Nevada City, until May 22d, and then if the almighty dollar is willing I shall take a look into Yosemite Valley and drink of nature's wonder, and so be ready for the Oregon campaign. I shall be at Ashland June 5th; at Talent June 12th, and shall make a week's tour in Coos county from June 13th to June 21st. I shall be in Silverton, June 22d, 23d, 24th, and after that in Portland, Corvallis, Astoria, etc., but the dates are not yet fixed, and I shall return Eastward as heretofore noted.

I am finishing these notes in the cosy bachelor quarters of Walter Hughans, where good times always prevail, and where after a hard day's journey, from morning to evening, there is refreshment for the pilgrim adventurer, and he can go on his way with happier spirit and more enthusiastic effort.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

At Walter Hughan's, Oakland, Cal., May 14, 1887.

A Burning Argument for Christ.

A dispatch from Ukiah, Cal., to the San Francisco Chronicle, May 15th, says:

S. P. Putnam, who has been lecturing here on the subject of "Mental Liberty" for several evenings, was interrupted last night by a man of high standing in the community, but who must for the moment hav lost self-control. The lecturer had made a terrible tirade against all Christians, especially of the Catholic faith, and had excited the enmity of the larger part of the community.

During one of his most bitter speeches Mr. Hamilton arose and denounced him, and citing the story of the banished Grecian, said: "And as they threw shells at a bad man, so I now throw this lamp at you."

Suiting the action to the word, he threw a lighted lamp at the speaker's head. The lamp struck the chandelier, broke it, put out the gas, and, missing the head of Mr. Putnam, passed through a window and exploded in the yard below.

Frenzied now with rage, Hamilton grasped another lamp, and, waving it in the air over his head, started to go out. The audience was naturally panic-stricken, and in the general stampede many were bruised and scratched. Ladies fainted and strong men did their best to stop the panic.

Meantime the oil from the lamp in the hands of the excited man flew in every direction, every drop a fire-brand. How a most terrible catastrophe was averted is a wonder. There were a score of ladies whose dresses were more or less burnt, although not sufficient to seriously hurt them.

Putnam finished his advertised course last evening, and left this morning for the city.

Dr. York at Salt Lake.

DEAR EUGENE: You will see by this that I am on the wing Eastward; spoke at Sac City on May 8th to a good audience on "Individuality and What It Costs," and was warmly received by our friends Goodell and many others whom I had not seen since the reception given to D. M. Bennett, some six years since. Brother Putnam will find a warm welcome at Sacramento on next Sunday, from whence he goes North, laden with "The New God," "The New Heaven and Earth," and other treasures of thought in the gospel of Liberalism. We bid him good speed, and commend him to our friends in the North as a power for good.

We spoke to a large audience in the Salt Lake Opera House on Sunday night on "Evolution and the World We Liv In—Man or Monkey—Which?" and will finish our work here next Sunday. Our thanks are due here to H. P. Mason, in whose family my wife and I hav been kindly entertained.

It is now nearly eleven years since I faced an audience in this great city of the Latter-day Saints, and yet many old and cheerful faces appeared in our audience as in days of yore, who hav stood out against this Mormon deviltry for many years, waiting and hoping for the enforcement of civil law against this ecclesiastical despotism; and yet these Mormon "cohabs," as they are called, stand out stoutly against the law, and they are being sent to prison almost every day, when simply to promis reform would save them from it. Such is religious superstition that they would rather rot in prison than to desist from this so-called religious ordinance. But the social aspect of Mormonism is by no means the worst feature of it. They are a disloyal people to the government in which they liv, and, like Romanism, a theocracy and priesthood which outrank in authority all civil law; and as such are a dangerous element in our country. Only think of it, a great city protected by our flag, and yet not a gentile is permitted to take any part in its government, and yet they are taxed to the uttermost to support a government of priests.

How long shall this mental disease prey upon the intellect of the world? Religion, thy name is slavery; and nothing can cure it but commerce, science, and Freethought.

We will be at Canyon City on the 29th, at Denver on June 5th and 12th, at Ottumwa 19th and 26th, and at Chicago on July 3d and 10th, where we hope to meet Brother Stevens and other workers in the field of Freethought.

Friend Eugene, and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will not tax your patience and space with lengthy epistles, but hope to keep you posted from time to time, as we pursue our journey Eastward, that our Liberal friends may help us to help them in the good work of mental freedom. J. L. YORK.

The Liberal Club.

The Liberal Club reporter has just been reading a large, five-dollar book on the subject of astrology, and has studied out his horoscope. Everybody is born under a sign of the zodiac, Gemini or Taurus or Virgo, or otherwise, though they may not know it at the time. The present writer was born during the period when Aries had the floor. Aries is pictured in the almanacs as a benevolent-looking ram, dormant, as though posing for a photograph. His domain is over the intellectual forces. The horoscope reveals that the writer belongs to "that function of the grand body of humanity, the head;" that he is a natural reasoner and thinker, that his brain is activ, and that he is a lover of scientific thought; that he admires elegance, order, beauty, music, and dancing, and has a great deal of the electrical fire. If the proprietors of THE TRUTH SEEKER can be convinced that the horoscope isn't lying, these varied accomplishments ought to answer as a cornerstone on which to base an application for a raise of salary. He regrets to learn, however, that owing to his excessiv mental activity, he is liable to brain disease. While he was teething, says the horoscope, his head should hav been kept cool.

The regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, held Friday evening, May 20th, was distinguished for its great interest. A large audience was present when President Denslow called the meeting to order and the secretary read the minutes of the previous meeting. Mr. Wakeman gave the lecture on "Progress without Poverty." The speaker proved to be a Socialist of a most pronounced type. The means of production, he said, should be placed in the hands of state officers; lawyers, doctors, and teachers should hav a salary from the state, and women and children should be pensioned. The speaker incidentally criticised Henry George's doctrins because they were incapable of codification. He had asked the advocates of those doctrins to draw up a bill embodying them, but had found none able to do so.

In the discussion which followed, Mr. Sutherland got up and challenged Mr. Wakeman to draft any kind of a practical bill which would embody his (Mr. Wakeman's) notions in legislativ form.

Dr. Eccles said in effect that the weaklings and incapables who couldn't take care of themselvs might as well submit to the survival of the fittest.

Captain Clark announced among other things that he would like to see some men besides the Anarchists at Chicago with a rope around their necks dancing on nothing. These remarks were believed to hav reference to Colonel Hinton.

Herr Oppenheimer had evidently stepped out of a bandbox, and everybody complimented his handsome appearance. A neat buttonhole bouquet contrasted well with his studious and intellectual countenance, and seemed to be, as it were, a materialization of his florescent speech. The burden of his remarks was that the man with the badge-pin is a liar, and that the beautiful gold sign—"THE TRUTH SEEKER"—that Mr. Reynolds has just put up over the front doors of this office is misleading. Herr Oppenheimer might hav further continued his interesting observations in the same line if the Chair had not suppressed him so abruptly.

Mr. Boucher thought that the five cents which the audience had to pay for admission ought to entitle them to the privilege of the platform. President Denslow invited Mr. Boucher to join the club and pay a dollar a year, which would relieve him from the extortion of the treasurer at the door.

In closing, Mr. Wakeman accepted the challenge of Brother Sutherland. Concerning Captain Clark, he observed that the remarks of a man who confessed to having commanded a vessel in the slave trade were of small moment as bearing upon human happiness, yet the utterances of Dr. Eccles were even more cruel and heartless.

A debate between the president and ex-president on the subject of Socialism is promised in the near future. Mr. Denslow believes that Socialism is a reversion to primitiv barbarism, while Mr. Wakeman regards it as the higher integration, and by an open discussion it is hoped that the truth of the matter will be brought into prominence.

Salvation According to Reverend Pentecost.

A few of the rich Christians and five of the rich churches of Cleveland, O., brought the Rev. Pentecost from New York to voice dogmatic sectarianism under the name of revival services. Pentecost told them that belief in the resurrection of the body was an important Christian doctrin. Whereupon the Rev. Mr. Hosmer, an advanced minister, told the people it was a belief of the Jews before Jesus, and much more plainly stated in the Maccabees than in the New Testament. Pentecost said: "I hav wives coming to me every day, who say, 'I wish you could get hold of my husband.' 'What's the matter with him?' 'Oh, he's good and kind, but he is not a Christian.' The worst man in town. You are worse than a drunkard. You are worse than a blasphemer [such as THE TRUTH SEEKER—only think of it!]. Young men, don't stumble over drunkards. But they say, 'There is Mr. L.; he is a good man; he don't need Christ, neither do I." Me too.

If this thing keeps growing, there will be no call for men of God like Pentecost at three hundred dollars a week. Any man can see where the shoe pinches.

The irrepressible Hosmer says the Sermon on the Mount says, By their fruits men are to be known—not by their Lord, Lord, and three hundred dollars a week. For a good part of a week Pentecost preached from Mark xvi, 16, old version—"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned." Whereupon Mr. Hosmer let the cat out of the bag to thousands of church-members by referring to the note of the revisers in the revised edition, saying the oldest Greek copies had no such verses. All is omitted from verse 9. The whole yarn about belief and being damned is a forgery, smuggled in by some priest or monk since the councils of Nice and Laodicea, at which the sacred Bible was settled by the votes of the Catholic bishops. Well may the Rev. Dr. Curry tell his ministerial students there are ten thousand old wives' fables in the Bible that will hav to go. It is to be hoped they will go at once. Solomon's Songs should certainly be gone.

The cause of Freethought is helped here by Pentecost. His nonsense is too big. G. F. LEWIS.

The Museums on Sundays.

From the New York World.

The growing prominence and usefulness of the Metropolitan Museum of Art bring into corresponding importance the question of opening it on Sunday. Public land and money are being used to giv the city an institution which it much needs. Private munificence, guided by the desire to benefit the community through contributing to its enjoyment and culture, is adding in a gratifying manner to its valuc. Paintings worth almost a million dollars hav been given to it within the past few months. Acquisitions of various kinds are constantly occurring.

Nothing, unless it were its destruction, could so lessen the value of this institution to those for whose benefit it is intended as keeping it closed on Sunday. If it were determined that the churches should be closed on the particular and only day when their congregations were ordinarily free to attend them it would strike everybody as an absurd arrangement. The same impression prevails now, with the vast majority of the reputable people of this community, with regard to the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Even in Boston, with its direct Puritannical traditions, this view of the situation is apprcciated and acted upon.

The reason that it is not acted upon here is that a few very excellent and well-meaning men who are in the majority of the Board of Trustees of the museum assume the responsibility of making the religious views of a small minority outweigh the great body of respectable public sentiment. With private property they would be entitled to do this. But it may be emphatically denied that they hav the moral right to thus act with what belongs to the community. There will come a public expression in this matter that will be unmistakable. Let us hope that these trustees will recognize the fact that the majority of those even whom they respect pronounce them in the wrong, and that they will exercise the virtue of humility and admit that they themselvs are not necessarily infallible—that they may be trying to stem the tide of civilization and morality.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

I was elected to travel at one time two or three weeks with a Dr. K. He was then a resident of the West, but his nativ state was a slave state. I hav heard of awkward people, but it was never my fortune to meet but one, and that one was Dr. K. All other awkwardness becomes gracefulness when I think of him. He drove his own beast, a creature that well represented his owner. I had no trouble with mobs while under Dr. K.'s escort. Perhaps those "fellows of the baser sort," judging us by our equipments, horse, carriage, and ourselvs, thought we were "hail fellows" in search of a job of their kind, and did not wish to interfere in the matter. I traveled in that vehicle three weeks, and in the many, many times that my driver stepped into his carriage, I do not remember once that he did not step with his entire weight onto me. If by great adroitness I saved my feet by getting them entirely under the seat, down would come his entire weight onto my lap. But he was entirely oblivious to any trouble, always perfectly satisfied with himself and all our accommodations. Let me describe one of the homes to which he took me, a favorit stopping-place of his. We had been driving for several hours, starting early in the morning. A violent rain had come upon us, but it was Saturday, and we had an appointment for the Sunday following. As we came in sight of the house, the doctor said, "That's the place; we shall hav a nice time"—a nice-looking, white cottage, green blinds, a front yard, pretty shrubbery. I began to feel that the long drive in the rain was to be compensated by a good rest in pleasant quarters. As we stopped at the house, a young woman opened the door with a cordial good-morning, and saying, "Come in, you must be very wet."

Now, if only I could use a brush, I could paint you a picture worth looking at, for nudity and rags are not objectionable in a picture, if only Comstock can be kept from seeing it. This woman might hav been thirty years old, but the beauty of youth had not left her face; her skin was clear red and white, liquid gray eyes, teeth like pearls, and her hair so glossy that you might imagin it a mirror; but the dress, or undress! She had evidently been giving a baby its natural nourishment. Her bust was entirely uncovered; her arms, a model for a sculptor, were equally bare with her bust, as the sleeves to her garment hung in shreds. I went into the house. The odor in the house was choking. Two babies were in a long cradle, one perhaps a year old, the other a few weeks. I am more fond of babies than of any other thing, but I could not get up courage to take either of them in my arms, or to accept the attention of two older children, who would hav been glad to be caressed. As the doctor came in from the stable, where he had been attending to his horse, he washed his hands in a hollow stone, and shaking them, looked about for a towel. The lady said her towel was on the grass, as she only washed the day before. The hands were dried at the fire—a large, open fireplace containing a good, bright fire. The lady was well informed. Books and papers were scattered about—all the antislavery papers, quite a treat to me. So I tried to feel comfortable. When our hostess spread her table, she took from off the grass her table cloth, held it to the fire till it ceased dripping, and put it on the table. She made what a Yankee would call flapjack, a kind of waffle, baked on a griddle. The crockery and cutlery of the table would hav been benefited had they been put upon the grass for a night in a powerful rain. But I wasn't hungry, and so had no need of knife or fork. This woman was from Vermont, a teacher. A widower, well-to-do, had married her; seven children had come. No skill as housekeeper—the rest is easily imagined; entirely given up to peopling the world, according to the commands of the Bible.

At a hotel in a town called Tippecanoe, in Ohio, where I arrived in the middle of the day, I was met by the daughter of the house, a nice looking girl, if only she had been comfortably clean. Her feet were bare, and her ankles might hav been washed some time—I would not say they had not—but they were certainly in need of a bath then. I asked her for a room, making no other demand save that the bed should be clean. As I sat down I drew my watch from its hiding-place (I always wore it out of sight), when this young lady, with the greatest astonishment in look and tone, said: "What was that great yellow thing you took out of your bosom?" I had no idea what she meant, but finally learned it was my watch, and that she had never seen one. In the course of the day she brought all her friends whom she could reach to see the wonder. But the room which was announced was as clean as could be—I was obliged to leave the bed and rest in a chair; for though the one sheet, which the girl said was all they ever put on a bed, was clean, there were more living creatures about the bed than I could comfortably sleep with. Such were some of the hotels in the West thirty and forty years ago.

I was in Indiana at the time of a crusade against saloons, where alcohol in its many different stages and under as many different names was sold to whoever applied for it. I think the name of the town was Richmond where the tragedy I am about to record was enacted. The eldest son of a widow, a boy who had just entered his teens, had paid for a drink and then been treated to more by the proprietor and the regular frequenters of the saloon. He drank until he was "dead drunk," and so entirely dead that no effort could call back life.

A young lady, as I remember her, nineteen or twenty years of age planned and was chief actor in the plot. She, with the mother of the dead boy, led a procession of women, armed with hatchets, hammers, etc., entered the place where alcohol was sold, offered to purchase all in their possession, and then proceeded to break everything from bottles to barrels, emptying their contents into the ground. Some of the keepers of these places took pay for their liquors, and promised to quit the business. Others refused, and sued Captain Way, as she was called. I don't remember if any others were prosecuted. The case was tried by a court of men, no mother, wife, or sister in the jury box. The damages were laid at thirty dollars, a light award, the judge said, because of the tobacco, logwood, and other drugs found in the casks that turned the whisky into brandy.

In Illinois, in the northern counties, Spiritualism was again in the way of work. All the places usually opened to lectures were preöccupied by Spiritualists, and heaven in another world was a greater temptation than a free country here and now. Our progress was about the same as in Ohio. Our meetings were often disturbed, though in Chicago we had quite large audiences and no mobs. In Whiteside county, the northwestern county, we were entertained right royally by a man formerly from New York, Jacob Powell, and his good housekeeper, now his wife. He planned our meetings for a month, taking us to them in his own conveyance, and returning us to his hospitable home. I can never forget the little delicate attentions which are so grateful to a woman battered and worn by worse beasts than "St. Paul fought at Ephesus." Not only little attentions, but very large comforts were given us.

LUCY N. COLMAN.

Christ, Richards, and the Devil.

ANOTHER REPLY TO THE Y. M. C. A.

GENTLEMEN: You hav asked, "Why am I not a Christian?" But when I see so many among you and the church who are so bad, it seems to me that first you should reform yourselvs before trying to reform others. Now, I never was treated so mean as I was treated by the Rev. J. E. Richards, who sued me for ten thousand dollars for having said "he doesn't believe the Bible to be the word of God." Now, to be a Christian I am told that I must believe, but I cannot believe, and I will tell you why. According to the fifth chapter of Mark, Christ relieved one man of a great many devils. The account reads: "But when he saw Jesus afar off, he came and worshiped him, and cried with a loud voice, and said, What hav I to do with thee, Jesus, thou son of the most high God? I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not. For he said unto him, Come out of the man, thou unclean spirit. And he asked him, What is thy name? And he answered, saying, My name is Legion, for we are many. And he besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country. Now there was there, nigh unto the mountains, a great herd of swine feeding. And all the devils besought him, saying, Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them. And forthwith Jesus gave them leave. And the unclean spirits went out, and entered into the swine: and the herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea (they were about two thousand), and were choked in the sea."

And according to the account the devils played a devilish mean trick on the pigs, and yet Christ did not make any fuss about it.

Now, if there is a hell, and Christ was God, and he thought it a proper place for a legion of devils, he must hav had the power to send them to the place where they properly belonged. But instead of doing so, he treated them kindly, granted their request, tormented them not, permitted them to hav a little fun with the pigs, stay in the country where they could get a drink of water, keep cool, and hav plenty of fresh air and be comfortable. Now, Christ treated those devils a thousand times better than Richards treated me, and yet he claims to be a Christian. And I would sooner be a first-class devil and fall into the hands of Christ than be an honest unbeliever and fall into the hands of some of the clergy.

But, after all, it may be that Mark's devil story is not true, and I will tell you why. When in court, Richards swore that he doubted the last ten verses of the book of Mark being the word of God. And the admission that possibly one-half of the book is an interpolation is calculated to shake our faith in the whole book. But if Mark tells the truth, I hav too much respect for Christ to believe that he will treat me worse than he would if I were a devil. Mr. Richards's belief may hav been a little shaky on some things, but there was one point on which it could not be shaken. He said that he believed in eternal hell-fire for the wicked.

Richards is a father, so I suppose that he believes in raising children for God, but if he shall conclude that they are so strongly tinctured with unbelief to be fit for heaven, why, then, I suppose that Richards believes that the best that God can do for his children will be to giv them to the devil with instructions to torture them in hell forever. Such a religion as the religion of eternal torture for men and women would disgrace the lowest tribe of savages that ever crawled upon the face of the earth. Now, I would not lay a straw in the way of Mr. Richards's success in any honorable occupation, but, as Ingersoll would say, I would hav him civilize his religion so that when he shall lovingly hug his little child to his breast he will not feel that possibly some day God will clutch its poor soul and hurl it into eternal fire.

I do not believe that Christ, who would not torture a devil, ever inspired Richards to torture me with lawyers for the want of devils, nor do I like to believe that he was inspired by the devil; but yet, after all, if Mark told the truth, and a man once was possessed of a whole legion of devils, I can see no reason why possibly Richards may not hav been possessed of a devil or devils. And if it is true that the devil inspired him to go for my money, he played a devilish mean trick on Richards. For in trying to beat me he beat himself.

Now, commencing at the 16th verse of the 16th chapter of Mark, may be found these words: "He who believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he who believeth not shall he damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall in no wise hurt them." Now, as Richards had sworn that he believed the Bible to be the word of God, and that its promises are good, I wanted to make a test of his faith. So I had in my pocket a dose of poison which I intended to place in a glass of water, and then say to the man, Here is a deadly thing, and if you believe the Bible promis that it shall not hurt you, and will do me the favor to drink it, and if it does not hurt you I will admit that, at least, you believe, and I ought to believe that that Bible promis is good.

But when my attorney read to him the above words, and asked him if he believed them to be God's word and that the promis was good, he would not say yes, but all the while kept saying that he had doubts about their being the words of God. Some of my orthodox friends thought that it was awful for me to want him to drink poison, but I only wished to make a thorough test of his faith, and found that his faith was not strong enough to drink a deadly thing.

Our London Letter.

Now that the "May meetings" hav fairly commenced, it will be seen day by day the enormous amounts of money that hav been squandered during the past twelve months for "religious purposes." Education, and consequent enlightenment, has not yet had any appreciable effect in reducing the incomes of certain of the societies, and in the ordinary course of events it must still be a long time before people see the folly of subscribing so largely to irresponsible bodies who batten on the credulity of their fellow-creatures. Many of the subscribers who giv such large sums for these purposes do so in the hope of appeasing their consciences, knowing how they cheat and lie and grind the face of the poor to acquire their wealth. By apportioning some of their plunder to these societies, they consider they hav squared their deity, who will wink at their rascalities in consequence, and welcome them to paradise when they die. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, while lamenting a decrease in its income of about £2,000, givs its receipts during the past year as close upon £106,000—money completely thrown away. It is positivly shocking to know that so much money is thus applied, when there is such an amount of destitution within a small radius of Exeter Hall; and what can be thought of those who profess that their deity is gratified by knowing such a state of things exists! The reports of these miserable societies are enough to make a thoughtful reader thoroughly disgusted with the majority of his species.

At the annual meeting of the Church of England Young Men's Society it was stated that during the last twenty-five years no less a sum than £81,573,237 had been contributed voluntarily for church purposes, and all the good that has been really done has been to stimulate the printing trade, which is all very well in its way; but how much better would it hav been to hav printed standard works and educational treatises at a cheap rate, than to diffuse low-priced Bibles and lying tracts.

The missionaries will, as usual, be well to the front with their tales of self-denial and self-sacrifice, all for the glory of God and the immortal welfare of their dusky brethren in Christ. The real life of a missionary is not narrated to the admiring audience at Exeter Hall, or the subscriptions would drop to zero immediately. Although some few missionaries may hav done a little for the good of mankind by their scientific observations and reports, the majority of them are nothing but lazy loafers, enjoying themselvs with all the luxuries of life they can secure, and successfully trading with the unfortunate nativs among whom they are living. Why, all the disturbances connected with colonization may be attributed, directly or indirectly, to these "pioneers of civilization," and they hav been the chief cause of scores of petty wars, and the disastrous consequences following in the wake. Many thousands of "poor benighted heathen" hav had only too good cause to curse the sight of a missionary.

It is stated that an anonymous donor has sent the Salvation Army £5,000, to be applied to the funds of the Indian contingent. No doubt this is a very seasonable gift, as Booth's lieutenant will hav to outbid the other religious societies in the East for converts, and in the case of such keen competition for these, prices will naturally go up. It costs more to convert a Hindoo, even if he is a Pariah, than it did a few years ago, though of course the expenses can be reduced if two or three rival sects will arrange to hav the same convert between them, and an amicable arrangement of this sort is preferable to squabbling over the man, as this would tend to expose the workings of the business, and such a catastrophe as this must be avoided at all costs.

In face of the enormous capital so easily found to run religion, it is exceedingly hard work for Freethinkers (who as a body are far from wealthy) to make headway against superstition, and it is really wonderful what progress they hav made during the last few years, considering all the disadvantages they hav had to combat. ## Mrs. Slenker's Work.

It is Sun's Day, and the loveliest of May days, the quiet stillness only broken by singing birds and gentle breezes. The emerald green of the yard, dotted here and there with masses of early flowers—tulips, lilies, roses, peonies, pansies, and others too numerous to mention—is one gay panorama of beauty.

Passers-by, as they seek the temple where they fancy they hold communion with some deity enthroned on high, pause to look over the fence at the floral feast, and carry with them one more bright picture to gladden and bless.

Amid all the sweet beauty around me, my heart is sad and weary, and my eyes ache with unshed tears. Not that I for a moment regret the work I hav done, or deem it aught but the holiest and best of my life's labors, yet I am sad because of the misery, wretchedness, and hopelessness of those near and dear to me—those who tell me they would far sooner hav carried me to the grave than to hav seen me under all this weight of terrible condemnation and obloquy.

"'Twas ever thus from childhood's hour" I hav always been "three centuries in the van."

When wearying of finding a life companion who was free from theological superstitions and the curse of rum and tobacco, I boldly advertised for one in the Water Cure Journal, and out of some sixty who responded, I selected Mr. Slenker and united my fate to his. All my relativs and friends were surprised, amazed, and shocked, and one old neighbor shook his hoary head and said, "Only to think the very best daughter of Thomas Drake should do such a thing as that, throw herself away on an entire stranger." The good old soul never dreamed that one's own nearest neighbors are oftenest most strange to the holiest impulses of one's nature as well as one's highest aspirations.

I am equally surprised. I find far more of a disposition to look leniently on what I hav done cropping out from editorials and personal letters than I had dared to hope for, far more of a disposition to judge me as having done it all from the purest and best of motivs. I don't wonder at all that the mode of working is distasteful to the great majority, and I assure you all much of the correspondence was as disagreeable and repulsiv to me as it could be to any of you.

Does the skilled physician enjoy probing an ulcer or healing a gangrened wound? Yet there is a charm in conquering disease and building renewed health on its foundations. So to me there was a charm in seeking out the moral diseases, and sending words of cheer and reform.

I tell you, friends, there are many who will read these lines who will say to themselvs, "Elmina has been as a kind mother to me and mine, and lifted me up from misery and woe into the realm of peace, love, and joy." Yes, I hav been the confidant of thousands. I hav prevented divorce, saved the lovely maiden from her own wild passions, and inculcated in all, as far as I could, love, respect, and admiration for a pure and high morality.

I think the friend who is "afraid" to mail our editor one of my letters will own up it is, on the whole, a good, well-intentioned expistle, and that there is no word or sentiment in it calculated to make the reader anything but a better or more moral individual.

I am tolerant of all shades of opinion and all phases of character. We are what we are through heredity, environment, and education. I could not be other than I am and be myself.

Language is ambiguous, but I'll wager that of the thousands of letters I hav ever penned, not one can be found that I would not indorse and stand by to-day. True, I hav outgrown some ideas, and changed some opinions for others in consequence of more light being thrown on some questions. But onward and upward has been my motto.

The necessity that compelled this correspondence to be an underground one was the hardest part of it all for me. My frank nature has always led me to openly avow whatever I did, said, or thought. All letters not involving secrets of others I held as public property, if the public desired them. Secret societies, covered-up footprints, dark closets, and sneaking byways I despise. Like the "good gray poet," I plead for the glad, free, open out-of-doors.

Unscrew the locks from the doors!
Unscrew the doors themselvs from their jambs!
Whoever degrades another degrades me.
Whatever is done or said returns at last to me.

Through me forbidden voices,
Voices of sexes and lusts,
Voices veiled, and I remove the veil,
Voices indecent by me clarified and transfigured.

May 30, 1887.

Lo, tears and roses, let them fall—
The day is sacred to the dead,
For South, for North, whose blood was shed;
They died as heroes, one and all.

Above the blue, above the gray
The grass grows green, the snow lay white,
O'er each and all still falls the night,
For each and all we keep this day.

Though 'neath two flags they fought and fell,
Beneath one flag their struggles cease;
They sleep beneath one arch of peace,
Their cause is one, and all is well.

Behold our Union's banner wave!
The North puts forth the olive bough;
Where'er we strew our flowers now
They rest upon a hero's grave.

Lo, tears and roses, let them fall—
This is the Day of All the Dead;
For South, for North, their blood was shed,
They died for freedom, one and all.

The Railroads and the Church.

The New York Times of May 13th contains an item of news from Kingston, N. Y., stating in substance that after solicitation Mr. Chauncey M. Depew on behalf of the West Shore Railroad Company had tendered the Saint John's Episcopal congregation land for the site of a new church near the Union depot in that city; and that the generous action of the railroad was favorably commented upon.

Will that congregation or those commenters explain why the giving away of the property of a railroad by persons intrusted with its management and safe keeping to a particular sect should hav favorable comment? Does this church, in tempting the officials of the railroad to part title with land owned in common by all its shareholders, and consisting of people who subscribe to other creeds and of people who are not the dupes of creeds, claim to be an observer of the Golden Rule?

Railroads privileged with power to take land from owners at whatever price the courts may determin can better perform their duties by acquiring it for legitimate railway purposes than by giving it away at the expense of their own stockholders, or placing it to further superstition and avoid taxation to the injury and expense of humanity in general.

Shakspere and the Christians.

It seems somewhat strange that orthodox church-members should find so much to say against Shakspere, he being the head and front of dramatic representations, when he owes his eminence as a writer to —what they call—the inspired writings. This certainly does not show liberality or charity, qualities upon which they boast.

He makes so many quotations from the Bible (253); his finest passages are merely paraphrases taken from it, some approaching so near as to savor of plagiarism, and if we adopt their criterion, that "to the pure all things are pure," they should not ignore this. Much better, let them publish a new edition of his works, erasing objectionable passages. They should recollect that true reformation is to cut out, prune, cultivate, and build up; not tear down. That Shakspere made ample provisions for this will appear evident to anyone who will examin the text, which proves that he intended this, and it devolves on his opponents to do this. Instead, we find, persons go to Verona and weep over Romeo and Juliet's graves, when there is no such place. They go to Elsinore and do likewise, take tokens, etc., when there is no such place—only a myth. Tourists make long voyages to the Hebrides to see where Macbeth met the witches, when there is no such place. They do not admit that Shakspere portrayed character and presents them to us as types, yet they—many of them—believe Jewish traditions, and Christ himself talks in parables.

"What fools these mortals be!"

What a Canadian Editor Found in the States.

From Secular Thought.

On Monday, the 4th of April, I made my way to Kent, Ohio, where I had been engaged to lecture. This was my first visit to this town, and all the persons whom I met were consequently strangers. But there is a bond of brotherhood arising out of our views, and by a kind of Freemasonary Secularists soon come to know and understand each other. Here I met some very kind-hearted, warm, genial friends, who soon made me feel quite at home, and to realize that I was amongst those whom I might hav known for many years. Large audiences attended my lectures, and my utterances—although of a charecter which many of those present had never heard before—were evidently much appreciated. The newspapers also gave good and somewhat flattering reports. The time has quite gone by when men looked at a Freethinker as a sort of imp of Satan—a monstrosity in the world, to be stared at as a curiosity. A novel circumstance occurred here. A Roman Catholic priest was anxious to hav a set discussion, which I need hardly say is very unusual. That church, as a rule, does not believe in controversy, and hence not only avoids but condemns discussion. Here, however, was an exception; a genuin priest expressed himself as quite willing to meet me in debate. We spent some time together arranging details, and the contest will come off at an early date. It will not be the first Catholic I hav met in polemic warfare, but I look forward to this encounter with a good deal of interest. He would not agree to discuss the Bible, which, considering the views held by the church of Rome as to the authority of the scriptures, I could hardly expect, so we are to take up Agnosticism, Christian Theism, etc.

From Kent I went to New Haven, Conn., mainly to join my wife, who was about to sail for the old country and afterwards to return to this continent with the rest of the members of my family.

Then I traveled to New York, where I spent ten days very pleasantly, meeting many of my old friends, who shook me cordially by the hand and expressed themselvs as much delighted to see me. Foremost amongst these stands Mr. Macdonald of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a warm-hearted, genial man, full of sunshine and no shadow. His society I always enjoy, and this occasion was no exception to the rule.

My next visit was to the Quaker city, where I had been announced to lecture, and here, too, I was greeted by large and appreciativ audiences. Prior to the evening lecture, Mrs. Watts gave a dramatic reading. There is a settled calm and quiet in Philadelphia which contrasts strangely with the noise, hurry, and bustle of New York. In fact, it is curious, especially so to an Englishman, to notice how very unlike each other are the three great Eastern cities of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. Not only were my audiences large, but many of those who attended purchased copies of Secular Thought, and I am in hopes that in the future I shall hav a large circulation for my paper in this city. Freethought is progressing in Philadelphia, but none of the ministers can be induced to discuss. There was, at one time, some talk of a debate with Dr. Sexton, who is very popular here, but as yet nothing has come of it. Whether anything will be done time will show.

After I had finished my engagement in Philadelphia I went again to New York, and spent some time with Colonel Ingersoll and his charming family. The colonel was, as usual, brimful of humor, and running over with the milk of human kindness. He is not lecturing much at present, as his law business occupies all his time. He has been converted to Christianity a good many times, struck dead almost as many, paralyzed far more, but here he was still full of robust health, and as much a Freethinker as ever. A crank from England gave a lecture not long since in a Canadian city, and issued bills announcing with all the effrontery imaginable that he had converted the colonel through telling him of the Israelitish origin of the British speaking people, but the author of "The Mistakes of Moses" seems to hav survived the operation. It is a curious way to convert people to Christianity by proving that they are Jews and must remain so. No, we hav "Moses and the Prophets," the former a blunderer and the latter prophesying falsely, so we shall not heed Hine's "Life from the Dead." Thereby is scripture verified, and he who can't see it should inquire of Dr. Wild. At New York I met Miss Helen H. Gardener, well known as an able authoress, and she expressed herself as greatly pleased with Secular Thought, and at once wrote me an article, a portion of which appears in this number. Our readers will, I am sure, be pleased with her able contribution. Colonel Ingersoll also promised to send me a series of articles which will be looked for with great interest.

I had a brief but good time with friend T. B. Wakeman, who expressed himself highly pleased with Secular Thought, and kindly offered to contribute to its pages.

These engagements over, I returned to Toronto to again assume my editorial duties, and to devote myself with all the energy I possess to making Secular Thought a great success.

My visit to the States was on the whole a very enjoyable one, and I trust it was also profitable to some of those who hav heard a Secular lecture for the first time.

Convicted and Fined.

After many postponements and delays, Charles B. Reynolds has been given a trial for the crime of blasphemy, and New Jersey is happy over her relapse to savagery. On Friday night, the 20th instant, the church-members of Morristown slept sounder than they had before since last fall—with more peaceful consciences and happier hearts, for they had done their duty by their God, and convicted and robbed the heretic. The statute of two hundred years of age in New Jersey, and in the rest of the world dating back to the gorillas of the forests, has been reverently awakened and religiously rehabilitated The law enacted by the baboons of the past has been enforced by twelve jackasses of the present, and the rest of the animals of Morristown grunt their approval.

Thursday, May 19th, in the year of grace 1887, the Court of Common Pleas of Morris county, New Jersey, U. S. A., assembled at half-past nine and waited until eleven o'clock for Colonel Ingersoll and his client. Three judges were upon the bench when the latter arrived—Mr. Francis Child in the center and presiding, with lay judges DeWitt C. Quimby and Charles H. Munson on either hand. Lay judges Munson and Quimby are sensible-looking, level-headed men, but Mr. Childs has the peculiar facial characteristics that denote the tyrant. From his cheeks up his head narrows rapidly; downward it expands enormously, and upon his neck rests a double chin of great volume. His eyes are black and small, and twinkled viciously when he looked at the defendant. His manner upon the bench reminded us of Judge Benedict, and his general make-up of the picture of Lord Howe in the school histories. One rather cruel comment made by a man present was that the bench stood for 101—one on each side and nothing in the middle. The court-room and gallery were crowded to suffocation; all the approaches thereto, and every spot where the proceedings could be even occasionally heard, were utilized by the friends or foes of free speech. The whole town was intensely excited, and many people had come in from the surrounding country. Before Colonel Ingersoll had said anything, probably nine out of ten of the spectators would hav rejoiced piously to see Mr. Reynolds sentenced to the penitentiary; if, when the colonel was stopped by the presiding judge in the afternoon, the verdict could hav been given by the audience they would hav unanimously declared that the suppression of free speech, as attempted by the prosecution, was the most heinous of crimes. As soon as Colonel Ingersoll had forced his way through the crowd and found a seat, Judge Childs cautioned the people to keep quiet, and ordered the clerk to impanel the jury. The defense was allowed six challenges only, and they were necessarily used by Colonel Ingersoll in a very short time, for from the start the judge was plainly against Mr. Reynolds; and no matter how bigoted a talesman confessed himself to be in reponse to the questions of Colonel Ingersoll, the double-chinned cipher in the center of the bench ruled that he was a competent juror. And such men as had been called for jury duty! Ignorant Roman Catholics from the mines, stolid carpenters—with no thought but of their six days of toil and one of worship—superstitious Methodists, and bigoted Presbyterians formed the material selected to try a man for expressing his honest thought concerning the Christian deity. There were little snakes of prejudice, as Colonel Ingersoll put it, lurking in the minds of all of them, but the judge held that that made no difference so long as they thought they could acquit Mr. Reynolds providing the evidence showed that he had not distributed the pamphlets in Morristown! As that was not disputed, it is easily seen what the jury must hav been. When Colonel Ingersoll had exhausted all his challenges, and the jury had been seated, and stood up, and sworn, and counted and recounted with all the pompous formality of ancient rules, the list stood as follows: Jacob Odgen, church-member, denomination not stated; Lewis Boing, no church; Andrew B. Cogan, Roman Catholic; Paul H. Mandeville, no church; George Schuyler, no church; Michael Rourke, Roman Catholic; Eugene Buchanan, Methodist; Leo De Hart, no church; Horace L. Dunham, church-member, denomination not given; Lemuel E. Pierson, ditto; Benjamin Flaharty and John McTiernan, Roman Catholics. There were but two or three of these men with faces indicating any intelligence whatever, and their verdict proved that each one ought to be marked on the forehead, J. J.—Jersey jackass.

When these animals had been secured in the pen, District-Attorney Cutler told them that the crime charged upon Mr. Reynolds was circulating a blasphemous and impious pamphlet. He then called as witness John W. Babbitt, a constable of the court, who was armed with a copy of the pamphlet, which he swore he had religiously preserved locked up in his bookcase ever since it was given to him by Mr. Reynolds in person. Winfield West, bill poster, testified that he too had received a pamphlet, besides which he had warned Mr. Reynolds not to distribute them in Morristown as it interfered with his, the witness's, business. Thomas Cleary, Benj. McLean, Matthew Lowe, Mr. Dutton, George L. Clark, David L. Fox, Charles Thursten, Lewis Armstrong, all received pamphlets from the hand of Mr. Reynolds last October, and the pamphlets they received were copies of the one offered in evidence by the prosecutor, who rested his case when the last witness had stepped down from the chair.

The witnesses used up the time of court till recess. Upon the reopening of court Colonel Ingersoll began the defense. He had no witnesses, for the circulation of the pamphlet was admitted, but began at once his address to the jury. Time and lack of space prevent the publication of the speech this week, but we shall giv it verbatim in our next issue. No summary published in any of the daily papers givs the faintest idea of its beauty and grandeur. All the hot summer afternoon he held the audience spell-bound—not a man moved from his seat; scores were touched to tears, while often times it seemed impossible to prevent the people from breaking into tumultuous applause to express their approval of his sentiments. The lay judges listened intently, and more than once their hands seemed desirous of meeting in approving contact. The gavel of the presiding judge was constantly busy, though when not actually pounding the little square of marble before him he leaned back in his chair, looked out of the window, up at the ceiling—anywhere to find an object to employ his attention that he might not hear the burning sentences flowing from the eloquent lips of the greatest man this century has produced. Colonel Ingersoll spoke low and soft, pleading with the stumps before him for a verdict which should leave the flag unstained, and the pages of New Jersey's history unsoiled by the most infamous of acts, the suppression of free speech. His voice has recovered its strength and tone, and its lowest note was heard in the farthest corner of the court room. The speech was full of imagery, the purest patriotism, the grandest of pleas for liberty, and the most exquisit and touching pictures. He made point after point against the law, following it from the dens and caves of savagery up through the centuries of religious persecution to the present, when, as he said, he had hoped the battle for human rights had been fought and won. Mercilessly he denounced the law, and with flawless logic showed that if Mr. Reynolds had not the right to express his sentiments, then no man on the jury had the right to speak his. He touched every chord of the human heart and had the audience with him in every thought, but if he implanted even the feeblest sentiment of tenderness, of loyalty to principle, of patriotism, or of right into the clods before him in the jury box, the illegal and brutal charge of the judge must hav torn it up by the roots. Among the whole twelve images of humanity there was not one man.

About half past four Judge Childs interrupted Mr. Ingersoll with the announcement that the hour of adjournment had arrived, and after a caution to the jury not to permit discussion of the case in their presence, the court room was cleared. Friday morning at half past nine Colonel Ingersoll resumed his argument, continuing until nearly half past ten o'clock. The morning address was a complete speech in itself. He summed up the points he had made and emphasized the legal grounds upon which he asked for the acquittal of Mr. Reynolds. As he neared the end of his appeal, the judge poised the gavel, ready to suppress the applause which the audience seemed bound to giv the pleader for liberty. The last word had scarcely left the Colonel's lips when the wooden hammer fell, and silence was enforced. District-Attorney Cutler was upon his feet at once, and attracted the attention of the jury. Mr. Cutler is a youngster of some thirty years, pleasant to look upon, but inclined to be a trifle deceptiv in what he promises. He is not a good speaker and shows but little of that deep learning in the law which, as district attorney, he must of course possess. He stated to the jury that the law against blasphemy was on the statute books. With its wisdom or unwisdom they as jurors had nothing to do. Their duty was to say whether the words of Mr. Reynolds as copied in the indictment came within the meaning of the statute. Whether the statute is constitutional or not must make no difference to them; that was for a higher court to determin. They must judge of the facts only. Except by giving a sonorous roll to the words, "Gentlemen of the jury!" and occasionally emphasizing the last word of some other sentence in an equally meaningless manner, Mr. Cutler made no attempt to speak interestingly. What he told the jury ought to hav been in the judge's charge, and he must hav the credit of making no appeal to the evident religious prejudices of the twelve men who were to decide the case. He spoke for ten or fifteen minutes. When he sat down, the presiding judge, Mr. Francis Childs, began his charge.

We hav previously described Mr. Childs, but that description of him was as he appears in calm judicial repose. When he has a religious opponent in his power, he changes his looks. His passions send the blood to his face in a flood, his black eyes twinkle with malice, and he speaks with such enthusiasm as we may imagin Cotton Mather exhibited when he argued for the execution of witches in early colonial times. Displacing one of the lay judges at the end of the bench, that he might be nearer the jury, Judge Childs entered upon his argument. It was evident after the first five minutes that the district-attorney and the judge had "swapped jobs." Mr. Cutler had been cool and comparativly mild. The judge was the opposit. His words were not a judicial charge to a jury, but a heated and very slightly disguised appeal for conviction. He raised his voice in temper, pounded the bench to emphasize his points, and throughout his speech was the advocate for his religion and the prosecutor of him who had brought it into contempt. His zeal betrayed him. Legally expressed, the case at this point was Colonel Ingersoll for the defendant, Judge Childs for the plaintiff; and the plaintiff's attorney made it a matter of personal pride to win. It was not often he got the chance to argue against so distinguished a man as Colonel Ingersoll, and the opportunity must be made the most of. With the superstitious reverence which the average juror feels for the high dignitary upon the bench, he might hav won it in any event; but with the jury he had before him, it was the easiest thing in the world. We quote his speech for the sole reason that it possesses historic interest as showing the worst that can be done by even a New Jersey judge:

"You will notice that the defendant is on trial for libel, and it is called a blasphemous libel, because it denies and contumeliously reproaches the holy name of God; because it contumeliously reproaches Jesus Christ and the holy word of God. Blasphemy consists in the denial of the being, attributes, or nature of, or uttering impious and profane things against, God or the authority of the holy scriptures; but it is only committed by uttering such things in a scoffing and railing manner, out of a reproachful disposition, as it were, in the speaker, rather than with any purpose of propagating his irreverent opinion. If he has merely asserted his disbelief in all the popular notions of Christianity, without attempting by impious and abusiv or blasphemous remarks to wound the feelings of the whole Christian community, he will not hav committed an offense of which the law can take notice.

"You will further observe that the defendant is not on trial for the principles of his religious belief. The laws of this state recognize no standard of faith, nor any established form of worship. There is no offense known to our laws as heresy or nonconformity.

"If you are satisfied from the evidence that the defendant circulated the alleged libel, and that the same is blasphemous, and that the same was written, published, and circulated for the purpose of scoffing at, or railing and bringing into disrepute the Christian religion in that respect, and out of a reproachful disposition in the writer, and calculated and intended to wound the feelings of the Christian community, then the defendant is guilty in manner and form as he stands charged.

"It has been said, gentlemen, that the words contained in this indictment are not blasphemous; that is, that they are not scoffing and railing, that they are not uttered with a reproachful spirit, and that they are not calculated to wound the religious sentiment entertained by a large portion of the community. That is a question for you to judge. You can read them over. You can read them with care, as found in the indictment, and after having read them, then you are to pass that judgment on those words that you think under your oaths, and acting in the discharge of an important duty, they are entitled to.

"But it is said in this case that the law under which this prosecution is maintained is obsolete—that it is dead. The law on this subject is not obsolete or dead. It is to-day the living expression of the will of the people in reference to this particular matter, and you hav no more right to disregard or make this law a dead letter, or refuse to enforce it, than you hav to repeal or abrogate any other law on the statute books protecting citizens in their rights of person or property.

"You, gentlemen, are not possessed, as has been well remarked, with arbitrary powers. You do not hav legislativ functions. It is your duty to pass on existing laws, and as you find them—not to cavil at, not to question, the wisdom or propriety of that enactment. It has been enacted by a power far above you, by a power representing the people, and it is the expression of the will of the people that comes before us here as the law, and it is a mistake that a jury or a member of a jury has a right to do as he pleases. He has not that right. He is bound as a good citizen, he is bound by the oath he has taken, he is bound by his conscience, to administer justice in this case according to the law of the land—not as he wishes it, not as he would hav it, but as he finds it. He is under the law, restrained by the law, protected by the law, directed by the law, as much in the jury room as he is out of it.

"Now, gentlemen, what is the history of this case? And I will say here that there may be an honest difference of opinion, as there undoubtedly is an honest difference of opinion, as to the propriety of this enactment. You may hav your individual views. I may hav my individual views. It may be that I would wish the law different from what it is. You may wish the law more stringent than we find it. So it is with every law. There is not a law on the statute books but what you will find an honest difference of opinion in reference to. As to the law in reference to capital punishment—the punishment visited for the gravest offenses committed against the law—men differ, and differ widely, but can it be held that because a juror differed as to the wisdom of that law that therefore a person arraigned before him on a charge of murder, with evidence proving his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, that that man should be acquitted because a juror doubted the wisdom of the law?

"What is law? We say the law forbids this, or commands that—what do we mean by law? We hav heard the learned advocate for the defendant in this case. With beautiful words, impassioned manner, and with speech so glowing as to send a thrill to every heart, he has pictured the beauties of liberty. But where is the essence of liberty—where is the evidence of it? Is it not in the great power vested in self-government? And where is the evidence of self-government save in the power to enact laws by the people for the government of all the people? And what is law, I ask you? The learned commentator says it is a rule of action prescribed by the supreme power of the state. And where do we find here the supreme power lodged? Where is sovereignty here? It reposes in the people. Then what is law? It is a rule prescribed by the people for the government of the people. It is not the will of a legislature, not the say-so of a body of men who are in power to-day and away to-morrow—that is not law. And so, when we say that there is on the statute books of the state of New Jersey a law that says, 'No man shall commit blasphemy,' that is the same as saying that the power of the people exercising the sovereignty reposed in them has declared that thus is the will of the people of the state of New Jersey.

"What secures freedom of speech? What guarantees to a defendant the right to trial by jury? What givs the processes of court to compel the attendance of witnesses? What is it that prevents the courts from closing the mouth of his counsel? It is the law. And how long, gentlemen—think of it—could freedom of speech exist without law?

"Now, gentlemen, does this law interfere with the freedom of speech? On that question I hav an opinion delivered by probably one of the most eminent students of the Constitution that this country ever saw—a gentleman whose writings are found in every library, whose opinions are quoted almost as gospel; and he, passing on a case exactly similar to this, says: 'The free and equal and undisturbed enjoyment of religious opinion, whatever it may be, and free and decent discussion on any religious subject is guaranteed and secured; but to revile with malicious and blasphemous contempt the religion professed by almost the whole community is an abuse of this right.' And in that same case this law under discussion—and I so charge you—was held to be perfectly constitutional, and that it was no invasion of the rights of the citizen so far as freedom of speech was concerned.

"Now, gentlemen, it is said that this is an obsolete law. This law is found first, so far as we are concerned, back in the colonial days of this state. Almost at the first formation of the state government it was enacted as a law. In 1844 the law was again adopted by the people as the rule of conduct with reference to this particular subject-matter. In 1874—not fourteen years ago—only a little over thirteen years ago—the people of the state of New Jersey represented in the legislature by their representativs, enacted this same law again as the rule of conduct that they prescribed for the government of all the people of this state. There it is.

"And, gentlemen, I desire to call your attention again to this fact, that your duty as jurors is limited solely to passing upon the question of the existence of the law and the question of the violation of the law. With the wisdom of the enactment you hav nothing to do. That power is vested in the people and exercised by them through the legislature. Since this very bill was formed, since this indictment was presented, the people of this state hav assembled through their representativs at the state capital. The doors were open. This case had notoriety. If it was the desire and wish of the people that this law should be stricken from the statute book, there was the proper tribunal to appeal to, and power vested with ample jurisdiction over this matter.

"But it is enough for us to know that it is the law, and being the law, we are bound to enforce it; and if this defendant has been proved to your satisfaction, beyond the reasonable doubt I hav referred to, to hav committed the crime of blasphemy, it is your duty to convict him. If he has not, it is your duty to acquit him. Let him be acquitted, or let him be convicted, because he has either violated, or has not violated, the law. Do not acquit him by violating the law yourself."

When the judge finished, silence fell. Every one was astonished, amazed, stupefied with the plain bias and heat exhibited. The listening lawyers present glanced at each other and winked suspiciously. The spectators sat in open-mouthed wonder. The reporters for the New York dailies, used to court scenes and tyrannical rulings, were taken so far aback by the speech that they forgot to write. "Do not acquit him by violating the law yourselvs!" What could a spineless juryman do after a command like that? The silence was broken by the judge, who commanded the clerk to swear the officers who were to hav charge of the barn doors when the jury went out. Soon the jury chairs were empty, the spectators, lawyers, and judges scattered, subject to call when the jury returned. Opinions were about even on a verdict of acquittal; strong that it would be either acquittal or disagreement; few believed that conviction could follow after Colonel Ingersoll's speech. These good opinions simply proved that the people didn't know the kind of a jury they get up in Morristown. Being used to juries of men, however, this mistake was natural. Besides, the judge had supplied every quality of prejudice the jury lacked, and had driven them into a corner.

The jury retired just before eleven o'clock; just after twelve o'clock they sent word that they had agreed. The court was again in session, and the jury returned in single-file, like a dozen jackasses along a narrow path. Ranged in a row, they elected the foreman to speak for them. Mr. Jacob Ogden looked at the clerk and said, "Guilty!" The judge said, "Gentlemen you are discharged," and the twelve disappeared.

All through the trial Mr. Reynolds bore himself firmly. The anger against him was intense throughout the town, the only resident who spoke civilly to him being the clerk at the Mansion House. This, however, did not seem to cause him any anxiety, and he certainly was not visibly afraid of the court. He looked the jurymen square in the face, and the eyes that were cast down were not behind his spectacles.

When the jury pronounced their verdict, the prosecutor had gone to dinner and could not be found. After waiting for him awhile, the court took a recess to go to dinner, reassembled at one o'clock, but still no prosecutor. Becoming tired, Judge Childs assumed a judicial demeanor, and said sternly, "Charles B. Reynolds, stand up." Mr. Reynolds stood up. "You hav been convicted," continued Mr. Childs, "of circulating blasphemous matter. Inasmuch as the law has for so long been unused, you may reasonably be expected to hav been ignorant of it. And while ignorance of the law excuses no man from its penalties, the court feels bound to take the fact of your ignorance into consideration in passing sentence. The judgment of the court is that you pay a fine of twenty-five dollars, together with the costs of prosecution, and stand committed till paid."

This back-down was not altogether unexpected. When the verdict was rendered, Colonel Ingersoll at once moved for a new trial, but during the hunt for the prosecutor it was found that the two lay judges, Messrs. Quimby and Munson, were opposed to the punishment of heresy, and insisted upon a light fine as the penalty on the conviction secured, and a dismissal of the other indictment. The prosecutor was also willing that the matter be disposed of in that way. With the exception of Childs, the court felt, as a daily paper put it, willing to let up on Mr. Reynolds if Colonel Ingersoll would let up on the court. After his speech on Thursday, the Baptist and Methodist preachers of the place approached Colonel Ingersoll and told him they agreed with "every word he had said." A young lawyer, the son of the Presbyterian parson of the place, said the same. Though the ministers doubtless exaggerated their agreement, there was no doubt that the speech had had a great influence upon public sentiment. The judges knew of this, and when Colonel Ingersoll told them that if they tried Mr. Reynolds upon the other indictment, he would come down and convert the whole town, they thought the joke might hav a serious side. Had Childs been left to himself, he would probably hav imposed the full penalty of the law. But Colonel Ingersoll had softened public sentiment and won over the lay judges, and Mr. Reynolds escaped state prison.

When the bill of costs had been made out by the clerk of the court, with the fine added, Colonel Ingersoll made out his check for the amount—seventy-five dollars—and passed it over, remarking that if they wanted any more to let him know and he would send it to them. It is not likely that he will be called upon for more, however, for when the Morristown Jerseyman gets a chance to foot up a bill against a New York heretic, he is not apt to forget many items of importance. By the time the clerk had pocketed the check Prosecutor Cutler had returned from dinner, and in response to a question from the judge said he desired to enter a nolle prosequi as to the other indictment. The judge granted this, ordered Mr. Reynolds's bondsman, Mr. Edwin Worman, to be exonerated, and dismissed the court.

In the little speech to the "prisoner at the bar" it will be noticed that the judge ate the words he uttered in the charge. Before he had ascertained how the associate judges stood in the matter, Mr. Childs had been hot for conviction. The district attorney also wanted a conviction to the end that his descent might be made easy. The extraordinary lack of intelligence and manhood in the jury, and the extraordinary abundance of prejudice and venom in the judge, who sunk his office in that of the advocate, secured it. They had their way to that point, when they were overruled, and compelled to retreat. When Childs was charging the jury, therefore, the law was a live and breathing statute, the latest expression of the sovereign people, whose will it undoubtedly was that it should be enforced. When he came to sentence the prisoner, the law had become obsolete. It was one of the most rapid cases of dissolution known in the annals of jurisprudence. At a quarter before eleven o'clock, when he charged the jury, and again at a quarter past twelve o'clock, when the verdict was rendered, the law was remarkably healthy, and bade fair to liv another two hundred years. At a quarter past one o'clock it had died of old age, and was buried in the cemetery of the past! Let us hope that Christian hate and prejudice will never again find a Gabriel to resurrect it.

Mr. Reynolds is now free from the toils of New Jersey savagery, and will resume his labors for intellectual liberty. He realizes that he has been very near to prison, and escaped only by the ability of his counsel. Nevertheless, he will again take the field with his tent, if the Liberals want him, and it is not likely that he will again be put in danger.

For his sacrifices and services in this case Colonel Ingersoll will be thanked by every true man and woman in the world. The others will probably mourn that he succeeded in keeping a heretic out of prison.

Letters from Friends.

DODDS, O., May 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to hav you giv me the name of a paper publishing woman's suffrage matters, and the proceedings of progressiv women, in Washington city. I hav heard of such a paper being published there, but do not know what it is called. I hav been taking your paper for several years past, and think it one of the best. I hav heretofore given my mind and time for the freedom of the human family, but as my stay is short what time I hav to stay shall be devoted to freeing women's souls and bodies from slavery.

AARON EVANS.

HAMMONTON, N. J., May 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to commend your designs in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav before this studied in the pages of Punch the steady artistic progress that sheet gave the chance to Leach to illustrate. It is wonderful to consider. Punch began its illustrations with mere lines for human beings, and it came to delight the world with the wit, the purity, and the artistic beauty of its illustrations. Mr. Heston has a greater chance, and it seems that he recognizes it. This last picture of the school teacher is admirable in all its details.

EDWARD HOWLAND.

About 6 o'clock Patrick Clarke, a bartender in William Bennett's saloon, No. 513 Sixth avenue, was found with a party of friends drinking beer on the second floor of No. 102 West Thirty-Second street. He was arrested.—N. Y. World, May 9, 1887.

NEW YORK, May 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a text for a lay sermon. If I believed in a hell, I think that the perpetrators of such a Sunday law ought to be consigned to the hottest corner. As it is, you hav my authority and warrant for condemning them to the hottest and most disagreeable corner of the other place. Their sentence and punishment shall be, Inasmuch as ye hav done this thing unto the people, I condemn ye to read this law daily, and to ponder on its wickedness, its foolishness, and its shortsightedness, and to listen to the revilings which all fair-minded men shall subject ye to, and may the gods hav mercy on your souls. Amen. W. G. O.

ROOKPORT, Mo., May 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I see that some of your subscribers are dissatisfied about your position in regard to the Chicago Anarchists' trial. Now this thing makes me tired. I say those men did not hav a fair trial, and, in the nature of things, could not hav a fair and impartial trial with nine-tenths of the public press and the pressure of public sentiment against them. I suppose some of your growlers will say that the writer of this is an Anarchist, and will want him hanged on general principles. I am not in favor of Anarchy, neither do I indorse the George land theory, but I am opposed to the death penalty, and if the six Anarchists are executed, I shall regard it as but little better than the Bruno or Servetus affair. I hope the croakers will giv us a rest. The way I understand your position is that you are in favor of a fair and impartial trial for any and every man accused of crime—simply this, and nothing more.

Wishing you success, I am as ever with you for right and justice,

G. G. BEOK.

TUCKER HENDERSON'S FUNERAL.

When it became known that Tucker Henderson was dead the county authorities were of the opinion that as he had no relativs he had no friends, and the proper disposition of his body, according to law, would be to send it to the Ann Arbor dissecting rooms. Honest old Tuck's friends, however, objected, and John Galligan and H. H. Boekeloo began to solicit funds with which to giv him a decent burial. The necessary amount was quickly raised, a coffin and hearse procured, and a lot purchased in Riverside cemetery. Mr. Galligan called upon two ministers of the gospel here to say a few words at the grave, but were unsuccessful. The remains were taken to the burial spot yesterday afternoon at 2 o'clock, and A. D. Skinner and Mr. Galligan were the only mourners. In the absence of a minister Mr. Galligan officiated. He said: "Here lies an honest man. He was black, but the color was only skin deep; his heart was big and true; he never told a lie, nor stole a penny, nor wronged a living man."

KALAMAZOO, May 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose clipping from the Gazette of this city to show you what kind of ministers of the gospel we hav out here, and to show to you conclusivly that their aim is not money or honors, but that they labor solely for the benefit of the human race!

The case referred to is one in which an ex-slave, an old negro known to everyone as a happy old fellow, proverbially honest, was refused Christian burial, simply because he was poor and had no relations. The ministers referred to evidently thought "there was nothing in it."

For my part I would rather hav such words as Mr. Galligan uttered, honestly spoken above my grave, than the most elaborate collection of empty words that ever a preacher concocted.

J. D. SOHELL.

COLUMBUS, KAN., May 7, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Never was there a time in the history of the world when all papers and books on the side of truth, justice, and humanity needed mental, moral, legal, and pecuniary aid more than now. After fifty years of warfare, I am no longer able to do much, but for ten years I hav given away my TRUTH SEEKERS and other Liberal papers to those I thought would read them, and I never let them lie in the house or be destroyed, but take a bundle with me, and giv them out here and there to those who will read them. In this way in the last fifteen years in this county, and for many years previous, I hav sown much good seed, which I believe has done much good, and germinated in not a few minds to the dissipation of old errors, the growth of a love of truth and humanity. Many Liberals who take THE TRUTH SEEKER read it, or half read it, privately, and on account of their business interests, patronage, office, popularity, or the opposition of wives, daughters, or friends, lay away their papers out of sight, or let their children, as I hav now and then seen, destroy them. Thus, and various other ways, much of the good subscribers might do, the influence they might exert, the light they might spread, the impressions they might make, and the mental eyes they might open, is lost, and not effected.

Well, I hav tried to do my part in this respect, and I call upon you, O apathetic reader, to go and do likewise, and if all will do so, it will greatly increase our power and our converts. "Let your light so shine before men that they, seeing your good works, may glorify our" religion of humanity and aspirations to a true life.

J. H. COOK.

ANAHEIM, CAL., April 29, 287.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed 25 cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for this year. I am sorry I hav neglected it so long. We had the pleasure of visiting with S. P. Putnam while here. His lecture on "The Glory of Infidelity" I never heard equaled, and sincerely regret that every person in the land was not present. I was trying shortly afterward to describe the logical points in the lecture to a professor of Christianity, and gave the title of the lecture. He rolled up his eyes in dismay, and said' "Infidelity never did any good in the world." He believes what he says, and acts accordingly. But if those that condemn it without hearing Mr. Putnam could be persuaded to read his "New God," it would help them see the absurdities of orthodoxy.

Dr. Higbie's suggestions on burial expenses and associations are admirable. We hav the "Truth Seeker Collection;" that answers a very good purpose. Above all, we need to organize in every place where six or more persons reside; they should meet and devise ways and means to hold meetings. We were sorry that Mr. Putnam's appointments precluded his giving a course of lectures in Anaheim. We need speakers gifted with the ability to instruct and advise the scattered forces—how to unite, financially and socially, to make a success of our gatherings, and to make them attractiv. Liberals as a rule hav enjoyed the freedom from superstition so thoroughly that they hav neglected to watch the influences thrown over their children by the church, and if they find the children don't really believe the dogmas, still they will enjoy the popular gatherings, and neglect the unpopular. Seventeen years ago Presbyterianism was represented in Anaheim by a parson and six hearers; now a church edifice, and, I guess, ninety or over members. Episcopals, Methodists, Evangelicals, Protestants, and Catholics all hav churches and preaching. I hope to liv to see a free hall dedicated to the light-bearer.

MRS. KATE PARKER.

FT. WORTH, TEXAS, May 10, 287.

MR. EDITOR: I seldom see any letters in the grand old TRUTH SEEKER from this place, nor hav I ever met any of the truth seekers of the town, though I would like to, and also join them. In my own way, I am doing what I can for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its cause. I hav got three or four readers who buy it from newsdealers, and hav got a newsdealer here to promis to keep books, etc., published at the TRUTH SEEKER office.

Mr. Heston's picture, "A Visitor from Rome," is good, though rough on the devil. I don't believe the Bible devil is half as bad as the Roman devil. It is too good a joke to keep, as it were, so I just grinned around my friends till I got a chance at them with the picture. Some admire it, and others think they will go to hell for looking at it. We hav a Methodist Bible-pounder here who told his half-crazy followers, "If your house rent is due, if you hav not a dust of flour, in fact, not a morsel of food in the house, your little children ragged and hungry, and only hav one dollar, and Christ should ask for the dollar, giv it to him." This reverend imbecil's name is A. A. Allison. There has been something said about "our Bob" getting to the White House. Well, I can't believe he will make it, but I hope he will try it. I know of several votes he would get here from prominent church men. Though they don't like his views on religion, his temperance talk catches them.

I guess I'll not try to enlighten you on how to run your paper. It suits me, and the only way to suit me better is to get more of them, and as soon as I get able I will send for a lot of pamphlets, etc.; but money is very scarce in this portion of Texas.

Well, as the nativs here say, "You has done gone an' strock my tender p'ints." I am an old Knight of Labor, but hav not visited a lodge for seven or eight months. It doesn't smell right—too much Christ and crown business about it. Show up the crookedness. I am of the same opinion as your paper. I think Powderly has sold out to the Catholic church.

C. E. ILSEN.

YANKTON, DAK., May 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Joseph Cook has come and gone. He was here to deliver a lecture in a regular course paid for by Yanktonians. His subject was, "The Seven Modern Wonders of the World." The sixth wonder was the rapid march of Christianity, and in it the elephantine Joe, as usual, abused everybody who failed to agree with his highness. R. G. Ingersoll seemed to be an object of his most special hate, and he lied about him scandalously. Colonel Ingersoll and the Liberal League he said were obscenists of the most virulent type; so bad, in fact, and so dangerous, that it has been the custom for years in Eastern cities to abandon the habit of printing the names of ladies attending schools and colleges for fear Colonel Ingersoll and the Liberal League would be sending them obscene literature through the mails. Joe's red rag is that awful petition sent to Congress some years ago to abolish the Comstock laws, but Joe didn't know that a goodly portion of his audience were signers of the petition along with your humble servant. Yankton sent 165 names, and is not an obscenist either. Moreover, we think his elephantine highness exhibited very poor judgment to come loaded with nastiness before a Yankton audience and indulge in the tirade he did under pretense of entertaining us. We hired him and paid him a good, round sum to come here and deliver a popular lecture, and of course were very much disgusted with the outcome. Even his orthodox brethren who were present admit that we hav no further use for him. Among other lies, he said that he ran D. M. Bennett out of Bombay by telling the truth about him. I was glad I had Bennett's four "Around the World" volumes and was able to prove to the people that Joe was not only a bigot but a liar of huge proportions. The vulture is not willing even to let the dead rest in their graves, but must drag them forth and mop them with his vile tongue. Freethought journals he first alludes to as sheets, then recalls it and dubs them napkins, and finally rags. An acute observer is our Joe. Instance the following: "The slight ripple on the page of theological literature caused by Channing, Parker, and Emerson has already been quite obliterated by the ascendency of orthodox Christianity, and the work of their lives was labor lost." As the man can scarcely be considered a fool, I am constrained to pronounce him a knave.

D. P. WILLOOX.

ITHAOA, N. Y., May 14, 1887.

TO E. M. MAODONALD: In the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, May 14, 1887, I find your criticism on the mentality of Christ, or identity of Jesus, and I hav this to say, that the reason you hav doubts as to where Christ could be found is because you hav not yet arisen from the animal to the intellectual, but are blinded by sensationalism. It has been your continual study how not to see the principle, and from whence the man Christ Jesus originated; and still you unceasingly proclaim, Humanity, humanity! None so blind as those who won't see. You say he has vanished before the rays of positiv knowledge. Believe me, they are the rays of moonshine (the animal of nature). The word Jesus was in the beginning the positiv and negativ embodiment of nature's masculin and feminin form in great variety, transferred (so to speak) from vegetation to animal as per observation. Thus the animal takes form from material through vegetation, and the Jesus appears a perfect animal man. Thus we hav the embodiment form of man. Thus he is in the image and likeness of male and female nature, made of a woman (feminin), made under the law (masculin), that he (we) may hav knowledge to redeem them who are under the law (or masculin rule). In nature male and female are one in dual form, to represent the positiv and negativ of all the fundamental principles of nature. Hence in this form the animal man Jesus must taste death for all, as in Adam the one man Jesus (the representativ editor TRUTH SEEKER), who is the high priest of execution before whom the last lingering doubts are dispelled. Thus he giveth up the ghost, the dead for the living.

Jesus has no personality except the whole people; this Jesus must die mentally to heal our education, by the knowledge of a distinction from the feminin tree of good and evil. There is none good but one; that is positiv and negativ nature. Good is from the masculin tree of life, while evil is from the feminin imagination or the negativ of good. To know thyself is to hav all possible knowledge. Thus Christ dwelleth in you, that is to say, the resurrection of the dead Jesus brings Christ, the tree of life (humanity), to our knowledge, and then it is the distinction between good and evil is abolished, and we behold the perfection of masculin and feminin nature (the man Christ Jesus) our humanity. Names are naught without principle.

ZENAS KENT.

[Mr. Kent has made it all very clear. We are indebted to him.—ED. T. S.]

RAPID CITY, DAK., April 6, 287.

MR. EDITOR: In your copy of Nov. 20, 1886, I find an article by C. D. Wallace entitled, "Earthquakes and Volcanoes," which contains some rather startling scientific deductions. He writes as though it were an established fact that volcanic eruptions and earthquakes were synonymous terms. He says, "I think they will agree with me that the causes of earthquakes are not from the elements above the earth, or the slipping of the land beneath, . . . but that it is, as we learn from a study of geology, caused by the pent-up vapors and gases from the interior of the earth."

This would perhaps apply to volcanic eruptions and their attendant local earthquakes. But to say that all earthquakes are caused thus is putting it rather strong. Were this true, earthquakes would always be attended by a discharge of gases, etc., as in volcanic eruptions.

On the contrary, a great many of the most destructiv earthquakes are attended by no eruption whatever. In this this respect, however, friend Wallace has fallen into a very common error, caused, no doubt, by the fact that earthquakes are most common in the neighborhood of volcanoes. The connection, however, is only apparent. Volcanic eruptions caused by the vapors, etc., are found most frequently along the zones of fracture, marked by its attendant mountain-chains and the coast line. The disarrangement of the strata here favors the percolation of water through fissures, until it reaches such a depth that the internal heat is sufficient to change it into vapor. Earthquakes we must consider as two classes—those attending volcanic action, and caused, as Brother Wallace says, by gases and vapors forcing an escape, and those unattended by such eruptions. The cause of this latter class is by no means clear. One theory advanced, and perhaps the most plausible one, is that such quakes are but a continuation of the operation that upheaved the mountain-chains and sank the ocean beds. As the earth gradually cools and contracts, the hardened shell on the outside becomes too large and a collapse is the result. This occurs at the weakest point, which would bring this class of quakes into the same belt of volcanoes, but from a different cause. Again, many of the volcanic eruptions are attended by no shock, notably those of the Sandwich Islands, the flow of lava being remarkably quiet.

However far astray in science, Brother Wallace gets home when he tackles the subject from a theological standpoint. The moral to his fable can cover a multitude of sins (mistakes). W. H. PETREE.

PITT, O., May 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Though a Liberal, a Freethinker, and Agnostic, I am a truth seeker. Hence I am not—like the average Christian—contented with ex parte evidence in support of my own views, and actually afraid of all witnesses said to hav facts upon the other side.

I am in the habit of going wherever truth is promised, with charity for all, and malice toward none. Accordingly, a few Sundays since, I attended one of our orthodox Christian Sunday-schools, in quest of light, and was not only invited, but actually rather pressed into the young (and middle-aged) men's Bible class. The regular teacher being absent, his duty devolved upon the next in rank. During our drill upon one of those machine-made lessons, got up with stereotyped golden texts, questions, answers, etc., to prevent the possibility of anyone's stepping off the tan-bark cider-mill track of orthodoxy, as understood at headquarters, on to the fresh verdant grass of inquiry and Freethought, this teacher requested "some one of the class" to turn to "xiii, 27th, Jericho," and read according to the references. Several accordingly commenced hunting. Some looked bewildered and hesitated, while one doubting but bold Thomas mildly and humbly suggested that there must be a mistake, as he did not think there was a book of Jericho in the Bible. To this the teacher replied, "Yes, there must be, for it says 'Jer.,' and that stands for Jericho." But finally (like the flat, four-cornered-world philosophers of old, after Magellan had sailed around it) this teacher had to giv it up, with nothing to fall back upon but the absurdity, as he said, of making "Jer." stand for anything but Jericho.

Before closing his instruction in this memorable lesson, this teacher embraced the opportunity of suggesting that it must be evident, "at least to every intelligent, thinking mind, that the scriptures are inspired, since, as they were written by so many different authors without conference, without inspiration, there could not possibly be such wonderful, beautiful, and uniform harmony between them." And I was obliged to go home profoundly impressed with the idea that a man who had stood by his friend Jericho with such tenacity as he was highly competent to prove the inspiration of the scriptures by giving his voucher concerning the wonderful, beautiful, and uniform harmony thereof and therein, and that chiefly of such (as this teacher) appears to be the kingdom of heaven. CYRUS SEARS.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., May 1, 287.

MR. EDITOR: "Know thyself" and you will know a good majority, at least, of your class. Now I know how it is with myself; nearly every Liberal paper I receive has two or more good articles, and I think, "Now I will preserve that paper and review it at some future time," but that is the last of it. I keep on receiving more just as good and never hav the desire or time to review the other, and, first thing I know, the children hav torn it up; and so goes one after another, until, when I go to collect them up, to giv away to do missionary work, there are very few to be found.

"Necessity [and adversity] is the mother of invention." It behooves us to be stirring when the clergy can excite the prejudices of their adherents so they are barely on speaking terms with their Infidel neighbors, and if we attempt to hav a lecture close all public buildings against us. At New Cambria there is no public place to hold meetings except Williams Hall, and it is not a very inviting place for ladies; so I waited on the school board. J. M. Brubaker, one of them, very exultingly told me I could hav the use of it one night for five dollars, and so we were compelled to take what was then Williams Hall. I would suggest right here, to Liberals especially, where there are no other places of holding public meetings, to attend the school elections and see to it that there are persons elected directors that would giv permission to the Infidel as quick as the Christian to hold meetings in the school-house, and recollect that one or two votes will change almost any school election. And while I am about it I will relate another little circumstance. We had a literary at the New Cambria school-house this last winter, and, of course, Mrs. Abbott and I got in a good many Liberal ideas, and the school board sent in a written order that, if such and such was allowed, they would close the building, and we were put on the program for the next evening and then voted off; so you see how much fairness there is when the church has it all its own way.

After we had procured the hall they threw every obstacle in the way possible, and to cap the climax they held a conference at the church the same night we held the lecture. Now, what right hav they to interfere with our meetings, or with the getting up of them, any more than they hav to interrupt them after they are gotten up? But they generally do both, one as already stated, and the other by seating themselvs for a few moments and then getting up and leaving, and thereby trying to disconcert the speaker and diverting the attention of the audience from him. Is that the way they do at church? Is that doing unto others as they would like to be done by? Is that showing any of the well-bred manners every Christian claims to possess so much of? Did you ever know a Christian to act mannerly toward an opponent to his religion, and ought they not to, when we pay indirectly on an average four dollars a year to help maintain their institutions, in the way of church property being exempted from taxation? Every Liberal knows by experience, just so long as you will be imposed upon by an individual just so long you will hav to be, and it is just so with a nation. So I say, brother Liberals, stand on your manhood and your dignity and do not allow them to muzzle you along with the worldly people, as they are pleased to call the non-church-members, as a good many of you do.

I presume my experience is about the same as that of every activ worker for the cause, and is it not time for us to make a firm resolve to "spread the light?" And what is more, the times are ripe for the effort. Then, I say, instead of lay ing your papers away for review and thereby allowing them to get torn up, giv them out. You hav had the benefit of them, and they will help the cause and the publishers. Think of it; how much good you might do the publishers by introducing them in this way. I presume they send out hundreds of dollars' worth of sample copies in a year. You might save them a great amount of this expense. I would like to take all the Liberal papers, but am only able to take one, unless I could liv on the diet of the fabled Nebuchadnezzar. I hav plenty of wild grass, but not much else.

I make a firm resolve from this henceforth to giv out all back numbers of the paper I am subscribing for and all sample copies sent me, so that any person wishing to subscribe can suit his own taste. What other effect would this hav? Why, when we advertised our lectures, instead of the dominie being able to take advantage of the advertisment to arouse the prejudices of the church people, he would not only fail, but they would attend and no doubt a good many of them would help defray the expenses of our meetings, and the dominie in his anguish of soul would be obliged to exclaim, "My God, my god, why hast thou forsaken me?"

LOS ANGELES, CAL., May 9, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose herewith an interview with David Christie on the Topolobampo question which I hav no doubt will be of interest to your readers, quite a number of whom hav written me for information on the subject; and the inclosed so fully corroborates my former statements that it will hav a tendency, at least, to set on the inquiry those who may hav thought of going there. In treating this question, I hav no desire to injure any one, or the cause itself, but simply to giv the exact facts as I know them. Parties who hav put all their money into the enterprise, or who expect to make large profits off the misery of others, will, no doubt, defend the scheme, as, for instance, those who returned from Mexico with Owen for the avowed purpose of contradicting statements made by myself and others who left that abode of wretchedness at the same time. I want to state here that the name of the boy who was thrown to the sharks after his death by small-pox was Frank Bolin. His body was put in the bay by Dr. Glenn and Chas. E. Chase, which was done by the order of Dr. E. J. Schellhous, who informed me that he did it by Owens's order. If any of your readers hav watched this discussion in the press and the Credit Foncier they will hav noticed that those upholding the fraud hav replied to statements of fact by personal abuse, always the weapon used by those who know they are wrong. You, Mr. Editor, in dealing with Christians, hav found this statement true. Truly yours, L. H. HAWKINS.

From the San Francisco Chronicle.

Among the passengers on the last Panama mail steamer, which arrived a week ago, was David Christie, who boarded her at Mazatlan. He is a middle-aged man, who went down with other colonists from Denver, Col., to Topolobampo, arriving there on November 27th last. When interviewed yesterday with respect to the condition of affairs at the colony, he told a plain, straightforward story, from which it appears that the previous reports of the hapless and hopeless condition of the colonists hav not been exaggerated. He said he would be very glad if anything he might say would serve as a warning to people not to be imposed upon by the representations of one Dr. Schellhous, who left the colony with President Owen on April 5th (two days before he did), for Guaymas—Owen going east and Schellhous coming here to float a quantity of the worthless $100 Credit Foncier bonds. About thirty of the colonists left on the same little sloop for Guaymas, most of them able-bodied men, who were leaving in disgust and utter hopelessness of any improvement in the condition of affairs there.

Owen, he said, had returned to the colony on the last of February, having been telegraphed for by the company's surveyor on account of the disturbances and dissatisfaction arising from the favoritism shown in the distribution of rations. He brought no money with him, as he had promised, excusing himself on the ground that he was obliged to come back prematurely on account of the disturbances. The colonists were not really starving, as there was plenty of flour and meal for their mush. They had fish now and then, but, as for lobsters and oysters, said to be plentiful there, he had seen nothing of them, and did not believe there were any. Many of the colonists were anxious to get away, but were not so fortunate as himself in having the means to pay passage-money. One carpenter was so anxious to leave that he offered to sell his chest of tools, worth $300, for $70, but found no purchaser.

The rainy season will come on in two months, and matters will then be worse. From indications which Christie saw, the water sometimes rose during the rainy season four feet above the level of the road that had been constructed around the base of the mountain. The country was very flat. No work whatever had been done on the irrigation ditch proposed, and not more than could be done by twenty men in two days on the projected railroad. He had refused to work any more, because he saw that the whole thing was a humbug. He had expressed his views freely, and Owen had undertaken on that account to make him leave the colony within twenty-four hours. Owen had gone so far as to draw up an order that not more than two persons should meet together in the camp to talk over colony matters; but seeing that the order could never be enforced, he had withdrawn it immediately after it was read. One serious cause of dissatisfaction was a deficiency of some $2,000 in the accounts of Directors Peet and Pratt, who came from Denver. It was money paid in by the colonists and said to be expended, but no account was rendered.

Eaton and Hawkins, directors from the Eastern States, left the colony in February, in disgust. Hawkins was attorney for the company. A month after they were gone, they were expelled, together with one Turner, on various frivolous charges, such as smoking in camp, drinking mescal with the Mexicans, etc. Men smoked in self-defense to keep off the black gnats, which sometimes threatened to devour one alive. The first election held there was in March, for three directors to replace those expelled. It was matter of common remark that Owen carried the ballot-box in his breeches pocket and fixed the votes to suit himself. Nothing had been seen of the grist-mill which was said to hav been bought with the Credit Foncier money. Owen urged all the colonists to remain at least six months longer and see how they could stand the climate. He promised by that time to secure money to prosecute the railroad work, in which there were two mountains to be tunneled. They had but two years allowed them from last October to complete the railroad. If not finished, then all the work done would be lost. The first instalment of the $2,000 to be paid Haskell for the three hundred acres located about three miles from the irrigation pump was due April 25th. If not paid then—and it could not be, as they had no money—Haskell could claim it back.

The entire outlook, Mr. Christie concluded, was discouraging in the extreme.

CLEOPATRA, MO., May 2, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am sixty years old, and I feel that I hav been swindled out of my time in this world by the intellectual slavery exercised over the mind by the church, coupled with political authority. Will you please giv me space in your columns to present to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER such facts as I may from time to time glean from court records and history? Take for instance the Quakers of New England. Now, if there ever was a denomination entitled to be tolerated, it was this. Their errors, above those of all other sects, were purely errors of the mind, exclusivly matters between themselvs and their God. In all the relations of life, their demeanor was that of meekness, simplicity, integrity, and peace. They appeared with none of that evangelical pugnacity with which Presbyterianism fought its way into places of power, and overthrew old tyrannies to establish young tyrannies in their stead; and yet the stripes which persecution had inflicted on the Puritans were scarcely healed when they themselvs began to wield the lash against the inoffensiv Quakers. "These detestable scenes of more than savage barbarity," says a writer, "began in the month of July, 1656. Mary Fisher and Ann Austin having arrived in the road before Boston, the deputy-governor, Bellingham, had them brought on shore and committed to prison as Quakers. They were stripped naked under pretense of knowing whether they were witches, and in this search," says Sewel, "they were so barbarously misused that modesty forbids to mention it. After about five weeks' imprisonment they were sent back to old England, their beds and Bibles being taken by the jailer for his fees."

Scarce a month after, eight others of those called Quakers came. They were locked up in the same manner as the former, and after about eleven weeks' stay they were sent back. John Endicot bid them, "Take heed that ye break not our ecclesiastical laws, for then ye are sure to stretch by the halter." Then a law was made to prohibit all masters of ships from bringing any Quakers into that jurisdiction. Nicholas Upsal, a member of the church and a man of unblamable character, for speaking against such proceedings was fined twenty-three pounds, and imprisoned also for not coming to church. Next they banished him out of their jurisdiction, and though a weakly old man, yet he was forced to depart in the winter. Nicholas afterward met with an Indian prince, who, having understood how he had been used, offered to make him a warm house, and further said, "What a God hav the English who deal so with one another about their God!"

The following year, 1657, Anne Burden and Mary Dyer were imprisoned at Boston; and Mary Clark, for warning these persecutors to desist from their iniquity, was unmercifully rewarded with twenty stripes of a three-corded whip on her naked back, and detained in prison about three months in the winter season. The cords of the whip were commonly as thick as a man's little finger, each having some knots at the end.

Christopher Holder and John Copeland were whipped at Boston the same year, each thirty stripes with a knotted whip of three cords, the hangman measuring his ground and fetching the strokes with all the force he could, which so cruelly cut their flesh that a woman seeing it fell down for dead. Then they were locked up in prison, and kept three days without food, or so much as a drink of water, and detained in prison for nine weeks, in cold winter season, without fire, bed, or straw.

Lawrence and Cassandra Southick, and their son Josiah, being carried to Boston, were all of them, notwithstanding the old age of the two, sent to the House of Correction, and whipped with cords as those before, in the coldest season of the year, and had taken from them to the value of four pounds ten shillings for not coming to church.

In the year 1658, a law was made which, besides imposing heavy penalties and imprisonments, extended to working in the House of Correction, severe whipping, cutting off ears, and boring through their tongues with a red-hot iron, whether male or female, and such like inhuman barbarities.

The same year, William Brend and William Leddra came to Newburg; thence they were carried to Boston, to the House of Correction, to work there, but they, unwilling to submit thereto, were kept five days without any food, and then beaten twenty strokes with a three-corded whip. Next they were put into irons, neck and heels so close together that there was no more room left between them than for the lock that fastened them, and kept in that situation sixteen hours, and then brought to the mill to work. But Brend, refusing, was beaten by the inhuman jailor with a pitched rope more than one hundred strokes, till his flesh was bruised into a jelly, his body turned cold, and for some time he had neither seeing, feeling, nor hearing. The parson, John Norton, was heard to say: "William Brend endeavored to beat our gospel ordinances black and blue; if, then, he be beaten black and blue, it is but just upon him, and I will appear in behalf of him that did so."

Now, in conclusion for this time, let me say there are a few descendants of such old ferocious Presbyterians in this country. Prominent among them is the postmaster at Cleopatra. His zeal is equal to his duplicity. J. W. DAY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Other Side.

"The words are good," I said, "I cannot doubt,'
I took my scissors then to cut them out;
But Mary seized my hand, "Take care," she cried,
"There is a picture on the other side."

I fell to musing. We are too intent
On gaining that to which our minds are bent;
We choose, then fling the fragments far and wide,
But spoil the picture on the other side!

A prize is offered; others seek it, too,
But on we press with only self in view.
We gain our point, and pause well satisfied,
But ah! the picture on the other side!

On this, a sound of revelry we hear;
On that, a wail of mourning strikes the ear;
On this, a carriage stands with groom and bride,
A hearse is waiting on the other side!

We call it trash—we tread it roughly down,
The thing which others might hav deemed a crown;
An infant's eyes, anointed, see the gold,
Where we, world-blinded, only brass behold.

We pluck a weed and fling it to the breeze,
A flower of fairest hue another sees.
We strike a chord with careless smile and jest,
And break a heart-string in another's breast.

Tread soft and softer still as on you go,
With eyes washed clean in love's anointing glow;
Life's page well finished, turn it, satisfied,
And lo! bright pictures on the other side.

Lilla's Angel.

Petted, loved, admired little Lilla, the only daughter of wealthy and indulgent parents, it seemed as if her life was shrined in happiness and love. Not a wish had she that was ungratified, and life to her was very sweet and beautiful. She had a surfeit of all the good things of life, and took them as if by right, unthinking and uncaring whether others had anything or not. She loved the beautiful, and disliked the unsightly and unlovely. You should hav seen her play-room, hung with the brightest and most charming pictures of childhood scenes, and filled with all kinds of toys, dolls, little story-books, and all manner of quaint curiosities.

One summer afternoon Lilla lay swinging in her hammock in a little grove of pines belonging to her father's many broad acres. Her best dolly and several pretty playthings were lying all around her. The robins were singing bits of songs in the branches overhead, and in the distance an oriole caroled his own sweet melodies, while the soft, south wind played and danced out and in among the dark green pines, whose long arms swung lightly about like so many gauntleted hands full of feathery plumes.

Perhaps Lilla did not fully appreciate all this loveliness, but she drank in the sweetness of nature about her to quite an extent for a girl of nine years.

"It is very beautiful here," she said. "I do not believe it is any lovelier up above the clouds, or wherever it is that the angels liv. I don't think even that angels are fixed any more comfortably than I am, either. But I wish I could just see an angel once in my life. I wonder what it would look like!"

Just then she espied a little barefoot beggar girl gazing wistfully at her through the fence. Her garments were tattered and outgrown, but her eyes were bright and handsome, although the expression in them was full of sadness, and her whole appearance indicated that want and misery to which Lilla was a stranger.

"Oh, I wish you'd go away!" exclaimed Lilla, pouting. "I can't bear to see you stand there gaping at me. Go along, girl, go right along; you make me sick with your old ragged dress, and your bare legs and feet. If you want anything to eat, go to the house and Ellen will giv you a piece of bread. I was just thinking about angels, and you must come right up and annoy me. Go on, stupid, quickly. O dear, dear!" and the petted child of fortune turned away her face and shut her eyes that she might not look upon the unsightly picture.

The little pinched face of the beggar girl grew whiter, and the glistening tears filled up her eyes as she reluctantly moved on a few paces. She was mentally contrasting situations, and wondering why her lot in life was so different.

Lilla, observing that the beggar child had proceeded on her way, fell asleep, and, sleeping, dreamed a dream.

She thought she was in a beautiful garden where there were many blooming flowers of varied hues and sweetest fragrance. A beautiful light, like the glow of a sunrise in summer, was upon all around, and an air of peace, love, and harmony pervaded the place. Not far away she saw, in her dream, a large company of lovely children, and their faces shone with light and beauty. Their clothing was soft, light, and fleecy, like the clouds in the splendor of June. Merrily they skipped and played, while some sang songs sweeter and more melodious than the thrilling notes of warbling birds.

Presently she saw, not far away, one who could not join that company of lovely beings because of her tattered, miserable appearance and her disagreeable manners.

"It must be that horrid beggar girl that I saw peeping through the picket fence," she said to herself. "Yes, that must be the very one, poking herself in here. I should think she would know better, with such rags and such a wretched shawl on her head. Stupid little beggar!"

A lovely lady, who might hav been a teacher in the group, now approached Lilla and said:

"Come nearer, little Lilla, and let me show you the face of the 'stupid little beggar.' Come!"

Closer and closer Lilla stepped to the little girl in tattered garments until she stood face to face with her. What was her consternation and dismay to behold, not the features of the beggar whom she had seen looking through the fence, but instead she saw her own face, disfigured by a frown, her lips drawn and discolored by snarling words and cruel epithets.

"Who is it?" inquired the lady in the softest, sweetest tone.

"It looks like—like—like"—and poor Lilla began to cry softly.

"It is the one you think, Lilla, it is yourself. But let us turn from this unfortunate face to a brighter, fairer one."

Gently she turned Lilla about till she faced the company of bright and beautiful beings again, and, in the center, like some creation of an artist brain, whose every thought was molded to purity and truth, there stood the loveliest vision her eyes had ever looked upon—the fair, sweet face of the little beggar girl, whose appearance at the fence had disturbed her so. Clothed in radiant garments, faultless, glorious, lovely as the dawn, she seemed to Lilla more beautiful than all the others.

Said the lady, kindly, "Lilla, this little one, has noble traits of character which you will do well to imitate. While she wore coarse and ragged raiment outwardly, you, Lilla, wear rags and tatters inwardly. None but the pure and unselfish, the loving, gentle, thoughtful ones, may enter this company. Here must you stand outside, until you become as true and pure as she, yourself a beggar at the gate, until, kind, gentle, unassuming, you seek to help others, and learn the fact that it is not always those who hav all that wealth can giv who are the most fortunate."

In this way she talked a long while to Lilla, who gradually began to see that, while she loved the beautiful, and was well satisfied with her own condition, this was not the whole of life, nor all that could make happiness and contentment. She must let her heart go beyond herself and her surroundings—she must bless others, if she would be blessed herself.

While Lilla lay sleeping and dreaming, the little beggar girl, haunted by the picture of the child in the hammock, and unmindful of the cruel words spoken to her, retraced her steps, that she might catch one more glance at the pleasant picture—that she might look once more upon the girl whose lot had been cast in such fortunate circumstances.

As she gazed again between the pickets, her heart almost stopped beating, for, with terror, she saw, coiled among the dried pine needles, very near the hammock, a serpent with head erect, and looking at the sleeping Lilla.

Brave little Corinne!—for that was the name of the beggar girl—in that moment her courage did not fail her. Seizing a large stone, she ran quickly in at the open gate, and, in another instant, she threw the stone, with all her force, upon the snake and crushed it; then, with a large stick, she beat it till it died.

Lilla awoke, terrified at the sight of the serpent so close to her.

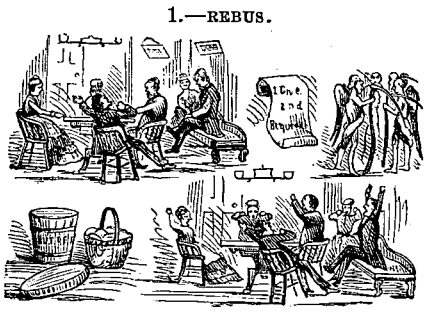
"Did you kill it?" she inquired of Corinne.

"Yes. It was looking right at you, oh, so wickedly! and I was afraid it would hurt you," and Corinne shivered.

Her face shone just as it did in Lilla's dream. "I think," said Lilla, "you are my good angel. You must come home with me, and tell my papa and mamma what you hav done. What a good disposition you must hav! I wish you would forgiv me for being so cross to you."

"I did not lay it up against you, for I know your way of life is different from mine. You did look so nice and cool in your hammock that I had to turn back to look at you again."

"I am so glad you did, for when my doll fell out of the hammock I suppose it disturbed the snake, and had it not been for you the dreadful reptil might hav killed me."



It finally came about that Corinne became an inmate of Lilla's home, and was, after a time, adopted by Lilla's parents, her own parents being dead. It was some time before Lilla told her dream, but Corinne said she did not think she was so good as the dream said, but she would try to be.

"I think you are," said Lilla, "and you will always seem to me just like an angel. Anyway, I shall always call you my good angel."

And so she did, and also she tried to imitate her goodness. S. H. W.

First, a metal stamped for money,
Sometimes with devices funny.
Here is one, a sort of sea-gull,
Cross between a goose and eagle,
Kind of dove or holy pigeon;
With a motto on religion—
"IN GOD WE TRUST," and much I wonder
If 'twas meant, or was a blunder.
"We," that means the "upper tens," sir,
"We" can't trust our fellow-men, sir!
"In GOD we trust," but you poor trash, sir,
Why, you will hav to pay the cash, sir!
How the Atheist's doubts must dwindle
Into faith at such a swindle!
Once an Atheist took a hammer
And he gave "G—d" a "rammer,"
Just as God the "ah" deleted
When he Ab'ram's name completed;
Then he showed each pious scholar
"In (naught)—0—we trust" upon his dollar.
This silent curse each feature cast
Upon our brave iconoclast;
"Almighty dollar, great creator,
Destroy at once thy mutilator!"
This numismatic scheme givs saying,
"See the Christian's wheel for praying."
But in selling and in buying
It givs a currency to lying.
My muse now with the second grapples,
It is the juice expressed of apples.
I cannot pause to point a moral,
Nor speak of that Edenic quarrel,
Nor stop to ask why Adam's dinners
Should make all Adam's children sinners.
The whole is known as Mrs. Grundy
From Honduras to bay of Funday.
Tho' here the sex you find is common,
That is, it may be man or woman;
And the concurrency be normal,
Or but subservient and formal.
Four syllables in all we find them,
But two as one in first combined them.
A company in apple-juice
In different parts they might produce,
But then our company were small—
One hundred and—naught more at all.

Correspondence.

CLARINDA, IA., May 15, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Mamma said I could write a letter for the Children's Corner if I thought you would publish it. Papa is a Freethinker and takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. We like the paper very much. We liv on a large hill two miles from town. We hav a lot of stock, and milk nineteen cows; hav lots of chickens, ducks, turkeys, and pea-fowls. I hav four brothers and two sisters. One brother is married and livs in Nebraska. I am fifteen years old and the youngest child, and I go to school. This is my first letter, and I will close before I make you tired.

Yours very truly, ELLA RAWLINGS.

HAMILTON, MO., May 8, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been reading the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER this afternoon, and like it very much. I hav been thinking so many times of writing and getting acquainted with you and the little Freethinkers, but I hav felt about like Miss Lillie Watkins, that I was so much older than any of the correspondents; but when I saw her letter I felt a little more encouraged.

I think some of the folks do very well in writing letters.

My father has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, and thinks highly of it. We hav a great deal of fun over the pictures nearly every time the paper comes.

Our spring seems to be coming in very fast and very warm; the thermometer was ninety-four degrees above zero this afternoon about four o'clock. How is that for a spring day? They had baptizing out west of our house this morning; there were about fifty persons baptized; the minister's horse looked as if he had baptized it.

I guess this is long enough for the first time. Hoping there will be space in one corner for this, I remain ever,

Your friend, ALICE COLBY.

A Hebrew Opinion of Our Sunday Laws.

Pharisee is to-day yet a by-word of derision. It expresses narrowmindedness, slavish submission to the letter of the law; and the New Testament has taught the Christian community to despise and abhor the pharisee. That the pharisee of old was a person altogether different than what he is conceived of by the average class of people has been conclusivly shown, but we do not propose to deal now with that question. That the pharisee, in every respect implied by the word in modern vocabulary, is not yet dead is fully illustrated in the most recent of times. If there hav ever been people who stick more slavishly to the letter of the law and slapped reason and common sense in the face than the present interpreters and executors of the law of our state, we would like to know where they were. The wise directors of our police force forbid the owner of a public hall to hav dance music performed and a ball held on his premises unless he obtains a theatrical license. If he complies with the law he is forbidden to supply his guests with wine or beer because under our present license law vinous, malt, and spirituous drinks may not be dispensed in a place of public amusement. Nobody doubts that the legislators never intended such an interpretation of the law, but our pharisees show you the letter of the law and that is all they care about.

The traveler who takes a rest at a hotel and the family who boards at a hotel, and all people who take their meals at a restaurant or boarding-house, cannot be served with wine or beer at his meals, because again the pharisee is abroad and forbids him to—the letter of the law is opposed to it.

The laboring man, the man who during the whole of the week is glued to his counting-room, the working bench, his factory, and cannot join his family in their meals except on the day of rest, on Sunday, he cannot hav the cheer of a glass of light wine, or fresh, foaming beer, because Sunday is a day devoted to God, and his representativs in Albany hav seen fit to forbid the use of any other beverage on the Lord's day but water.

Sunday is not claimed as a religious institution—is another piece of pharisaism, as glaring as it can be. Everybody knows that the strict pharisaical observance of it—they call it puritanic—is due to the influence and the clamor of the representativs of the church; otherwise, a rational, liberal interpretation would not attempt to turn the day of rest into a day of lugubriousness and abstention.

A Jew who celebrates his day of rest, who observes the Sabbath of the Bible, if he is caught selling a piece of meat, or a pair of socks, or a necktie on Sunday, is at once transferred to the lock-up. He has violated the Christian Sabbath, which is not his Sabbath. How the Christian sneered and sneers at the Jew because he upheld the validity and majesty of the law of holy writ. To show his contempt for these slaves of the law he abrogated the law including the observance of the biblical Sabbath. And now that he observes the first day of the week, which has no other foot to stand on than man-made law, he out-pharisees the pharisee and would forbid the motion of every animate and inanimate motor if he could. And if we allow this encroachment upon the rights of the people we will hav the puritanical Sabbath revived in our community in all its rigor, in all its absurdity, all it tyranny and bigotry.—Hebrew Standard.

One by One Passing Away.

DEAR EUGENE: I hav recently written letters to prominent Liberals at various points in our great Northwest, along the line of Brother S. P. Putnam's intended route, to stir our people up for a revival of good things when our genial and able Putnam shall drop in upon them with glad tidings from "The New God," "A New Heaven and New Earth," as implied in the gospel of Liberalism.

One of these letters was sent to Father Crane, the president of our Liberal League at Seattle, W. T. To-day I was pained by the response to this letter at the hands of his loving daughter, Laura E. Hall, at Seattle, bearing the sad news: "My dear father's hand is pulseless in death, and cannot reply to your letter."

I presume that his death will be reported to THE TRUTH SEEKER by his many friends at Seattle. And yet I cannot keep my pen from a word of deserved tribute to one of D. M. Bennett's warmest friends in his time of persecution, when every true friend counted one against the enemies of right and truth.

Father Crane was a kind and genial man, respected by the general community, and appreciated and loved by his friends. His death is a deep loss to the Liberal cause, which manifold proofs during many years of valuable service hav placed him in the front rank. And while Father Crane carried with him a loving heart and helping hand, with a good word and smile for every one, yet he was a most uncompromising foe to superstition and religious tyranny, and a Liberal in the true sense of the term. For, while Father Crane was a most decided and pronounced Infidel, he was also a Spiritualist, and yet not so absorbed in Spiritualism as to be lop-sided and morbid about another life, but took a keen interest in the progress of our cause and the Nine Demands of Liberalism; and nine times during the past sixteen years hav I visited Seattle in the interest of Freethought, always to find him at his post with helping hand and a warm welcome to his home.

To my mind such a death, although the warning was so brief and the event so sudden, has in it nothing of dread or horror. It is but giving back to nature, as we hope, only a part of her endowment in exchange for more refined conditions of life. But, be that as it may, whether life be continued in higher form or cease with our breath, there need be no horror in the event of such a death as that of Father Crane. His was a ripe old age, and the close of an honest, useful, earthly life.

Let him rest! Cover his grave with flowers, and plant over it the evergreen as a symbol of the hope of a future state, which he entertained during life, and an expression of tender memories hidden away in the hearts of children and friends left behind him. And, Eugene, when my time has come to depart, I trust that you will be able to say of me also, that I died with the harness on, and fell with my face to the foe. DR. J. L. YORK.

Why Send Missionaries to this Kind of Folks?

Chinese books on etiquet date back 2,600 years, and children are carefully instructed in such books to this day. I hav been the recipient of their courtesies in the homes of the rich and the poor. There are impolite people in China, so there are in every land. The courtesy and justice of a people are largely represented in their laws, and in their conduct toward strangers. By this test we are a rude people in comparison with them. A Chinese friend, one who is daily tormented in his own home by the invasion and insults of the sons of respectable people, called on me yesterday. In conversation he put these questions:

"You lived in China twenty years?"

"Yes," I replied.

"Did the boys or people force themselvs into your house and ill-treat you, and insult you on the street? Did they break your windows, and throw mud upon your floors?"

"Never," I answered. "Only once was a stone thrown at me in twenty years, and then heathen men, total strangers to me, cried out a rebuke; and when some of our missionaries were disturbed, the officers did protect them and arrest offenders. My children could go out daily unmolested in that land. Neither I nor they can do that here, accompanied by a Chinese, without annoyance and insult." I could fill this entire paper with such contrasts, from government to people.

The Chinese minister at Washington this winter gave a reception. He carefully issued a certain number of invitations. Four times the number he invited came. They took possession of his house, snatched the food from the servants ere they could place it upon the table, injured the carpet and furnishings in their rush to fill their stomachs, and, in all respects, as one paper says, "acted like so many pigs." These were Americans in the capital of our country, and those of us who hav received such exceeding courtesy and hospitality in Chinese homes, and know how very careful the Chinese are in these respects, bow our heads with shame, and grow hot with indignation.

When the Chinese see the wives of American and European merchants and officials, with a brief fall of lace for sleeves, and decollete, whirling in dance in the arms of men not their husbands, the scene is most "revolting" to them. I hav heard vile language from both men and women in China. I hav heard profane, and sometimes the union of both vile and profane, in this land. There are no women, I believe, in any land who are more careful of their personal reputation than the Chinese.—Mrs. S. L. Baldwin in Christian Advocate.

Obituary.

I find by reading the Kansas City Times that Col. Kersey Coates, a well-known pioneer and Freethinker of that city, is dead. I clip the following from the Times:

COLONEL KERSEY COATES.

A race of broad minds and strong spirits were those who turned the currents of inland commerce to the great bend of the Missouri, and the strongest and broadest of them all was the man who died peacefully at his home yesterday. Colonel Kersey Coates was a type of the highest order of pioneers—those who hav not only energy, but intellect and insight. He could both see and act, could both labor and command. With indomitable resolution and an allegiance to truth which never varied, he had the charm of human sympathy and the disarming grace of kindly humor which gathered about him friends instead of followers. His influence was felt by men and communities.

Colonel Coates was the embodiment of that rarest faculty—or combination of all the faculties—common sense. He was natural and direct in thought, speech, and action; therefore his conversation and his public addresses were alike always effectiv; his judgments were always reasonable and generally accurate, and his performance never betrayed symptoms of weakness or of hesitation.

Kansas City owes to his clear knowledge and unflinching tenacity of purpose much of the position the city now occupies. He supported all good enterprises and coolly smiled down many foolish ones. His example kept alive faith and energies when the light was dim and when the brighter period made all energetic his wise counsel helped them to avoid the danger of wasted power.

Such men are born for a purpose. The purpose of Colonel Coates's life has been nobly fulfilled. His career was complete, rounded, and beautiful in its symmetrical outline. Nothing but good will be said of him, because there is nothing of evil for malice to discover. Living and dead, while he was the object of political animosities engendered during a time of convulsions, he has had and will hav the respect of every honest man, and the admiration of all with penetration to recognize great qualities.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

"I could pronounce no benediction upon Romanism. It has done mischief enough to deserve transportation for life. I regard Roman Christianity as the worst form of tyranny. It commands the arm to work and the brain to die: it feeds faith and starves thought; it loves oppression and hates liberty. It has given falsehood a crown and truth a scaffold."

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

News of the Week.

THE Beecher monument fund amounts to about $21,000.

FOUR thousand emigrants reached this port in one day last week.

JOHN GREENWELL has been found guilty of the Weeks murder in Brooklyn.

THE silversmith lock-out remains unmodified.

THE police prevented Herr Most from making a speech in Newark, N. J., last Sunday.

THE pope has written a letter sustaining the action of Archbishop Corrigan in the McGlynn matter.

A MINISTER who is in jail in Georgia for stealing writes to the loca editor to print nothing about him, as he is a "Christian and a jentlemen."

A GREAT crowd attended the last meeting of the Anti-Poverty Society. The Rev. Mr. Pentecost delivered an address, in the course of which he said: "If Christianity and poor-houses go hand in hand, then, for heaven's sake, let us look forward to more heathenism." A collection of $264 was taken toward abolishing poverty.

WALT WHITMAN will read a poem at the New York Decoration Day services in the Academy of Music. Mr. Talmage will deliver the oration, if his health permits, and Mayor Hewitt will preside.

LAST Saturday the half-holiday law took effect. It was fairly well observed.

THE White Star line steamers Celtic and Britannic collided in a fog 350 miles out from New York last Saturday. Four persons were killed aboard the latter vessel, and some twenty injured. Neither boat sank.

THE jury has been chosen in the case of Jacob Sharp, who is charged with bribing aldermen. When this case is over, that of ex-Commissioner Rollin M. Squire, arraigned for corrupt bargaining, will be tried.

TIFFANY, the jeweler, has just completed the Gladstone testimonial to be presented by American admirers to that eminent statesman. It is a pedestal and bust of sterling silver, three feet high, and cost $3,500.

MR. O'BRIEN, of Ireland, editor of United Ireland, has been lecturing in Canada. He is a Catholic and a Home Ruler, and those who differed with him in religion and politics hav made things lively for him by throwing bricks, clubs, and vegetables at him while delivering his discourses.

THE Rev. W. H. H. Murray has solved the mystery of the sea serpent seen in Lake Champlain. He says the illusion is caused by hundreds of small plovers flying in a long string close to the water. The birds displaying alternately their brown backs and white breasts produced the phenomena which were mistaken for the appearance and disappearance of the aquatic monster.

THE Knights of Labor profess to be conducting a boycott against the New York Sun because its utterances on the labor question do not meet with their hearty indorsement. The boycott is opposed by the printers' trade union, as the Sun pays the scale of wages, and is a "card" office. The printers are probably a rather more intelligent body of men taken as a whole than the rank and file, or even the leaders, of the Knights of Labor.

THERE was no relaxation in the enforcement of the excise law last Sunday. The number of arrests for drunkenness on Sunday since the side doors hav been closed is nearly equal to that for the corresponding Sundays last year when the side doors were open. This is explained in part by the extra vigilance of the police, but is due mainly to the fact that those who are enabled to get into saloons are apt to indulge to an inordinate degree.

THE EVICTION OF HAGAR.

THE "BREAD-AND-WATER" TEXT.—And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar (putting it on her shoulder) and the child, and sent her away: and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba.—Gen. xxi, 14.

Odds and Ends.

BREECHES of promis—pantaloons bought on credit.

THE more you puff a cigar the smaller it becomes. And that is the way with some men.

THE fact that music and beer can not be served together makes the outlook for music look gloomy.

THE Christian Union this week givs us "The Cry of Moses;" and it isn't "Dot goat vits you like de baper on de valls!" either.

FORTUNE knocks once at every man's door, but she doesn't go hunting through beer saloons for him, if the man happens to out.—Puck.

YOU may write about the unions
With the sharpest-pointed Faber,
But the mother with a baby
Knows the most of nights of labor.

A MINISTER, having preached a very long sermon, as his custom was, some hours after asked a gentleman his opinion of it. He replied that "it was very good, but it spoilt a dinner worth two of it.'

THEY sat within the parlor dim,
I passed and heard her say to him,
"I wish, dear George, that you'd behave—
If not, I wish that you would shave."

"WHERE is the island of Java situated?" asked a school teacher of a small, rather forlorn-looking boy. "I dunno, sir." "Don't you know where coffee comes from?" "Yes, sir, we borrows it from the next-door neighbor."

DON'T worry about our noble land being invaded and destroyed by gunboats, because of our unprotected sea-coast. The kind of sea-coast defense the majority of our people are suffering for is a liberal reduction in the seaside hotel rates.

A WRONG inference: A little boy at the opera, who noticed the gentlemen looking through their opera glasses at the ballet dancers, said: 'Mamma, buy me one of those things, so I can cover up my eyes with it when those women come on the stage."

GENTLEMAN: "But I am afraid he wouldn't make a good watch dog." Man with purp: "Not a good watch dog! Why, Lor' bless your 'art, it was only last week that this 'ere wery animal held a burglar down by the throat and beat his brains out with his tail."

THEY played eucher. He was an old man. She was young. "Whenever you hold the right bower," he remarked in commencing, "your lover is thinking of you." Then he watched whenever she picked up the cards to see if she blushed or not. He won.

"YOU ought to be ashamed of yourself, a great, big man like you to be a beggar and a tramp. You oughtn't to be afraid of work." "I know it, mum, but I can't help it. You see my nurse frightened me once in a dark room when I was a baby, and I hav been timid ever since."

"BACK from Cannes, eh?" said Mr. Neversmile to Mrs. Spriggins as he seated himself beside her. "Oh, yes, indeed; I couldn't stand the gyrations of the ground." "You were in the earthquake, then?" "Indeed I was. And do you know I was so frightened that I got right down on my knees and said my Cataclysm as fast as I could. Religion is a great refuge, Mr. Neversmile."

A LITTLE grammar found in an old garret in Portsmouth, N. H., has an illustration representing the difference between the activ, passiv, and neuter verbs. It is a picture of a father whipping his boy. The father is activ, the boy is passiv, and the mother, sitting by herself on a stool looking on but doing nothing, is neuter.

THERE is a man in our town, and he is wondrous wise,
Whenever he writes the printer-man he dotteth all his i's;
And when he's dotted all of them, with great sang froid and ease,
He punctuates each paragraph, and crosses all his t's.
Upon one side alone he writes, and never rolls his leaves;
And from the man of ink a smile, and mark "insert" receives.
And when a question he doth ask (taught wisely he has been),
He doth the goodly two-cent stamp, for postage back, put in.

A BISHOP, a curate, and a layman were fishing in Canadian waters one very hot day last summer. When it came time for luncheon, the bishop produced from under the seat of the boat a bottle—presumably containing apollinaris—and a lump of ice, which he proceeded to break into small pieces. A broad smile played over his heated face as he began to extract the cork from the bottle. The smile changed to an expression of agony as the hot bottle, shooting out its cork with a tremendous explosion, split from neck to bottom, and lost its every drop. With a look of heart-rending appeal the bishop turned to the layman and exclaimed: "You're a layman, say it for me!"

OBLATION TO SPRING.

Oh the gin-blossom blows on the juniper-tree,
The grasses are bright in the emerald lea;
The frog gaily croaks in the pond by the way,
And up in the sycamore carols the jay.

Our bosoms are light, and our fancies are free,
The gin-blossom blows on the juniper-tree;
The wren hops about on the white window-sill,
And softly the lamb gambols over the hill.

The cloudlets are white and the heavens are blue,
The doves in the apricot tenderly coo;
The gin-blossom blows on the juniper-tree,
Where shortly will revel the busy gold bee.

Then come, O my love, let us roam where the stream
Flows softly along like a beautiful dream;
And we'll sing in our hearts like the glad chickadee,
The gin-blossom blows on the juniper-tree.

Bible of Bibles; or, Twenty-seven Divine Revelations, containing a description of twenty-seven bibles and an exposition of two thousand biblical errors in science, history, morals, religion, and general events. ## Gems of Thought.

THE difference between the conditions of the rich and the poor is far more marked than it ought to be. The homes of the poor, though humble, should be neat and cheerful.—D. M. Bennett.

IT is true that Catholic and, in less degree, Protestant orthodoxy can say more comforting things to a murderer than a Unitarian and Liberal religion can. It can make him believe, even if has sud denly sent his victim to hell with not an instant's chance for conversion to save his soul, that he, himself, in "a fountain filled with blood, drawn from Immanuel's veins," may be "plunged beneath that flood," and lose all his "guilty stains." This religion tells him that he may find even the gallows to be "steps unto heaven," and so he mounts the scaffold happy, hopeful confident. "Can your religion do this for a dying murderer?" it is triumphantly asked; and I triumphantly answer, "No," and thank God that it cannot; for we cannot thus encourage the most wicked crime. We hav heard God in nature, in experience, in the Bible, declare that "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap," "Every one shall receive according to the deeds done in the body," and we hav never heard that God has repealed that law.—Rev. W. L. Chaffin.

ALL doctrins relating to the creation of the world, the government of man by superior beings, and his destiny after death are conjectures which hav been given out as facts, handed down with many adornments by tradition, and accepted by posterity as "revealed religion." They are theories more or less rational which uncivilized men hav devised in order to explain the facts of life, and which civilized men believe that they believe. Those doctrins are not in themselvs of any moral value. It is of no consequence, morally speaking, whether a man believes that the world was made by one God or by twenty. A savage is not of necessity a better man because he believes that he livs under the dominion of invisible tyrants, who will compel him, some day or other, to migrate to another land.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

It is a curious fact that men, as members of an ecclesiastic body, will insist on retaining doctrins which they hav long since given up as individuals. Thus you will scarcely find a minister of the Church of England who will admit that he believes the Athanasian Creed, and yet no convention of that body has ever been willing to surrender it.—James Freeman Clarke. [NOTE.—If my memory does not deceive me, I saw it stated, some years ago, that the "disestablished" church of Ireland had resolved to discontinue the reading of the Athanasian Creed, at any rate to allow individual clergymen to read it, or omit its reading, as they saw fit. If so, it was a most sensible, and, therefore, un-Irish proceeding. The Athanasian Creed is, no doubt, a bitter pill, but, for myself, if I could swallow all the rest of the English Prayer Book, I think I could take down the Athanasian Creed and not make a wry face about it. The Scotch hav a pithy saying to the effect that "there is no use of swallowing a whole cow and then worrying at the tail." The idea is, I think, good, and to be received as "orthodox," but the mode of expressing it is rather Hibernian.—Hylax.]

IT is true that if philosophers hav suffered, their cause has been amply avenged. Extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science as the strangled monster beside that of Hercules, and history records that whenever science or orthodoxy hav been fairly opposed, the latter has been forced to retire from the lists, bleeding and crushed, if not annihilated, subdued if not slain. But orthodoxy is the Bourbon of the world of thought. It learns not, neither can it forget, and though at present bewildered and afraid to move, it is as willing as ever to insist that the first chapter of Genesis contains the beginning and the end of sound science, and to visit with such petty thunder-bolts as its half paralyzed hands can hurl, those who refuse to degrade nature to the level of primitiv Judaism.—Huxley's Origin of Species.

THROUGH clouds of doubt and creeds of fear,
A light is breaking calm and clear.
The song of love, now low and far,
Ere long shall swell from star to star.

Henceforth my heart shall sigh no more
For olden time and holier shore;
God's love and blessing, here and there,
Are now and here, and everywhere.
—John G. Whittier (b. 1808).

As the egg, so the chick, and the chick is not in fault. An eagle chips her shell here, a vulture struggles into life there, and kites are hatched by brooding mothers as well as doves or nightingales. It is by the direct action of that brooding mother what kind of creature is added to the forces of life, but it all depends on man what kind of egg he chooses shall be hatched. If he has a fancy for kites and vultures, he cannot expect to save his lambs and ducklings.—Mrs. Linton's Under Which Lord?

DECEPTIV APPEARANCES AND ACTUAL FACTS.

Humiliating indeed must be the condition of that man whose wife goes to the confessional. When he walks the streets he is met by her confessor, who salutes him humbly, turns aside and laughs! "Look at the gentleman; how fond he seems of his wife! It was yesterday she was at the confessional with me; poor fool!"—Michelet.

Notes and Clippings.

VACOINATION for yellow fever has been successfully tried in Colombia, S. A.

THE czar of Russia was shot at while riding in his carriage last week, but was not hit. Those enemies of the czar who miss him so often are bringing Russian marksmanship into contempt.

THESE vital statistics are printed in a daily paper: The death rate of the globe is 67 a minute, 97,790 a day, and 35,639,835 a year, and the birth rate 70 a minute, 100,800 a day, and 36,792,000 a year.

ON May 24th the big bridge between New York and Brooklyn had been open just four years. Up to that date the total receipts were $2,435,787.23. Passengers to the number of 15,963,919 had walked across, and the cars had carried 64,111,556.

BISHOP LITTLEJOHN, of Long Island, reports that more candidates for holy orders are desired in the Episcopal church, and that "quality is more needed than quantity." The Lutheran church also complains of a lack of the ministerial supply, but omits Bishop Littlejohn's qualifying remark. The tendency of brains is not toward the ministry.

THE General Conference of the Reformed Episcopal church, holding at Philadelphia, hav been considering this proposition: "No minister of this church shall solemnize matrimony in any case where the divorced wife or husband of either party is still living; but this shall not apply in cases of adultery or where parties divorced seek to be reunited."

A DISPATCH from Lexington announces that an eminent astronomer of Hartford, Ky., has discovered the reappearance of the Star of Bethlehem. Its position is in the northwestern heavens, closely skirting the horizon. How the eminent astronomer ascertained that the particular star which he observed is the Star of Bethlehem is not stated in the dispatch.

THE president and wife hav retired to the Adirondacks in New York for a vacation, which will include the anniversary of their marriage. It is hinted that Mr. Cleveland accepted a free ride from the railroad company, and thus violated the Interstate Commerce law which he recently signed, but all good citizens will hope that this is not so. None but ministers are allowed to be dead-heads in this enlightened land.

THE orators in the McGlynn crusade continue to repeat the saying of somebody, "Giv us all the religion you choose from Rome, but no politics." Yet the man who lets somebody else tell him how he shall vote is no greater slave than the one who allows another to do his thinking for him. The pope's opinions on both religion and politics should be accorded the weight to which their reasonableness entitles them, and no more.

THE census report of 1880 places the total of the national wealth at $43,642,000,000. Of this amount $10,197,000,000 are credited to the farms; $9,881,000,000 to residences and business real estate; $5,536,000,000 to railroads and their equipments; $5,000,000,000 to household furniture, books, pictures, and the like; $2,000,000,000 to live stock; $6,000,000,000 to agricultural products remaining over, and $2,000,000,000 to churches, schoolhouses, public buildings, and institutions of one kind or another. There was also a considerable miscellaneous list.

A NOVEL plan for settling labor difficulties has been adopted in Paterson, N. J. The board of trade has selected a bank president, and the Knights of Labor hav selected a minister. These two hav selected an old citizen, and in turn the three hav selected thirteen men. Now the board of trade and the Knights of Labor will alternately reject one until only one man is left, and this one will be the president of the new board of arbitration to settle questions between capital and labor without strikes or lockouts.

THERE is none so thrifty as the New Jerseyman. Union Hill, in that delightful state just across the Hudson from New York, has appointed twenty-five special policemen for Sunday work. Their duty is to arrest New Yorkers who go there for a drink of beer. They get half the fines imposed on their prisoners, and the Jersey justices coöperate with them by making the fines heavy. The proceeding has caused considerable comment, and has called forth from a New York jurist the suggestion that ten days' imprisonment be substituted for the fine, the policemen to take half as at present.

AT a meeting of the Municipal Council of the Irish National League on May 24th the following was offered: "Whereas, This being the sixty-eighth anniversary of the birth of her gracious majesty, Queen Victoria, and the jubilee year of the Empress of India, we, the Municipal Council of the New York Irish League, remind her majesty that in her mature age, as in her youth, she has been conspicuous by her want of sympathy with her Irish subjects, and we regret that her year of jubilee should be commemorated by the most brutal and cowardly legislation toward the Irish people."

POPE LEO still yearns for the recovery of his lost temporal power in Italy. In a late address to the clergy he said: "We earnestly desire that Italy should put aside her unhappy difference with the papacy, whose dignity is violated chiefly by the conspiracy of sects. The means of obtaining concord would be to establish the pope in a position where he would be subject to no power in the enjoyment of full and real liberty, which, far from injuring Italy, would powerfully contribute to her prosperity." Think of the happiness of that country in which the pope is in a position "subject to no power!" It could be equaled only by the happiness of a rabbit swallowed by a boa constrictor.

EX-SPEAKER G. Z. ERWIN, of the New York Assembly, is the sworn enemy of all legislation looking to the relief of New Yorkers from the oppressiv Sunday laws, and kills them as fast as they come up. He is the man who, when chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, defeated the motion of Messrs. Wakeman, Hawes, and Duryea to tax church property. He has, however, demonstrated his broad statesmanship by getting a bill through the Assembly making it a misdemeanor to feed sparrows. He has also appeared as the champion of numerous jobs. A daily paper has remarked that if being a jackass were a misdemeanor, Mr. George Zerubbabel Erwin would be a misdemeanant.

Protection to Labor.

Rufus Choate had three styles of handwriting—one which he could read but his clerk could not, one which his clerk could read but he could not, and one which neither he nor his clerk could read. So protection to labor resolves itself into three styles—one which each workman must discover and apply for himself, for the state cannot help him; one which the state must discover and apply, for the workman alone cannot obtain it, and one which neither the state nor the workman can obtain or discover.

As the last category is the shortest, I will begin by saying that neither the state nor the workman himself can protect him altogether from musketoes, weekly expenses, life insurance agents, patent medicins, doctors' bills, wet feet, venders of patent rights, fever and ague, circuses, professional labor parasites, prophets, agitators, and economic quacks. These are conditions that hav got to be assumed, as the chemists assume simple substances, and as the philosophers assume time, space, force, and motion as first principles. But, after all, practical science consists mainly in utilizing them or in minimizing the disastrous or deleterious influences flowing from them.

Begin with our workingman just as we find him. He earns, or can earn if employed, say from one to four dollars a day. In what respect must the state leave him unprotected in order that he may the better protect himself? For this the state must do in all those particulars in which the workingman is his own best protector.

I begin, then, by asserting that the workingman must be let alone by the state, and therefore must be left unprotected by the state, because he is his own best protector as to his rate of wages—the price at which he will sell his labor to his employer.

And this calls up the question at the outset, What makes the rate of wages? The rate of wages is arrived at by a division, generally nearly equal, between the aggregate capital employed and the aggregate labor employed in an enterprise or process, of the difference between the cost of the raw materials and the cost of the finished product of that enterprise or process.

This is the same thing, in effect, as saying that the rate of wages depends on the demand for labor and the supply of labor, except that the last formula states the effect, while the first states the cause. The cause of the demand for labor is the profit that capital can earn in employing labor. The cause of the supply of labor is the fact that labor can, by laboring, make this division with capital or get this share of the difference between the value ventured and the value obtained, or between the cost of the raw materials and the finished product. Therefore, it is, in the long run, the rate of profit that regulates the rate of wages. For it is only where profits are large or rising, and employers are anxious to float into success on the flood tide, or to make hay while the sun shines, that they offer higher wages; and, vice versa, it is always the interest of an employer whose profits are good to extend his business by employing more help, rather than to contract his business by the difficulties inseparable from cutting down wages.

To place this partnership between labor and capital fully before you, let me cite a few facts: Everyone recognizes that working a farm on equal shares, where one person finds the land, improvements, buildings, seeds, fruit trees, implements, and, perhaps, cattle and flocks and poultry, while the other brings only the labor power of himself, his family, and those whom he may hire, is a fair bargain, or, to put it more emphatically, a just partnership. For the farm as it stands represents many years of labor already done. The working tenant, who proposes to work the farm, offers one year of labor to be done against many years of labor already done. This is the metayer system of Europe. Indeed, most parts of the world in all ages hav been tilled under it, and its equity still remains to be questioned.

Now fifty-four railways, which cost to construct and equip them $1,251,795,029 74, make annual returns to the railway commissioners of Illinois. Their par capital is more than twice that sum, but with that we hav not at present to do. These railways employ 156,007 workers, of all sorts, from president to brakeman. Their gross earnings are about one hundred and sixty-three and one-half millions of dollars, and yet all these railways are worked upon shares by the naked labor, i. e., labor not backed by the least capital employed in the business. Th sharing comes out so evenly, though no effort at even sharing or profit sharing is thought of in adjusting any workman's salary or any dividend, that there are paid in salaries and wages $81,936,170.81, and there are paid to the capital (labor previously done in constructing and equipping the roads) $81,720,265 53 yearly.

No system of intentional profit-sharing is more equal than this, provided we assent to the principle that a day's work already done and embodied in the form of capital is as well entitled to compensation for its use as a day's work not yet done, which we call labor.

Working on shares is not an accident in that natural organization of labor which arises through each man fitting into the niche that he finds made for himself and doing simply the best he knows how to do, minding always his own business and leaving other people to mind theirs. For instance, the total manufactures of the United States hav first to pay for their raw materials purchased, all of which hav been the finished product of one or more previous industries, and hav been created by a joint partnership of labor with capital, resulting in a joint sharing of wages of labor with returns to capital. Having paid for these, there remained out of the whole price received on sale of the products a gross fund, out of which the capital (or labor done before the year began) had to divide with the labor done during the year. The division in 1880 was:

|---|---|
| To wages (exclusiv of those earned on raw materials) | $ 947,953,795 |
| To capital for all purposes | 1,024,801,837 |

The share taken by capital includes payment for erecting plant, extending works, making repairs, insurance, machinery, interest, losses by bad debts and losing contracts, etc. The principle here carried out is evidently that of working on shares. In the salt manufacture the division was:

|---|---|
| To wages (not earned in raw materials) | $1,260,023 |
| To capital (for all purposes) | 1,495,594 |

In the mixed textil fabrics the division was:

|---|---|
| To wages (not earned on raw materials) | $13,216,753 |
| To capital (for all purposes) | 15,677,109 |

In the iron and steel manufacture the division was:

|---|---|
| To wages (of same process for which gains of capital are counted) | $55,476,785 |
| To capital (for all purposes) | 49,809,750 |

Where the nature of the business, or the inventions made in it, are such that capital invested in machinery performs almost the whole of the labor involved in it, or where the nature of the business is essentially a commercial rather than a manufacturing one, the slight work performed in the manufacture being a mere incident in a process essentially of buying and selling, as in meat packing, lumber, leather, etc., the transaction is less a partnership and the share of labor diminishes. Where, on the other hand, men and skill are nearly everything, and machinery next to nothing, as in the ship building, at a time when it consists, as now, almost wholly of repairing, and in the silk manufacture at a time when new processes hav to be introduced through new workmen, and a generation has to be educated up to the art, the share of capital sinks and the share of wages expands to threefold the partnership share. Compare:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Slaughtering and meat packing. | Wages to labor | $10,508,530 |
| | Gross returns to capital | 25,314,981 |
| Woolen goods manufacture. | Wages to labor | 25,836,392 |
| | Gross returns to capital | 33,924,718 |
| Lumber. | Wages to labor | 31,845,974 |
| | Gross returns to capital | 55,226,370 |
| Leather. | Wages to labor | 4,840,413 |
| | Gross returns to capital | 7,199,375 |

And again, compare the arts in which machinery is of little importance, ship repairing, or in which skill is being developed by an educating process (silk manufacture):

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Ship building, repairing. | Wages to labor | $12,713,813 |
| | Gross returns to capital | 3,350,156 |
| Silk and silk goods manufacture. | Wages to labor | 9,146,705 |
| | Returns of capital | 3,805,217 |

It is idle to deny that these figures prove that under the existing wages system all industry is profit-sharing in fact.

Now, having shown that all wages-working is profit-sharing under a thin disguise, the next question is, Is the division that is made between the profit-makers and the wage-workers a fair one, and if not, what is the remedy, and is the remedy one which the capitalists must apply, or is it one which the wage-workers must apply, or one which the state must apply, or is it irremediable?

Wages rise where employers seeking to employ more help are many, and where men seeking to be employed are few. Obviously, then, if it be true that wages are too low in any line of employment, what is needed in that line is a greater competition among employers, and a decreased competition among workers, i.e, that a good many of those who are now seeking to work at that business for wages shall cease working in it for wages, and begin working in it as employers, and on their own account. This, and this alone, will lessen the number of workers competing against each other for wages, and increase the number of employers competing against each other for the hire of workmen.

But you answer, That implies the possession of capital on our part, and we hav not the capital. I reply, That would be a valid objection if it were true in fact, but it happens to be magnificently and splendidly false.

The deposits of the working men and women of the United States in the savings banks amount to upwards of $800,000,000. They exceed in volume the deposits of business men in the national banks and in the private banks combined, and are equal in volume to the deposits of the business men, merchants, manufacturers, railroad kings, lawyers, and financiers, whom we call the capitalists, in both the national banks and state banks combined.

Moreover, there is no wind, no inflation, in these deposits in the savings banks, as millions of dollars in volume of the deposits in the national and state banks are. The savings bank deposits made by the poor are all actual cash passed over the till. You cannot go to a savings bank as you can to a national bank, and say, "Here are my grain certificates, or my bills receivable and notes, or my railway or mining shares; how much of a deposit will you credit me with on my bank book if I leave these here as collateral?" Hence the savings bank deposits are all the immediate hard cash.

And since savings banks must loan their deposits in sums seldom less than $3,000, and from that up to $50,000, on first mortgages on first-class improved city real estate, and none but the rich own this class of property, it follows that savings banks are a gathering up of the savings of the poor to lend them to the rich. They invert every law of charity. They take from them that hav very little to hand over to them that hav much, that they may hav more abundantly.

Not that savings banks as a means of hoarding, as compared with spending, are not good at the outset of a wages-worker's career. They are at all times good relativly to the beer saloon and the gambling-den. But for the wage-worker to keep his savings in the savings bank all his life, after he could use them as the sufficient means with which to go into business on his own account, and to become his own employer and the employer of others, is to combine to depress wages at both ends, and indeed in three different ways. First, he swells the ranks and increases the competition among the wage-workers, and so lowers their wages by competing with them for wages when he ought to be competing with their employers in hiring them and so adding his mite to raise their rate of wages. Secondly, by keeping out of competition with the profit-makers, he makes their numbers fewer, and hence their profits larger; for, as we hav seen, the division of the gross returns of every industrial process, being nearly equal between the aggregate labor employed and the aggregate capital employed, in the degree that the share that goes to labor has to be divided among many, and the equal share that goes to capital is divided among a few, in the same degree must each individual capitalist or profit-maker reap a large return for his time and the individual workman must reap a small return for his time.

Hence every man who keeps on working for wages after he has the means to become his own employer and the employer of others, helps to depress wages as to each wage-worker, and to intensify profits and monopoly in favor of the few profit-makers actually in the field.

Finally, by competing for the privilege of lending his money to the rich through the savings banks, the poor man tends to cheapen capital to those who already possess it—for the borrowers from those banks are the rich—and to make its acquisition more difficult to those who do not.

Measure for a moment the vast labor-employing power which the fund now held by workingmen in the savings banks represents, i. e., the number of men it could employ.

In farming and mechanical trades, each $1,000 of capital employs a man. In manufactures, each $2,500 employs a man. In railroading, each $8,000 employs a man. Hence the $800,000,000 deposited in our savings banks would employ in farming and the mechanical trades 660,000 men. In manufactures it would employ 320,000 men. In railroading it would employ 100,000 men. Here, therefore, is a vast labor-employing fund held by workingmen solely to loan it to the rich, and not to employ it at their own risk in employing themselvs and others.

Now, the workingmen can only justify holding this fund in this way, either by saying that there are no profits to be made in employing labor at present rates, or that they are not intellectually competent to find out where the profits could be made, or that they don't want wages raised above where they now are.

The first assumption, that there are no profits to be made in employing labor at present rates, amounts to an admission that labor has no ground of complaint.

The second assumption, that there are profits to be made, but that the wages-worker lacks either the courage or the competency to make them, amounts to a confession that the wages-worker is really under a very great obligation to those men who hav the courage and competency to hire labor and make a profit out of it, since he, the wages-worker, if given the capital to work with, could not do it, and hence stands indebted for his means of subsistence to the fact that others can do what, with the same money, means supplied, he could not do.

The third alternativ, that the wages-workers who hold these deposits in the savings banks do not wish wages to be raised, is therefore the only one consistent with the assumption both that there would be profits to be made in their employment in industry, and that they know how to make them.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

While stopping with Mr. Powell, there came in our way a tremendous freshet on Rock river. The bridges in that region were washed away, and traveling was almost entirely suspended. Our mails, which we had ordered sent to Lyndon, were on the other side of the river.

One morning, it having been six weeks since letters from home had reached me, Mr. Powell announced that he should take me over the river that day, as he thought it too much for a mother to bear to wait longer in suspense for news from home. I said, "How will you cross?" Said he: "A few miles away there is a bridge that seems fast, though some feet under water. We will go there, and if the bridge fails us, my horses will swim the river."

We had meetings appointed on that side of the river, and were in haste to be about our work. Mr. Foss was then with me. He had been in the Baptist pulpit twenty-five years, and was less afraid of water than of sin, no matter how deep it might run. We started in good season, and having reached the place where the bridge should hav been, found nothing of that sort in sight, but a long pole was set up on each side of the river, and one about midway in the stream, showing the location of the bridge. A man driving the mail wagon had preceded us for the last mile, but when he reached the point to drive into the water he stopped, and no persuasions of Mr. Powell and Mr. Foss combined could influence him to try the bridge first. He said, his life was worth just as much to him as the lady's was to her (and why wasn't it?), and he would follow us, or not go at all; and so Mr. Powell, talking all the time to his horses as though they were human, drove them into the water, when they began to swim. Mr. Foss told me very cheerfully that if by any accident the wagon should be upset, he was strong enough to take me and swim to the shore. He stood up in the wagon, and I stood on the seat, he holding me so that I should not fall, and though the water filled the wagon up to the seat, we reached the other side in safety, as did the mail-driver also. When we were over, Mr. Powell said: "Mrs. Colman, I would not hav done that for anyone but a mother. You hav said very little, but your face had become so anxious that it was painful to look at it."

This was one of the experiences of our trip in Illinois.

Some twenty years before this time, an uncle of mine had emigrated to this state and settled in the town to which we were at that time destined. My uncle and his wife were both dead, but two daughters were living, very orthodox in their opinions. My uncle was, or had been, sheriff of the county, postmaster of the town, and school-teacher. He was practically the minister, as he had the charge of the little society, read printed sermons to them on Sundays, and led their prayer-meetings during the week. He was an excellent man, save his bigotry, and that was almost unparalleled. As an instance, when the postal laws required that the mail should be opened on Sunday, he gave up the office rather than break the Fourth Commandment, though he every Sunday made a fire and ate of the food prepared for the table on that day. As a sheriff, he arrested anyone suspected of theft, even though he worshiped, as the second person of the godhead, Jesus of Nazareth, who expressly forbade his followers to deal with the law of revenge. I presume the command, "Swear not at all: neither by heaven, for it is God's throne, nor by the earth, for it is his footstool," had never presented itself to his mind as a command to be strictly enforced, nor had he ever felt that the office of a sheriff was incompatible with the creed of a Christian. We found no help in our work from either one of my relativs. The husband of one of my cousins was a graduate of Oberlin College, but I do not remember one act of even common courtesy given me by him or his wife. His was work for the Lord, not for man. We, however, held two meetings in Lyndon, and had the use of the church for them, but not the presence of my Oberlin cousin.

We crossed the Mississippi and worked a short time in Iowa and Wisconsin, meeting with very little opposition, and quite as little success. Returning, we stopped awhile in Pennsylvania, where the ignorance of the people was appalling. At a gathering of men engaged in some mechanical work, Mr. Foss said: "Well, my friends, whom are we going to hav for the next president?" "We don't know; the 'lection man ha'nt been round to tell us." At another place, putting the same question, the answer came, "General Jackson." Being informed by us that General Jackson had been dead some years, the speaker seemed astonished at our audacity, and assured us that they had always voted for the "gineral, and we needn't think we should lie them out of doing it now." I am not making a plea for "woman's rights" in these reminiscences, but if I were I think the answers of these men might be a good text whereon to base an argument. At one of our appointments in Pennsylvania, the agent who was to speak was taken suddenly sick, and I was sent for to fill his place. I went, found a crowded house, and not one woman among them. I felt at first somewhat embarrassed to be the only one of my own sex, but these ignorant men were perfectly respectful, treating me in every way well—another text for a "woman's rights" lecture. If one woman could keep such a company of coarse men on their good behavior, what might not a goodly number of them do at the polls or in the halls of Congress, if they went as rightful members of the "body politic," rather than as favored visitors?

My memory now takes me back into the state of New York, where I worked, mostly by myself, for a year or two. I went through the southern counties, from Buffalo to New York city, with varied experiences. At one place, a good Christian man, taking advantage of my offer of the platform to anyone wishing to speak, rose and said that "the speaker was no doubt a woman, to say the least, of weak morals, as she entirely ignored the commands of the Bible, uncovering her head and speaking in public, all of which was expressly against the laws of God laid down in the holy Bible."

After he had finished his tirade by saying he did all he could to prevent my having the house, I said, "Hav you finished your speech, sir?" "Yes," he said. I then said, "Do you keep the laws of God laid down in the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments?" He indignantly answered, "Of course I do; I am a Christian, and I don't wish to be insulted by such as you with such a question." I said, "No insult was intended, sir. I knew you were a very ignorant man, but I did suppose you knew something of the laws of the Bible in regard to your own sex, as you were so familiar with the laws by which a woman should be governed." He seemed astonished, and wondering said, "What do you mean?" I said, "You come into a meeting of mine, and insult me with your charges, with your face as smooth as a woman's, and your Bible says, 'Thou shalt not mar the corners of thy beard,' and you hav cut yours all off." This was when it was an offense to the church to wear the full beard. He said with strong emphasis, "There is no such passage or law in the Bible." I answered, "Don't make your ignorance so apparent. If there were a Bible in the hall—but I do not see any—I would read it to you." A man with a full beard, the only one in the large audience, said, "I will get one," and went out for that purpose. When he returned with the book, I said, "This is not my book; you can look at it, sir, and see that it is the real Bible, King James version, if you wish;" and turning to the law, I read it, telling them all chapter and verse where it was found. You can realize that that Christian man was a somewhat wiser if not better man when he left that meeting.

I received about this time a letter from Mr. Frederick Douglass, introducing to my notice a young colored woman, the daughter of a fugitiv slave, who showed considerable talent for public speaking, asking me if I would take her with me and initiate her into the ways of advertising and getting up meetings, saying, "It is impossible for me to take her with me, as I am a married man, and she is a young woman, and I know no other speaker of whom I can ask the favor." I had my meetings arranged for some weeks when this request reached me, and received invitations to be a guest in homes friendly to the cause of emancipation, but I was invited as one by myself. To take another with me was embarrassing, but I felt that I could not refuse, and wrote in answer, "Yes, send her to me." The first place where I presented myself was in Honeoye, the long time home of Mr. Goodale, the noted Abolitionist divine. The lady who had sent me a pressing invitation to make her house my home, as she came to the door and saw with me a young colored woman, was too much astonished to speak. She looked at me with consternation on every feature. At last, recovering herself, she said, "Walk in," and, giving my friend a seat near the door, took me into an inner apartment, saying: "Mrs. Colman, I did not know when I sent you the invitation that you had a colored woman with you. I'm greatly embarrassed, as I hav only one guest room." I said, "Let me relieve you at once. I consulted my friend's prejudices, as I anticipated such happenings, and she told me she had no prejudice against white people, and would be perfectly willing to occupy a room with me. I'm sure if you consult her, she will not object."

The change in Mrs. ——'s face was ludicrous, but I kept a very serious look as I said if it should happen that the white should leave a mark upon the black skin 'twould be as hard to bear as the black upon the white. Alas! that slavery has so often taken nearly all the color from its forced victim. My hostess "saw the point," opened her guest room, and asked us both to walk in and take possession. We did so, and no reference was made to the difference in race again while we occupied it, but we were cared for in the kindest manner. I hav often heard of Mrs. —— saying that she learned a lesson at that time she had never forgotten. We of the North hav always indulged in the most bitter prejudice against color. No matter how refined and charming a person may be, if we can discover the least taint of color we make them social outcasts. At the same time, how many ladies will take into their arms and caress with great fondness a black dog, bringing the mouth of the four-footed pet in close contact with their own! Such is the power of prejudice and fashion.

SAINT GEORGE AND THE DRAGON.

Infidelity at last is pulverized, Agnosticism has vanished into thin air, and Atheism is annihilated; for the arm of the Lord is revealed through the valiant knight who, armed cap-a-pie, mounted the wooden horse in this chief city of Suckerdom, and, in the Opera House last evening, boldly charged upon the man of straw, whom he labeled "The Modern Pagan" in honor of Robert Ingersoll, and completely demolished him—in his mind. If influence of mind, in a metaphysical way, could obtain over Ingersoll, the Christians would hav paralyzed him long ago. Columns of free puffs, in the way of interviews, heralded this modern Saint George, who promised to utterly destroy the "fiery dragon and bring him down to slaughter" as easily as he pocketed political perquisits when a carpet-bagging member of Governor Pinchback's administration in Louisiana; but all the free puffing of the entire press failed to catch the crowd. It is customary, when Ingersoll lectures here, for the intellectual ninnies to harp on his obtaining from the crowd fifty cents per head for retailing his ribald blasphemy, but no such objection was made to Colonel Sheridan's dispensing the true milk of the word at whatever he could secure. That fine discrimination was, I presume, on account of his failure to get a crowd. Nevertheless, this warrior bold merrily sang his lay for ordinary opera-house figures of admission. As a prelude to attacking "The Modern Pagan," Saint George admitted Ingersoll was "a good husband, a kind father, a stanch friend, and a patriotic citizen." If that is the result of paganism, let us hav more of it and less Christianity. Sincerity is the soul of ethics, and how heavily burdened with that commodity this modern Saint George is may best be learned from a friend who met him the day after his debut as lecturer in Washington, while pleasantly fumbling in his pocket the box-office receipts and chuckling to himself over the boom the deacons and divines had given him the night previous. The friend congratulated him on his success. "Success!" exclaimed Saint George; "why, I hav just raised merry hell with him"—meaning Ingersoll—or words to that effect.

CHICAGO SECULAR UNION.

I had about concluded that I had better not write THE TRUTH SEEKER for several reasons: First, inability to make myself clearly understood to a large portion of its readers. Second, in so doing I might injure more than help both the paper and the cause I espouse. Third, that my duties multiply to that degree that it seems almost impossible to get a moment's rest; and last, but not least, that our secretary, Mrs. Freeman, is so much more able to keep you informed of what transpires here worthy of note. However, seeing nothing from our society for so long a time, we just wish to assure the Liberals that we hav not fallen into "masterly inactivity," but are carrying on the war with unabated vigor. The accompanying circular, some thousands of which were distributed in hotels, public libraries, etc., might be of use to other societies:

To accommodate Freethinkers from all parts of the city the Secular Union has leased the elegant and commodious hall, up two flights of stairs, 116 and 118 Fifth avenue (Mail Building), and will occupy it for regular Sunday evening meetings. The exercises at these meetings consist of a lecture, three-quarters of an hour to one hour in length, followed by criticism and discussion. The lecturer selects his subject, and the society is in no way responsible for his views or his manner of handling it. In the discussion each speaker is allowed ten minutes to criticise or discuss the lecture. The number of debaters is necessarily limited to five or six. The lecturer is given ten minutes in which to reply to critics.

The committee on lecturers will, as in the past, procure the very best talent, and present for the society's consideration vital and practical topics. As far as possible they will avoid consecutiv lectures on any one subject.

The following will giv an idea of our ordinary themes: Historical, current, and comparativ religious ideas, lessons from the lives of eminent Freethinkers, evolution in all its phases, industrial, economic, political, social, and ethical questions.

May 1st, Mr. George Collins will lecture on "Genesis versus Succession of Life in Geological Times." May 8th, Mr. E. A. Stevens will lecture on "Secularism versus God in the Constitution." May 15th, Mrs. A. M. Freeman will lecture on "Men and their Gods." May 22d, Prof. P. Baumgras will lecture on "Equality and its Relation to Political and Social Reforms." May 29th, James Abbott, Esq., will lecture on "The Truths of Spiritualism."

Other lecturers engaged are Gen. M. M. Trumbull, Col. A. J. Grover, Capt. W. P. Black, Mr. Otto Wettstein, of Rochelle, Ill.; Dr. Clevinger, Judge Paige, Profs. Hill and Sommers, Wm. Zimmermann, Esq., Messrs. W. F. Furay, L. H. Sawyer, and many others who hav devoted special attention to the various forms of Freethought.

The Chicago Secular Union is subordinate to the American

Secular Union, which is organized on the basis of the Nine Demands of Liberalism. It is a Freethought organization, and offers an absolutely free platform. All who can indorse the Nine Demands are invited to coöperate.

In addition to the program for May—the principal lecture of which thus far was that of Mrs. Freeman, who seems at every succeeding effort to surpass her former brilliant record, and met with encomiums from Gen. M. M. Trumbull and W. F. Furay such as these Nestors of literature and Liberalism are seldom in the habit of pronouncing—we hav had lectures from the best talent the West affords, which includes the gentlemen named above, together with Dr. E. S. Clevinger, Prof. E. R. Paige, Dr. E. S. McLeod, and other gentlemen of science. The argumentativ lecture on "The Errors of Spiritualism," by James Abbott, was so highly appreciated that he was invited to giv his views on the "Truths of Spiritualism," which will be the closing lecture of our regular season.

It is gratifying, amid our many discouragements, to know that we hav sown seed on good ground and that the prominent workers in the Minerva Society of Scandinavian Freethinkers are young men whose first idea of mental liberty was the result of their attendance on our meetings, and they hav been ably assisted by Bros. A. C. Berg and Olaf Olsen Ray. Mrs. Freeman was invited to make their closing address, and did so amid rapturous applause. They had also a fine musical and literary program arranged for the occasion. There were some four hundred ladies and gentlemen present. It is highly probable that when they reconvene in the fall they will organize as a Secular Union.

Our semi-annual election of officers occurred on the first Sunday in May, with the following result: President, E. A. Stevens; vice-presidents, Messrs. Bolton, Fraenkel, Freeman, and Card; secretary, Mrs. A. M. Freeman; financial secretary and treasurer, J. W. Howe.

All the officers were elected unanimously. The president appointed Dr. E. S. McLeod chairman of the lecture committee, he having performed splendid service in that capacity during the term just passed.

Mr. Howe has so far recovered from the loss of his leg that he is now able to locomote on an artificial appendage sufficient to attend the meetings and gather in the finances.

Dr. McLeod is making arrangements for Dr. J. L. York's visit to Chicago, which will be about July 3d or 10th, or both. All THE TRUTH SEEKER friends should coöperate. My address will be found under the heading of the Secular Union department.

News and Notes.

Sunday, May 15th, I come to Sacramento, where the stately capitol building greets the eye. Sacramento has about thirty thousand inhabitants. It is the railroad center of the state, every line of travel finding its way to this point. It has large railroad shops where engins and cars are constructed, employing about two thousand men. The industrial facilities of Sacramento are superior to any in the state; and it looks as if it would be the Manchester of the Pacific coast.

N. D. Goodell is our pioneer at this point, a 'Forty-niner who has been through all the rough and tumble and glory of early California life. A remarkable experience these 'Forty-niners hav had, coming over the vast plains by a three months' journey, a wearisome way to the land of gold, where bright fortune shone before one like an enchanted lake, flashing and fading alternately. Adventurous, heroic, indomitable men were these 'Forty-niners, and the early life of California was one where big brain and muscle were constantly on hand, for enterprise and conquest. The elements of power were here, and of amazing growth, and California feels to-day the throb of that intense activity which gave such coloring and splendor to her vigorous and romantic youth. What changes hav passed since then over this vast territory—a hundred iron horses, where once the slow caravan trailed along, and fruits of every variety adorning the dusty plain which in the eagerness for gold was left uncared for, but which now givs richer promis to the state than even the exhaustless mines! California is yet upon the threshold of its greatness, and its future is to be apparently more brilliant than its wonderfully poetic past.

Home-like and pleasant I find it at the comfortable residence of N. D. Goodell, around which all the flowers are blooming amidst the verdant glory of springtime and the songs of many birds that seem happy in the gorgeous morning as in a palace of delight. This is a truly Liberal household, for though all are not of one faith, the spirit is one of generous humanity. Mrs. Goodell and the daughter belong to the Congregational church, but with abundant hospitality for different thought, and the Infidel rejoices in the welcome where creeds are forgotten and gentleness prevails.

A fair audience was present on Sunday evening at Pioneer Hall. A good beginning was made, I think, for future lectures, and I was glad to meet with enthusiastic friends, some from out of the city, and realize that interest in Freethought is broadening and deepening. I shall lecture twice again at Sacramento—next Sunday and a week from next Sunday, after my return from the Yosemite Valley, if a hall can be secured; and so in my next letter I shall hav more to say of this bright and busy point, and the friends I meet here.

Monday morning I journeyed among the hills to Grass Valley, one of the oldest and liveliest mining towns in the state. The gold-bearing quartz seems to be inexhaustible in the rock-ribbed hights about it, and enormous mills are kept constantly at work. This is a Methodist camping-ground. Many of the miners are Cornishmen, and they go in heavy for religion, most of them. There are also a great many Catholics in the place, and the churches hav a pretty large sway, and there was uncertainty as to how these first Freethought lectures would be received. The welcome on the whole was quite favorable. Between three and four hundred were present the first evening, Monday, May 16th, and nearly five hundred the second evening. The attention was good, and Freethought ideas found a promising reception, especially "The New Heaven and Earth"—the pictures of a new society and a better brotherhood of mankind.

Mr. and Mrs. Van Horter are the kind of friends that make the pathway of the pilgrim one of flowers and cheerful entertainment. They hav been in this country through all its varied fortunes. They hav been burnt out seven times, but hav never given up the ghost. With something left they hav started ahead and checkmated ill-luck. Nearly seventy years of age, they are bright and happy as little children. They mean to hav a good time in this world whatever fate may do. They built their home on the hillside, and out of the very bosom of the rocks hav made the flowers grow and the green trees spread their glittering roofs, and it is an elegant retreat indeed. They also own the opera house in which I spoke, and gave it on most generous terms for the use of the lectures. Their bright sociability and enthusiastic earnestness for Freethought made them delightful co-workers in this mountain campaign.

I also had the pleasure of meeting Thomas Paine, a real Thomas Paine, with the spirit of the mighty martyr in every drop of his blood. He too is one of the "Argonauts" of this golden continent, and has been in many an adventure for fortune's smiles, and though nearly seventy years of age still looks forward, not to the spirit-land, but to the golden age of humanity.

By the kindness of H. J. Snow and A. G. Peterson I was enabled to visit the Idaho, Ophir, and North Star mines, where machinery and buildings to the value of over a million dollars are in use for the development of the ore. The vast machineries, thundering day and night, crushing thousands of tons, are run by water-power, the turbine wheel, with Pelton's process, which is a wonderfully simple invention by which enormous power is attained. This process was only patented about three years ago, and it is now in use throughout this country, Mexico, South America, etc., and is an immense saving. Mr. Pelton used to liv among these mountains struggling with poverty, and devoting years to the perfection of his theory, which, like the standing of Columbus's egg on end, is the simplest thing in the world when you know how. It consists in splitting the water instantly it strikes the bucket, and it flies off, and there is no particle of accummulation in the buckets, however swift the revolution. Thus the whole pressure of the water, from two to five hundred feet, goes into the motion of the wheel, and the power obtained by one little wheel only a foot in diameter is amazing. Wherever water pressure can be secured this wheel is of priceless service. It furnishes power with marvelous facility and cheapness.

Miners generally are Liberal. I had good numbers at my meetings. When they understand the aims and purposes of Freethought, they are in thorough sympathy, for they see that its philosophy is that of happiness and progress, and the glory of labor, and the destruction of poverty.

Among our good allies in Grass Valley, with those already mentioned, are Joseph Lee, through whose efforts mainly the course of lectures was given; Mr. Russell, Mr. Pinckham, Mr. McCormack, Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. Fisher, Mr. Cossler, Dr. Jamison, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Richardson, Messrs. Whitfield, Hood, Leeman, Hanson, Totten, Whitney, etc.

Mr. Frank Beckett and Miss Lizzie Twitchell furnished excellent instrumental music for the meetings, and added greatly to their interest. Mr. Van Horter presided. Two of the orthodox clergy were present, and they seemed to enjoy the proceedings. The audience was representativ of the best element in the community. I am quite well satisfied with the advancement of the work here, and look forward to better results.

Next week I shall go to Yosemite, where I shall let nature do all the talking. I will be a silent pilgrim before the wondrous eloquence of the mountains, woods, and rivers.

I expect to lecture once more on my return at Sacramento, and then I shall begin my campaign in Oregon and Washington Territory. I shall be at Ashland, June 5th; at Talent, June 12th; and between these dates at Central Point, etc. I shall be in Coos county from June 13th to June 21st. I shall be at Silverton, June 22d, 23d, and 24th. I shall be at Salem, Portland, Corvallis, Forest Grove, Seattle, Port Townsend, and other places, but hav not yet been able to arrange the dates. I expect plenty of work and a good time in the North.

The Free Religious Association.

A platform has been kept free and open to speakers of all religions and no religion for twenty years by this society, whose annual convention and festival were held on Friday, May 27th, in Tremont Temple, Boston. The chief theme of discussion was whether more attention should be given to solving problems of practical interest to society, like those presented by the existence of poverty and crime, from a scientific standpoint, and it was generally agreed that this would necessitate a complete reorganization, possibly including change of name. Omission of the words "Free Religious" from the title was recommended by Mr. G. W. Stevens, on the ground that what the members called religion was only a cold philosophy without real influence. He himself had no interest in any but practical questions, and in order to solve these he would hav more stress laid upon respect for scientific thought, as well as for the rights of society. He held that the Anarchists condemned at Chicago were as truly usurpers as Louis XIV. Then the Rev. M. J. Savage, after telling how deeply he had been impressed, while still an orthodox minister, by a calm, clear, electrifying address at one of the Free Religious Association conventions by O. B. Frothingham, went on to show how fast Unitarianism was improving, for instance in respect for Theodore Parker. He also dwelt upon the importance of religion. To which Mr. W. M. Salter, of Chicago, replied by insisting upon the superior importance of morality. Moncure D. Conway mentioned that Mr. Savage had omitted to speak of the chief excellence of Unitarianism. It is the one single church which teaches that man is to be saved by his own merits. Christianity is the only religion which claims to save men by the merits of others. Unitarianism stands above all other forms of Christianity in its respect for morality. Those who looked for the reappearance of the Star of Bethlehem, however, should turn their eyes to Mr. Salter's Ethical Society, or to the plan just proposed for reorganization. Before hearing of this, he had been thinking of making a similar suggestion that very forenoon; and he felt encouraged to recommend that the Free Religious Association resolve itself into a society for the advancement of ethical and religious science. Dr. Adler had already set the egg on the broad end, as Columbus did, by planting religion on the moral sentiment. Could Christianity be made a perfect moral system by leaving out the miracles and whatever else is supernatural? No. Christian morality is also supernatural. It is based on the dogma of a speedy millennium, and therefore it is impracticable. So is Socialism. What we ought to do, as an association, is to advance ethical truth by scientific methods. Some definit and practical method is much more needed, according to Professor Davidson, than any new statement of aims. If we are to hav churches, they must be based on science, and instead of the pulpit, which merely givs a set of desultory Sunday lectures, there should be a series of schools and lyceums.

Too much time was given in this convention to definitions of religion, but this is an old habit of the Free Religious Association, which will not, I fear, be abandoned until some such name is adopted as that of Progressiv Association, proposed by Captain Adams, of Montreal.

This last gentleman led the afternoon discussion of Sunday reform, which, he said, was a movement of the good men against the God men. If God wanted any observance of Sunday not necessary for the plain good of man, why didn't he make the cows giv twice as much milk as usual on Saturday, and let it keep over Sunday? The Canada ministers wanted no running of ferries or horse cars, and no making of gas, except for the benefit of the churches; in other words, no breaking of the Sabbath, except in the service of the Lord. Does God care more for the jangle of bells than for a good concert? Good deeds hav no Sabbath. All for man, and let God take care of himself! Then Judge Putnam showed in the most effectiv speech of the day that the Sunday law was nowhere enforced, for it prevented scarcely anyone from doing as he wished, though it did enable many rascals to defraud their neighbors.

A delightful festival closed the day.

The Defense Association's Appeal for Mrs. Slenker.

The readers of Freethought journals know something of the arrest of Mrs. Slenker—long familiarly called Aunt Elmina—and of the charge upon which her arrest was made. It may be easy to suspect, but impossible to ascertain, the meaning of it all and the motivs which led to its accomplishment. The officers of the National Defense Association hav made as much investigation of the affair as has been possible up to this time, and they desire to make an announcement and an appeal to the Liberals of the United States, especially to those who hav heretofore, in the Bennett case and others, lent generous support to efforts made in behalf of defending the freedom of speech, press, and mails. The friends of Elmina, who hav made her acquaintance in person or by correspondence, and those who only know her by her published writings, can hav no doubt that she is correctly described as an unusually frank, truthful, earnest, studious, and virtuous woman. Under the recent stress of circumstances, when it would be merely human to deny, conceal, or prevaricate, and perhaps even proper and wise to confess nothing, she has made open avowal of the work she has been trying to do. The hounds that put themselvs to the task of destroying her must hav quickly discovered these traits of her character, and of course saw that they had an easy victim to entrap. Had they been content with buying that which she offered for sale, and making the most of that, their action would hav been despicable enough to earn for them the contempt of decent men and women; but words fail to express the depth of their infamy as made evident to us by facts in hand. We hav no absolute proof, but we are entirely convinced that the plot against Mrs. Slenker included the plan—not unheard of among this class of villains—of making the evidence before seizing it. Mrs. Slenker had, of late, invited from her correspondents recitals of personal experiences in the private affairs of life, which she was accustomed to loan to others interested in the same subjects, after removing from these private letter the names of the writers. Many of these were so plain-spoken as to be startling to anybody but a physician who has become accustomed to such things day after day, or to those in Elmina's circle, who could look beneath the scum on the surface to find interest only in the curious facts of human life as illustrated in these self-dissections.

Elmina became so much absorbed in this search for facts in the domain of heredity, human experiences in sexology, and instances of vagaries or perversions in the domain of sexual pathology, that, like the zoölogical student of mud-puddles or the physiological investigator of excreta, she may hav lost delicate appreciation of that which is and that which is not nice; but, more unfortunate than this, considering the line of her investigations, she lost sight of this—that in studying man as an animal, allowance must be made for the fact that there are specimens so depraved as to lie shamefully and maliciously So it happened that when she received from some of her newly-found correspondents letters that were full of decoy and deceit, and, worse yet, well salted with recitals of horrible tales that would open Elmina's eyes with surprise, she, overlooking the vicious, lying propensities of man, and for the time having her attention concentrated upon his proneness to sexual vices, accepted these overdrawn ebullitions of vile imaginings as actual facts, and no doubt passed them along to some one else in the circle to show the terrible results of natural propensities unnaturally repressed, and unguided by proper instruction. Some of us are in a position to know just about how unspeakably low down mankind may go in perversions of legitimate functions, but we also know what unmitigated liars and infernal scoundrels the tribe of Comstockian post-office detectivs are, and therefore we conclude (having also other indications to determin our conclusion) that Elmina has been the victim of a foul conspiracy, in this way—that the conspirators hav provided her with letters which they hav afterward seduced her to send by mail to others in the conspiracy, or captured among her effects when making the final seizure at her home. The whole plot has been on a par with, but more dastardly than, that by which bunco-steerers in large cities ensnare green folks from the country. We cannot deny that Elmina has been too green, too confiding, too much enthused, perhaps, with one idea, but we do deny that she has offended even against the Comstock mail law under which she is to be tried, and this, granting the worst that could be said of what she has sent by mail. Several courts hav ruled that sealed letters are privileged communications, and cannot be interfered with under this law. Other courts hav ruled the other way, but the Supreme Court has never ruled on this issue, and this case should be carried to that tribunal, if necessary. We imagin there would be few American citizens who would favor any law making it possible for an officer to listen at a key-hole to private conversation, and then walk in and arrest the persons for comparing notes, thoughts, or opinions on any subject, using for this purpose any words they might choose; and why should it be any more justifiable to interfere with a private conference by mail where written letters must take the place of spoken words? The conspiracy against Elmina is doubtless but a part of the general conspiracy now manifest in various parts of this free-born country to gradually abridge the liberties of its people; to steal away their birthright to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in the manner constitutionally provided for them by the Freethinking, far-seeing, and hard-fighting fathers of the country, and to leave instead a mess of pottage made up of "Christian morality" compounded by hypocritical priests, soap-boilers, and sneaking bloodhounds. Now, if the Freethinkers will be far-seeing enough, they will at once become hard fighters, like their sires of '76, and repel the invaders. We say in the words of the Winsted Press that "it is the duty of every man who is a man to giv her support and sympathy, for her cause is his cause and the cause of liberty everywhere," and we now invite such support in the form of money subscriptions to the Elmina defense fund. She has advised with us, and desires us to take charge of this matter in her behalf, and in the fight that is to come contributors to the fund hav from us and from her the assurance that there will be no cringing, no dodging of straight issues, no compromise of Liberal principles. We hope to make a square and successful fight for the protection and maintenance of individual rights, and to that end we will ever pray that Liberals will be liberal—which in the last analysis means, after all, alive to their own interests. Subscriptions may be sent to either of the undersigned.

A Letter from Mr. Reynolds.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Rejoicing with my loved ones at my return to our happy home—from which I hav been absent since last December—I desire to return my grateful thanks to each and every one of the kind friends whose sympathy and aid sustained me during the annoyance, worry, and expense attendant on my persecution by the bigots of New Jersey.

To Col. R. G. Ingersoll, who, when I first informed him of my arrest in Boonton, generously promised to defend me, no words can express my gratitude or that of my wife and children. Never was promis more royally kept. His grand effort in behalf of liberty of speech will for all time continue to do wondrously effectiv work for Liberalism.

I am sure all the friends will heartily indorse the views of Dr. E. B. Foote in regard to the reimbursing of Colonel Ingersoll for the money expended, and I very highly appreciate the generous donation, by Dr. E. B. Foote and son, of the entire amount of the fine. But it is just like them—genuin Liberals—the study and happiness of their lives is the alleviation of human suffering and the promotion of liberty.

To attempt to correct or contradict the many silly and malicious misrepresentations in some secular and many religious papers would be useless. But I do desire that all Liberals should know the facts. Even according to the Jersey law I was not guilty of blasphemy. There is no low, improper, or obscene word in my pamphlet, "Blasphemy and the Bible," for the free distribution of which I was indicted. The pamphlet was written in self-defense, simply with the desire to prove that the Bible and those who insist that its every word is inspired of God were the real blasphemers; that the Bible was not a safe moral guide, nor the best saints of the Old Testament, indorsed by the New, persons whose example it was safe or creditable to follow.

I did not, in my Tent at Boonton or elsewhere, ever use abusiv or blasphemous words, only in reading the Bible, always giving chapter and verse and carefully omitting the filthy and obscene words. The bitterly prejudiced bigot, Judge Childs, in his charge admitted:

> Blasphemy is only committed by uttering such things in a scoffing and railing manner out of a reproachful disposition, as it were, in the speaker, rather than with any purpose of propagating his irreverent opinion. If he has merely asserted his disbelief in all the popular notions of Christianity, without attempting by impious and abusiv or blasphemous remarks to wound the feelings of the whole Christian community, he will not hav committed an offense of which the law can take notice.

It was because I did confine myself to the Bible and did not use any indecent language, but so fully and convincingly laid bare the facts, that Christians, realizing their inability to answer me or refute my assertions, endeavored to imprison me.

The pamphlet, "Blasphemy and the Bible," was simply a defense of my views and principles. The cartoon may or may not be in bad taste. I call attention to the fact that it was not referred to in the indictment under which I was tried.

The edition of "Blasphemy and the Bible" is exhausted, but a new edition has just been issued by the Truth Seeker Company. They will mail a copy to any address on receipt of price, ten cents.

The Liberal Club.

The regular reporter of the Liberal Club did not get there on the occasion of which this is an account. It isn't necessary to say why he wasn't there, but he takes this opportunity to repel the insinuation that it was for the reason stated in the anonymous report here appended. The manuscript reveals the handwriting of a well-known lawyer, and reads like this:

> "A little nonsense now and then
> Is relished by the wisest men.

"Thus wrote good old Butler, and thus thought the Executiv Committee of the club when they arranged that on the last Friday in May they would 'drop into poetry,' and offer the members and audience a varied program. They certainly touched the right spot in the heart of the club, and their efforts were very successful. Nothing could be more bright and happy than the spirit of enjoyment that pervaded the audience. All Thomas-hawks were buried, old-time feuds were hastily tucked away out of sight. Everybody seemed glad to see everybody else. Thus doth music soothe the savage breast. The man with the badge-pin was not there. He probably preferred to get his music where he could hav a slight infusion of beer. In his absence a new hand takes hold of the bellows. Mr. Wakeman was watching the growth of his cabbages fifty miles away. All regretted that the music could not exert its harmonious influences upon him. Mr. Sutherland and Herr Oppenheimer 'lay down together,' metaphorically. Captain Clark could not stand it, and left early. The program consisted of zither solo by Professor Davide, songs by Miss Susie Russell and Mr. and Mrs. Schultze, and recitations by Miss Dixon—all of the highest order of merit, and all applauded by several encores. Mrs. Leonard acted as impressario, and to her energy the success of the evening's entertainment was principally due. The effect of the entire musical program was greatly enhanced by the perfection of the fine Sohmer piano used on the occasion, and it probably was instrumental, so to speak, in producing the marked harmony which prevailed.

"The lectures will be continued during the month of June. A NEW HAND."

There is no doubt that the foregoing report is accurate in its statement of facts, and probably the distich by the Hon. Benj. F. Butler is correctly quoted; but it is to be regretted that the reference to the man with the badge-pin was not omitted or eliminated by the Editor. So far as it relates to the date in question, as aforesaid, it is pervaded with error.

J. L. ANDREW'S post-office address is Liberal, Mo.

MRS. H. S. LAKE speaks at Bridgeport, Conn., June 5th, 19th, and 26th; at Parkland Camp-meeting, Pa., June 12th; at Onset Bay, July 23d and 24th; at Cassadaga Camp, Aug. 17th, 19th, 21st, and 23d; at Norwich, Conn., the Sundays of October; at Berkley Hall, Boston, the Sundays of December. Address, 123 West Concord street, Boston, Mass.

THE "Right Reverend" John A. Watterson, Roman Catholic bishop of Columbus, Ohio, has just completed a tour of the "holy land." The New York Herald, in reporting his return, givs the objects of his journey. "He sought," he says, "for the rents made in the rocks of Calvary at the time of the death of Christ, as recorded in the scriptures, and put his hand into some of these fissures. He carefully satisfied himself that what is now venerated as Mount Calvary—the authenticity of which has been denied by some—was outside the ancient walls, and is really the Golgotha of the Bible. He otherwise confirmed his faith by studious examinations of the sacred spots. Bishop Watterson, in referring to the objections sometimes made by non-Catholics to relics and objects of veneration, from the idea they hav that what purports to be the same thing is venerated in two totally different places, spoke of the column of the scourging, which is kept in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem, while there is another column, ignorantly called by some the column of the scourging, shown in the Church of St. Praxides, in Rome. The two things, the bishop declared, are totally different, both in shape and in material, and therefore cannot both be columns of the scourging. The one in Rome, Bishop Watterson declared, is the column to which the savior was tied at the house of Caiaphas on the night of his passion. Many instances of this kind are to be met with in the Holy Land, owing to the schismatical Christians having set up objects and places for veneration to discredit those held sacred from time immemorial by Roman Catholics." The bishop was very fortunate in his search, and is very successful in explaining apparent discrepancies in the histories of relics. His success is as notable as that of Constantine's mother, who always found any pious relic she sought, whether it was the city of Nazareth, or the cross upon which Jesus suffered, or the tomb from which he arose. When she dreamed where anything was, it had to be there on time or trouble arose. If Constantine's mother and Bishop Watterson had been contemporaneous, they would no doubt hav discovered every article mentioned in the Bible. But it is better, said Josh Billings, to not know so many things than to know so many things that are not so.

Tales Told Out of School.

THE REV. DR. JONES'S REPORT CONTINUED.—AN ESTIMATE OF INGERSOLL.

The committee, you will recollect, gave me instructions to inquire particularly as to the real influence which the speeches and writings of Colonel Ingersoll hav had in producing the paralysis of faith among the people, over which we all so deeply mourn, and for which we desire to find a remedy. I was personally acquainted with this man's father in days gone by, and hav often wondered how by the law of inherited characteristics his son has become so errant from the footsteps of the flock. His case is a paradoxical one. There is not in the whole country a citizen so well known and so thoroughly popular as Ingersoll. The genial nature of the man, his undoubted honesty in his views of religion, his amazing eloquence, flavored as it is with the Attic salt of wit, and his sublime courage in attacking a system of religion which has strengthened by the growth of eighteen centuries, hav given him the highest place in the admiration of his countrymen. Notwithstanding all our devices to limit his hearing, and dull the edge of his weapons, he commands the largest audiences wherever he goes. Christians in full communion, as I know to be the case, will leave their own churches of a Sabbath night and giv any price to hear him, and, what is worse, will cheer to the echo, with the rest of the audience, the most savage thrusts he makes with his deadly rapier into the very bowels of our theology. Yet, with all this real popularity, I do not think he could be elected to any office in the gift of the people. If this judgment be correct, it reveals a most important yet paradoxical fact, to wit: that although the church in this country, when compared to the rest of the population, is in a small minority, she is so completely organized, possesses so much wealth, has such prestige by long and unquestioned occupancy of the ground, and such control of the public eye, ear, and conscience through her eighty thousand clergymen, who address their audiences twice every Sabbath, and sometimes during the week, that the politicians would not dare to set up a candidate for high office who is known to be opposed to the church and her religion. Each denomination is an affiliated association, and if they all combined together, and had a password, as they would hav in an emergency, they could defeat any aspirant for political office. To this wonderful control of the public sentiment I attribute two facts—first, the deference which all the railroad directors feel it their policy to pay to the clergy as such in furnishing the whole of the eighty odd thousand of us half-fare tickets, which of course abates the stockholders' dividends to the amount of many thousand dollars a year. Free passes are given to judges, legislators, and politicians of influence, because in their lines they can help the railroads. But clergymen hav no such influence, and the favor granted to them springs from the reverence felt for their high character as embassadors of Jesus Christ, and the servants of God and his church.

The second fact is that, with all the grumbling we hear from the Philistines, in no state legislature or national Congress has anyone been bold enough to propose the taxation of church property. To the Infidel and worldly taxpayer, who cannot appreciate divine things, it seems fair that as such property is protected by the state, and in case of its destruction by a mob the church corporation owning it can recover damages from the public treasury to the full amount of its value, the church people, like other citizens, should pay taxes on their property. But we are beleaguered by a powerful enemy, and cannot afford to be overmuch scrupulous in the matter of dollars and cents, and must therefore hold on to the ground we hav so long occupied at all hazards. We must stand by the old claim that the church is the authoritativ voice of God to society, as the New York Christians hav done in bringing about the enactment of their Sabbath laws. These devoted and heroic men, with Brother Jesup at their head, hav still succeeded in closing the museums of art and natural history against the public on the Lord's day. The anti-Sabbatarians of that city are in an overwhelming majority, seven hundred thousand of them never going near the sanctuary of God at any time. Moreover, they pay their share of the taxes out of which these public institutions are supported. Yet, such is their secret reverence for the church and her divine authority, that this vast army of opposition and indifferentism fall back into abeyance to her, as Dagon fell prostrate before the ark of the Lord when the men of Ashdod took that emblem of divinity into their idolatrous temple. Prestige is a great thing. It takes, by divine right, the power out of the hands of the majority, and givs it to the minority who are better than they, just as the prophet Samuel took the crown from off the head of King Saul, and placed it on the head of David, the son of Jesse the Bethlehemite. As it would be suicide in the church to giv up this prestige, we must imitate the zeal of our Covenanter brethren, and insist upon the claim that this nation is a religious corporation, capable of worship, and accountable to God for its laws and policy.

Still, with all this prestige of orthodoxy and power in the land, we hav been unable to cripple the popularity and influence of Ingersoll. His works form a library of themselvs, and they are read everywhere. Were he a member of the church, or did he conceal his sentiments in regard to religion, as so many of the politicians do, he could hav any office or honor he wished. I went on two occasions to hear him, and to find out if I could the secret of his power which has so appalled us. I noticed other ministers in the audience, whom I knew, and who, I suppose, came from the same motiv that took me there, and they laughed as loudly as the rest when he held up to ridicule some of the most sacred doctrins of the Christian creed. I saw scores of intelligent and respectable looking people standing on their feet in a crowded room for two mortal hours and more listening to this man. They would not stand ten minutes in such uncomfortable circumstances listening to Dr. Hall, Dr. Crosby, or any other orthodox minister. Many of our brethren who hav never seen or heard Ingersoll suppose it is his talent for ridicule and ribaldry that makes him popular, and that his audiences are made up of the low and ignorant classes who are regaled with such miserable diet. But there never was a greater mistake. We hav watched him with the eyes of a basilisk. We hav shadowed him in his outgoings and incomings, and, his enemies being judges, his life is absolutely stainless. It would help us to neutralize his influence if we could prove that he was either drunken, licentious, or dishonest in his dealings; but his character as a man seems to be without blemish. The mother of this Infidel Achilles, when he was born, must hav given him a second dip into the Styx, for neither of his heels is vulnerable to our arrows. There are mysteries in our religion—Joseph's dream, for instance; the immaculate conception of Jesus; the parental relation mutually existing between Christ and the Holy Ghost in the constitution of the Holy Trinity; the perpetual virginity of Mary, the mother of Jesus, who had a family of children, which is the chief doctrin of the Catholic church; all these, if Ingersoll's taste ran in that line, what could he not do with them in the way of ridicule? He seems, however, to loathe all indelicate subjects as he would leprosy. He is one of the few witty men of the world who hav not forgotten that his mother, wife, sisters, and daughters are women; and that all obscene and indelicate language is an insult to them. In regard, therefore, to his taste and sexual morality, he is covered with a harness of mail which bids defiance to all our weapons.

Ingersoll's audiences are obviously composed of the most intelligent people, who would go to sleep in fifteen minutes under the soporific influence of the usual orthodox sermon on the Sabbath, but who never seem to grow weary in listening to him in his attacks upon the church and Bible. I think I am safe in saying that the eighteen hundred years of the church's history has produced no enemy to Christianity to be at all compared in ability and success among the people to this man. Michael Servetus was condemned to death at Geneva because he could not accept as an article of faith the doctrin of the eternal sonship of Christ in the adorable godhead, alleging that it taught the absurdity of a child being as old as its father. What would the syndics of that city, in that age of faith and religious zeal, hav done with Ingersoll, who sweeps away every one of the doctrins of the Bible, and denies the very existence of God himself? I remember when those who read Paine's "Age of Reason" did so stealthily, lest they would lose their reputation if the fact were known. To-day that book is orthodox and innocent of harm when compared to the writings and speeches of Ingersoll, and those of Spencer, Darwin, Huxley, and others, which lie for perusal and ornament on the center tables of our best families. Even Bishop Watson, Paine's antagonist, had to express his admiration of those passages in the "Age of Reason" where the author dwells on the goodness of God, and professes his faith in the immortality of the soul. His argument for the existence of a God derived from motion we hav all used in the pulpit from time immemorial. But the Agnostic books of our day, which ignore all that Paine taught on the subject, are for sale on the railroad cars and everywhere else, and a perusal of them seems to be as fatal to a man's religion as a dose of prussic acid would be to his life. The liberty of the press, run into the ground as it is, will not allow us to hav an index expurgatorius to which we can consign such writings and keep them out of the way of our people, but they are read and on sale everywhere.

Ingersoll does not aim to mix the poison of his heretical works and words with sugar, as the Infidel writers of our popular magazines do. Boldly, like Mark Anthony at the funeral of Cæsar, he speaks "right on," the ideas flowing from his lips and pen like a delicious but deadly distillation, and woe be to him who takes a draught of it, or even tastes it, for although he may not feel the effect immediately upon his system, when the Sabbath comes, and he goes to church, he finds that all the serious parts of the service pall upon his appetite, and reveal the fact that unbelief is knocking for admittance at the door of his heart. He smiles incredulously at the most sacred truths, and when a person can do this it is an infallible sign that he is already a pupil in the school of doubt, and unless rescued will soon graduate in the class of open Infidels.

One thing that givs Ingersoll a mighty advantage before the unconverted world, and even before the half-Christian world, is the fact that, layman as he is, he marches up and down before the serried ranks of the Christian ministry, Catholic and Protestant, composing an array of officers, from generals down to corporals, eighty thousand strong, daring them to meet him in a combat on the evidences of Christianity, on which topic they are supposed to be perfectly at home But among us all there is not a single David with his sling and stone who has the courage to accept the challenge of this proud and self-confident Philistine, and the skill to bring him to the ground! In the name of heaven, are there no more smooth stones in the brook? and no one in our ranks skilled enough to use the sling? I admit that out of the pulpit, and in a forensic debate, not many clergymen are fit to engage, as was shown in the debate, many years ago between Dr. Breckenridge and Bishop Hughs at Philadelphia, and Dr. Berg and Joseph Barker in the same city. I could, however, giv the names of at least twenty men in our church alone all abundantly able to do execution upon this Goliath of unbelief, who, like his illustrious predecessor, has despised and defied the armies of the living God so long; but not one of any note or competency accepts the challenge! The effect is that numbers of our young men, baptized members of the church, ask why, if Ingersoll is doing so much harm by his lectures and writings, our able ministers who assume to be watchmen on the walls of Zion—commissioned and salaried defenders of the gospel, soldiers of the cross, panoplied from top to toe in the truth—do not meet and conquer him. I hav often been interrogated after this fashion, and I admit I am at a loss to reply. They say it looks as though the clergy were conscious of having a bad case; and the presumption, without argument, is that Ingersoll is much more than half right in his views. They say their preachers are very brave in opening fire upon him from their pulpits, but they are always sure when they do so that he is a thousand miles away.

In discussing the subject of Ingersoll's influence for evil in this country, another alarming fact is that some of the most intelligent women in the church are beginning to giv way in their faith and zeal. Women in all ages hav been the mainstay of the church. The secret influence they exert upon their husbands and children is incalculable as a whole. If they should desert the churches, as the men do, the death-knell of religion would soon be heard sounding its melancholy tones all over the land. No wonder, then, that I noticed with astonishment and alarm, when I attended Ingersoll's lectures, that the women in the audience were not only as numerous as the men, but appeared to be remarkably intelligent, and to belong to the higher classes of society, such as you would see in our most fashionable churches on the Sabbath. The case seems to be this: The young men read heretical books, argue on the subject with the young women, and set them to thinking; and then, when Ingersoll or any other lecturer comes along, they take them to the lecture, which they must listen to in order to debate its merits afterward, and where their faith, if not shaken to pieces entirely, is undermined. In a religious family I visited, a remarkably interesting and intelligent young woman had received, as a present from her lover, who was a son of an eminent member of the church, a book called "Exeter Hall." After reading it, as her mother told me, from having been regular in her attendance at church, and a teacher in the Sunday-school, she ceased going altogether, and the next thing was that she procured all Ingersoll's works, and other publications of the kind, read them with intense satisfaction, and became, I fear, totally lost to the church. Her mother, hoping it might frighten her back to the church, read to her one day an extract from a sermon of Brother Talmage, in which he held up an Infidel woman to the loathing of his congregation. But, although she was a model of gentleness, she broke out like a volcano upon Talmage, saying that his utterances were as worthy of contempt as the braying of a donkey, and that he little knew what was going on in the minds of intelligent women nowadays in regard to the Christian religion.

A Baptist clergyman has achieved an uncomfortable notoriety by positivly declaring that Ingersoll does not really believe what he teaches, and only lectures against the church and Christianity in order to make money. But this "web-footed Christian," as Ingersoll facetiously calls him, is not a judicious defender of our imperiled faith, for his assertion, if it hav any truth in it at all, proves more than we wish it to prove, namely, that the defection from religion is so general in society at large that thousands, including multitudes of professing Christians, not only flock to hear this arch-heretic open the fire of his logic and ridicule upon religion, but pay him well for the privilege. Sub rosa.

is another of those blind guides to the people. Like his "web-footed" brother, he is as ignorant of the nature and extent of the present controversy with Infidelity as Lincoln was of the true proportion of the Rebellion in 1861, when, instead of enrolling an army of 500,000 men with half that number of reserves, as the Antislavery men advised, he called out 75,000 men, all raw and undisciplined in the art of war, expecting with such a force to suppress the rebellion in sixty days! Talmage is a man of great resources, but his mind is like the wareroom of a thrifty country merchant, filled with all manner of things—bar iron, salt, butter, oil of vitriol, gunpowder, and scores of other articles of trade, all thrown together in promiscuous confusion—and his mouth the door of egress. Under Paul, the wise master-builder, Talmage may be building on the right foundation, but his superstructure, like that erected by his neighbor, Mr. Beecher, consists chiefly of "wood, hay, and stubble," which the fires of the next generation will consume and leave behind a mournful desolation. The earnest and intelligent young people of the church who are becoming interested in the burning questions of the day, despise Brother Talmage as incompetent to discuss them, and as a coward who skulks into his pulpit on the Sabbath, where he knows he can make any statement he pleases without the danger of being called to account on the spot, thus confirming the old charge that the Christian pulpit is a coward's castle. From my intercourse with the Brooklyn brethren I think Dr. Talmage's copresbyters set but a small value indeed on his services as a defender of the faith. They do not believe that making hideous mouths, and throwing mud and filth at the Infidels from the pulpit, is of any more force, or any more hopeful of results, than a bombardment of muskets would be against the fortress of Gibraltar. No, non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis tempus eget. The cause of the church is not helped by the cry of no danger! There is danger, and he who would lull us into sleep and security is either a coward too chicken-hearted to fight, or a traitor who would lead us into ambush with our guns unloaded and our swords rusted in their scabbards.

I will not gratify the accursed indifference and slothfulness of the church by detracting the Infidels, and lying about them, saying that they are bad people in their lives; that they do not believe their own teachings; that they quarrel with the church solely because she is a constant rebuke to their immoralities; and that all the present opposition to religion will die with them. This is the short-sighted and unfair policy pursued in England and this country by Christians who forget the lesson which history teaches, that truth, although leaden-heeled and unable to overtake and trample down a fleet-footed lie in the short run, never fails to do so in the long run. Ingersoll is in dead earnest, and so are all those who are associated with him. So far as good morals are concerned, if the Infidels generally, and the lecturers particularly, were not persons of irreproachable lives, the press of the country, with its sharp eyes and keen scent, would soon publish the fact, and giv the evidence, as it does in the case of other transgressors. But these men brave unpopularity, accept poor pay for their services when they could make fortunes in other vocations, and devote themselvs to their work because, strange as it may appear to us, and horrible too, they believe religiously that the church now is, and always has been, a drawback to civilization; that her religion has no foundation in either fact or reason; and they are as sincere in their zeal to extirpate both as the old Crusaders were to deliver Jerusalem and the holy places from the dominion of the Saracens. And I fear that unless we arouse from our lethargy, and arm for the conflict, they will succeed.

The Bible and Evolution.

Numerous as are the views which the human mind is capable of forming in reference to the interpretation of the Bible, two rational theories only can be advanced in respect to the origin and purpose of the various fragmentary essays of which it is composed.

Put into the briefest form, the first of these theories is that the Bible is the very word of God, the infinit ruler of the universe, who, in order to reveal his will to mankind, and certain facts which, it is alleged, it was quite impossible for them to acquire of their own unaided efforts, in regard to their origin and destiny, employed certain wise men as his amanuenses, and inspired them to record with unerring accuracy all that he considered necessary for human welfare in this world and for salvation in the next.

The second theory is that the various essays which comprise the Bible were written at various periods by unknown authors, expressing their views on such difficult and diverse subjects as the origin of the world and man; his early history and development during barbaric ages; the laws by which he was governed, and many other matters relating to the early stages of his career.

Of these theories the former has been considerably shaken, if not proven entirely untenable, in recent years, not only by the critical labors of scholars, and the results of the researches of men of science, but by the fact that the alleged inspired record has been subjected to many searching revisions at the hands of the learned among the clergy themselvs. It is obvious that if this divine revelation left deity perfect it was a revelation only to those who first had it; it lost much of its perfection in translation, and those who believed in it during the long period previous to its revision believed in a revelation that was so imperfect that thousands of alterations hav had to be made, and it is generally admitted that the record, even in its revised condition, still contains numerous errors. But, taking it as a divinely-inspired production, there is no denying the fact that it should be regarded as true in all its parts; for once to call in question, even in the smallest degree, any of its statements is unquestionably to display a spirit of skepticism, which, allied with the exercise of free thought, and pursued to its logical end, would land the inquirer in the position of the Rationalist, who accepts only such portions of it as appear to harmonize with reason, common sense, and humanity. Regarding the Bible, then, in the light of an inspired book, we find ourselvs compelled either to repudiate altogether the plainest teachings of modern science, or so to twist and distort the language of these ancient writings, to make it harmonize with known facts, as to render its clearest statements absolutely worthless as a guide to its meaning. But regarded in the clear, shining light thrown upon the subject by the doctrin of evolution, or the gradual unfolding of natural phenomena, we find ourselvs in no such position of doubt and difficulty.

No longer is it necessary to believe that God, less than six thousand years ago, by a mere fiat, created the universe, threw into infinit space the innumerable stars and suns, molded the earth into form, caused the grass to grow and trees to yield fruit, the waters to "bring forth moving creatures that hav life," making the beasts of the field, and as a final effort producing man from the dust of the earth. When we regard these statements as the record of an ancient and ignorant people, all our difficulties are overcome. And if we therefore apply ourselvs rationally to a study of the Bible, discarding altogether the use of theological spectacles, we find in its ancient pages much that is useful and interesting to us as students of nature, and also much that assists us in understanding man's physical, mental, and moral progress in the past. We find that, so far from the Bible containing a true record of the events it professes to narrate, a careful consideration of its pages shows that it is inaccurate in its professed science, wrong in its history, and bad in its morality.

In point of fact, it shows that the early guesses of man, under the circumstances undoubtedly the best possible and doubtless very useful when considered as mere hypotheses, were pregnant with all sorts of errors, which it has taken thousands of generations to correct.

II.—BIBLE SCIENCE.

The Bible statements and the results of the researches of men of science we hav found to be entirely at variance. And this was to be expected. The knowledge of the ancient Jews respecting the phenomena of nature was at best of the scantiest character; and it is only natural to suppose that the most learned among them could not attain to that degree of knowledge which was quite possible to people of more recent ages.

Knowledge accumulates in the human mind as gradually as the shells of the little creatures at the bottom of the sea that build up our great chalk beds. And just as the geological deposits of one age differ from another, so does the knowledge of one age differ from that of the next.

If it is true that all our faculties hav been strengthened and developed by efforts and struggle, it is no less true that the highest faculty, the mind of man, is the last faculty that has been brought under cultivation, and that in the course of its development from the rude savage up to the man of the highest intellectual capacity, it has undergone numerous transitions—many of which may be distinctly traced in the religious books of various ancient peoples, and in a marked degree in the sacred writings of the Jews.

It must be remembered that the Bible contains two creation stories, obviously written by different persons at different times, and each contradicting the other in the most positiv manner. The first says that God commenced proceedings by creating the heavens and the earth."

Now, here it is obvious enough that the writer meant that God created the universe out of nothing; that at his word of command the "matter and force," or the something of which the heavens and the earth" were composed, were called into being.

By a knowledge of chemistry, however, we now learn that matter and force are alike indestructible; that not one atom of them can be destroyed; that, manifold as are the changes through which it is possible for them to pass, not a particle is ever lost, and that, being imperishable, it is rational to suppose that they never began to be.

The writers of Genesis, knowing nothing of chemistry, conceived that there was only one eternal being, viz., God, and that from him all other existences emanated.

Nor were they consistent in their surmises. Having predicated of their deity that he was infinit and eternal, they saw nothing contradictory in an infinit being producing something independent of himself. Yet it seems clear enough now that if deity created anything, it must hav been either out of himself or out of nothing. But it could not hav been produced out of himself without limiting himself by so much as was used in the creation or manipulation of the "heavens and of the earth." In such case the infinit deity would be rendering himself finite in order to make a world, or we should hav the anomaly of an infinit God existing side by side with a finite "heaven and earth," which is an absurdity.

Nor is it conceivable that deity could hav produced the "heavens and the earth" out of nothing, since the universe must hav been always occupied by the infinit deity, or else the infinit deity must hav existed somewhere when there was nowhere for him to exist.

Or, the infinit being, being everywhere throughout all eternity, there was something occupying every point in space eternally, and therefore to talk of "nothing" would be to use language utterly devoid of meaning. Nothing, as meaning "the absence of something," could not exist in a universe filled by an infinit deity.

But metaphysics was not the strong point of the writers of the Pentateuch.

Having created the "heavens and the earth," the Bible story tells us that God said, "Let there be light, and there was light." But the same writer goes on to state that deity did not make either the sun, moon, or stars until the fourth day. Light and darkness are spoken of as though they were entities, for it is said that God divided the light from the darkness. This was followed by the construction of a solid firmament to divide the waters above the firmament from the waters below, the waters below immediately gathering together and forming the seas and oceans, and leaving the other portion of the earth's crust as "dry land." Then grass grew.

Following this, as we hav already stated, God created on the fourth day the sun and moon, the one to rule the day, the other the night; "he made the stars also."

Out of the waters deity then produced fishes, fowls of the air, and great whales; and lastly the beasts of the field and man.

In the second account God created the heavens and the earth; from the earth a mist went up which watered the ground.

Then God created man out of the dust of the earth. He afterward created the beasts and fowls of the air "out of the ground." And lastly, having caused the first man, Adam, to hav a deep sleep, he extracted a rib from his side, out of which he manufactured a woman.

Now, if these accounts stood alone, if there were no other records relating to the creation of the universe, or of the world and of all living creatures, it would be our duty to critically examin again and again all the extraordinary statements made in the opening chapters of Genesis.

Thanks, however, to the labor of the students of the so-called sacred literature of the world, no such task is now necessary. The Bible story of creation is only one of a large number of similar stories.

We find from a study of the Zend-Avesta that the Persian story of creation is in many respects like the story in the Bible, especially in reference to the alleged fall of man through eating of "forbidden fruit."

Similar stories too may be found in Hindoo and Greek literature; but upon the face of them all there is the stamp of a common origin—in point of truth they are but the best guesses of an ignorant people impatient of gaining the truth. What modern science has to say upon these matters must be left for our next chapter to tell.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

AN Austrian Roman Catholic paper says the pope favors the following conditions for a reconciliation with the Quirinal:

"(1) The pope will advise the royal, archducal, and ducal families of Naples, Tuscany, and Modena to renounce all claims to sovereignty in favor of the holy see. (2) The pope will crown Humbert king, granting him and his Catholic descendants territory in Italy in fief. (3) The king will govern the whole kingdom, with full temporal rights, but will acknowledge the pope as suzerain and pledge himself to rule according to the dictates of the church. (4) The king will reside in Rome. (5) Territory, including the Leonine City and part of the Tiber shore, will be allotted permanently to the pope with absolute ruling and proprietary rights. (6) A special convention will be concluded fixing the amount Italy shall pay to maintain the papal household."

If Italy enters into any such bargain as that, her government must be composed of idiots. What claim has the pope to a square inch of land that he doesn't buy? What right has the Italian government to giv him a lot of folks to rule unless they elect him? And why should Italy pay a cent toward supporting his seditious household? The pope's eternal cry for temporal power and wealth is the most offensiv of all his absurd claims.

Colonel Ingersoll's Speech at Morristown.

We are very sorry not to be able to fulfil the promis of last week to print Colonel Ingersoll's speech before the Morristown jury that convicted Mr. Reynolds of blasphemy; but Mr. Ingersoll himself intends to hav it printed in the near future, and prefers that it should not appear anywhere until then.

The delay will be a great disappointment to the Liberals of the country, but we can assure them that the speech is worth waiting for.

Disgusting.

Disgusting, says Webster, the American standard authority on the meaning of words, is that which we dislike, or hav an aversion to, or repugnance for, or are displeased with; that which offends our taste, or is "extremely unpleasant to the higher sensibilities of the soul." The synonyms are aversion, distaste, dislike. These are easy words to say. Most folks hav a distaste for some things for which other people hav great fondness, and we are apt to dislike whatever trenches upon our peculiar notions. Aversions, too, are natural, and we cannot help feeling them toward whatever displeases us.

At the instance of Anthony Comstock the New York legislature has passed a bill amending a previous statute against vicious literature which is now awaiting the governor's signature, making it a crime punishable with heavy fine and many months imprisonment, to sell, lend, giv away, show, or hav in possession any "disgusting" book, magazine, pamphlet, newspaper, story paper, writing paper, picture, drawing, or photograph. And anyone advertising, or causing to be advertised, any "disgusting" literature or works of art is subject to the same penalty.

Now, let us see how this bill would work, if enforced, say by Judge Childs of New Jersey, aided by a jury of jackasses who would do just what he ordered. The jury, bear in mind, hav nothing to do with the law, its wisdom or foolishness, and their duty is restricted to determining whether, "beyond a reasonable doubt," the law has been violated.

We bought, the other day, on the way to our office, a copy of the New York Times. Generally speaking, the Times is a good paper—givs us the news, with sensible comments thereon, and its reporting is tolerably accurate. But the Times is a mugwump organ, and believes in property qualification for voters, a government by the aristocracy, and much other un-American nonsense. The arguments for these schemes we dislike exceedingly. They are distasteful, and our aversion to the Times because of them is such that we throw the paper into the waste-basket, exclaiming, "Disgusting!" Now, if we could get District Attorney Martine to giv us a warrant (and being a Democrat, perhaps he would) for the editor, and we could find twelve jurymen who agreed with us, the editor of the Times would hav to go to jail.

Again, pick up a New York Sun. It is a good newspaper—on the whole, the ablest of the dailies. But the editor has the habit, very disgusting to us, of catering to a Roman Catholic patronage. He also abuses individuals who oppose him, in a manner that we dislike. By the terms of this law, therefore, if we could get upon a jury and find eleven other men holding our views, Mr. Dana would be found guilty of circulating disgusting literature, and fined or imprisoned.

The daily papers, however, are not the only ones reached by this law. The Christian Advocate prints columns of religious slush that must disgust every person of common sense into whose hands the publication may fall. So do the Christian at Work, the Churchman, the Independent, and other Protestant organs. As for the Roman Catholic papers, their columns are crowded with superstitious twaddle which can be believed only by the most ignorant. Nine Protestant juries out of every ten would unanimously declare the miraculous legends of Catholicism to be disgusting beyond decency.

In art, particularly, the religious folks would be endangered by this law with a Benedict or a Childs to enforce it. Who can look upon a painted crucifix, see the expression of agony upon Christ's face, the blood running from hands and feet and side, without feeling an aversion for such representations? An aversion, remember, constitutes disgust, and disgust at a work of art makes the possessor of the work subject to the law.

But our Christian friends, and the editors of the dailies, are not afraid of the possible consequences of this statute, passed in the last hours of the most dishonest legislature New York has had since Tweed's time. Certainly not. The law was not amended for their benefit, but to catch their opponents. Powerful corporations and churches will be let alone, as heretofore; the weak and unpopular will be made to feel the vengeance of the Vice Society, providing its agent can find a pliant district attorney to do his bidding. All literature opposed to Christianity is held in aversion and disgust by Christians, and all reform books and pamphlets are disgusting to the aristocratic conservativs of society. Of course the Infidels and social reformers are disgusted with the senseless abuse heaped upon them by the church and the conservativs, but they hav no power, and can not prosecute if they would.

But it remains to be seen, if Governor Hill signs this bill, whether the Infidels and reformers will be allowed to liv in peace and disseminate their opinions.

Blind Leaders.

The trial and conviction of Mr. Reynolds hav called forth an immense amount of approving comment and disapproving criticism. The secular papers are about evenly divided in sentiment; the religious papers dislike to acknowledge the persecution, but their satisfaction with the conviction is apparent. They nearly all take the ground that freedom of speech is essential, but that the Infidels should not be allowed to hurt Christian feelings. This is a Christian country, they claim, and their religion must be respected. They stand upon about the same ground as the idiotically pompous crier of the Morristown court, which is that any one who speaks disrespectfully of "Gaud" and "our savior" deserves imprisonment.

The Christian Advocate, which speaks for the Methodists, is glad that "the charge of the judge was a systematic and thorough reply to every point made by Colonel Ingersoll," but the learned editor fails to show what business the judge had to "reply" to an advocate and argue for conviction. The conclusion arrived at by the Advocate is, that "it is not wise to enforce these laws for every case, but, as the New York Times observes, 'it is well that there should be some means of suppressing a noisy and offensiv blackguard like Reynolds, and whether he be suppressed as a blasphemer or merely as a plain blackguard is a matter of very minor consequences.'" To which we should like to add that the real blackguard is not he who expresses his honest sentiments, but the man who vilifies another of whom he knows absolutely nothing, and the religious editor who indorses the vilification.

The Independent makes even less attempt to conceal its satisfaction with the blasphemy laws and this conviction thereunder. Our Congregationalist contemporary would enforce the law continually, and "trusts that the time will never come when men in this country will, with impunity, be permitted to blackguard the generally accepted religion of the people." How the Independent's desires are to be carried out in Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington Territory, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming, whose statute books are unsullied by blasphemy laws, it fails to state. The "general sensibilities of the [Christian] community" are in these states and territories at the mercy of men who hav been Christian ministers, and subsequently became Infidels and "vulgar blackguards," as the Independent styles Mr. Reynolds, with no ground but religious prejudice, for it confesses that his pamphlet has never been seen in that office. Our contemporary's "settled doctrin in this country" that men are obliged by law to speak of religion "in a manner that is decent and not offensiv" is a very unsettled doctrin in all the states and territories mentioned. The Independent, in its chuckling comments, shows at once its ignorance and its impudence.

Another weekly journal published in this city, which has attained its large circulation by printing "racy" articles, expounds the law in this ludicrously ignorant manner:

> "Colonel Ingersoll has need to study the Federal Constitution. On the trial of ex-Preacher Reynolds for blasphemy at Morristown, New Jersey, he claims that the prohibitory act of the legislature was in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that 'the liberty of speech shall not be abridged.' Now, Congress is expressly prohibited in the first article of the amended Constitution from doing that which New Jersey, as a sovereign state, can do. Here is the article in full:
> "'Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment o religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances.'
> "Congress is forbidden to do any of those things; but the article has no application to the several states, whose people can at will punish a blasphemer and go further. Mr. Ingersoll is a centralist, and a centralist rarely studies the instrument which makes war on centralism."

Leaving aside the fact that Colonel Ingersoll's claim was that the law violates New Jersey's constitution, it is sufficient answer to this legal fool to quote the second paragraph of Article VI. of the United States Constitution:

> "This Constitution . . . shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

The papers out of the city are more inclined to condemn the court. Though they throw a sop to their religious readers by saying "Reynolds went too far," it is plain that if they dared the editors would read the religious bigots of Morristown a wholesome lesson. Liberal sentiment is evidently growing, and this prosecution will undoubtedly giv it a vigorous push ahead. Colonel Ingersoll said it would giv Mr. Reynolds a congregation of fifty millions. And it certainly has given the widest publicity to Colonel Ingersoll's own speech, and that speech, says an Albany journal, "so far as harm is concerned, in the definition religion would giv, is much more effectiv." On the whole, therefore, religion has gained nothing and lost much by this prosecution.

But it is pitiable to see the lack of comprehension of the principle involved on the part of the press. A number of them crack jokes upon the affair, advising Mr. Reynolds to stick to village street-corner oratory, and eschew pamphlets hereafter; but there is no indication that they comprehend what the fight was about. We do not expect a Christian to be consistent in advocating free speech. Christians hav always persecuted when they had the power, and we presume they always will, no matter what variety they belong to. Their arrogance is boundless. Natural individual rights to them means only their own right to their faith, and their right to persecute others holding different faiths. But the secular editors might be supposed to understand American principles, and to be willing to champion them. It may be, however, that the branches of the upas-tree of religion cover them, too, and darken their understanding. At any rate, the stuff the most of them hav written about this case would disgrace a boy who had studied for even one month the distinctiv principles upon which this republic is supposed to stand.

A Dynamiter, a Socialist, and a Catholic.

Terence V. Powderly, the General Master Workman of the Knights of Labor, should answer the questions asked by the Labor Enquirer of Denver. Especially is the public interested in hearing truthful answers to these inquiries:

"Why, sir, did you not publicly denounce the explosion of dynamite which occurred in that strike on the steamer of the Old Dominion line?

"Did you not salute with uplifted hat the red flags carried in the great procession of the Central Labor Union of New York, September, 1882?

"Were you not a member of the Socialistic Labor party, and did you not hold a red card of membership therein?

"Do you approve of the church persecution of Dr. McGlynn? If not, why has not your voice been raised in protest?

"Did you say that 'the Knights of Labor shall be subordinate to no other organization on earth?'

"Did you not swear to keep secret the secret work of the K. of L.?

"Did you not reveal to Cardinal Gibbons the whole of the secret work, and, furthermore, say to the Catholic church that if there was in the order anything which it desired altered or changed it should be done?

"If you answer yea, then I shall not ask you, is it not a fact that you attend mass sometimes as often as three times a day; that you freely confess (even the secrets of the order) to the Catholic priesthood, and that you are pledged to them to bend this order as they may wish or to break it?"

Mr. Powderly has posed before the world lately as an opponent of Anarchy, and the reason why he passivly countenanced the use of dynamite in the Knights of Labor strike against the steamship company mentioned would be instructiv. He has also denounced Socialism vigorously, but why did he in the past salute its flag and suffer himself to be a member of the Socialistic party?

That he has practically sold the order out to the Roman Catholic church, we hav known for some time, and said so more than once.

A Warning.

We would warn those Christians who, like Mr. Hamilton, of Ukiah, Cal., take lighted lamps in their hands with which to kill the Freethought lecturers, that it is not a safe practice. Besides the danger of setting buildings on fire, which would lead to their incarceration, they run a risk of getting thrashed. Although the most gentle gentleman, Mr. Putnam is physically well able to defend himself, and never runs. Had Mr. Hamilton approached within reach of his arm instead of running from the room, it is more than likely that a doctor would hav found employment about the Christian's head.

The other lecturers, also, are men whom it is not safe for the average Christian to attack. Together and separately Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Remsburg hav faced furious mobs, and got away safely. In years agone Mr. Washburn has been the terror of gamblers at the county fairs of his neighborhood, and threats that he would be shot caused him no loss of sleep. He is still in good physical condition. Mr. Watts carries with him some two hundred pounds of bone and muscle, and like most Englishmen knows how to defend himself by the manly art. Mr. Underwood, though possessing some moral qualities that we do not like, has physical qualities which excite admiration. Mobs hav no terrors for him. Dr. York and Mr. Jamieson belong to the wild West, and it never has been safe to tread upon a Westerner's coat-tail.

None of these men believes in turning the other cheek when smitten upon one, and we caution the defenders of Christ against imitating the militant Mr. Hamilton, of Ukiah, Cal.

Cheap Villainy, but Dear Heresy.

It costs more in some states of this land of the free to bring reproach upon the Bible than it does in others to outrage girls. The Grand Rapids, Mich., Herald of the 24th instant has this item of Sunday-school news:

"Sylvester Patterson, the Sunday-school teacher of Cannonsburg, was brought before Justice Walsh yesterday, to be sentenced for committing a criminal assault upon Eva Morton, a little girl aged fourteen. The judge had intended imposing a fine of $15 and costs, but upon the presentation of a petition signed by about sixty prominent citizens of Cannonsburg, asking for mercy for Patterson, he decided that he would be sufficiently punished by paying the costs of the case, which amounted to $28.13. The petition was started at the meeting of the Sunday-school in which he was a teacher on Sunday, and although the evidence was against him, he will be taken back into the fold, and given another chance."

Twenty-eight dollars and thirteen cents for outraging a girl, and seventy-five dollars for making fun of the Bible! It's a great thing to be a Sunday-school teacher, and a Christian, and the United States are certainly under Christian rule.

Dr. E. B. Foote to the Liberals.

The following letter from Dr. Foote, of this city, to Mr. Reynolds, has been forwarded us for publication. Certainly Colonel Ingersoll should not be allowed to pay costs and fine as well as giv his splendid services, and we suspect it will be only necessary to mention the subject to raise the amount at once. The trial has cost Mr. Reynolds a good deal of trouble, money, and anxiety, and Dr. Foote's suggestion as to a possible surplus is an excellent one. Mr. Reynolds's address is Box 104, North Parma, Monroe county, N. Y. These are Dr. Foote's views:

"NEW YORK, May 21, 1887.

"MR. C. B. REYNOLDS, Dear Sir: Now that the fog which hung over Morristown has cleared away so that we can take a calm survey of the field, I congratulate you on the result of your trial. In view of Ingersoll's masterly defense, it is quite true that you should hav been acquitted; but if the jurors were turtles and the judge a donkey, you may thank Colonel Ingersoll's eloquence for saving you from the penitentiary. You hav your freedom, and all the disgrace growing out of the prosecution—more properly, persecution—attaches to the commonwealth of New Jersey.

"And now let your friends chip in and pay the expenses. Colonel Ingersoll made a liberal contribution to your cause when he volunteered to defend you. Not only you and your cause hav been nobly served, but the world has been educated. Your words in the Boonton tent reached only a few hundred ears, while the magic utterances of Colonel Ingersoll are laid by the newspaper press before millions of eyes. Dr. Foote, Jr., and I will pay the fine ($25), and we feel sure others will come forward to cancel the expenses of the trial, so that Mr. Ingersoll's great liberality shall not be shamefully taxed, for it would certainly be a shame for him to foot the expenses of the trial in addition to giving his valuable services.

"The Reynolds Defense Fund should be materially swelled, and any surplus after paying the expenses of the trial could be well used in promoting your work in the lecture field under cover of your historical tent.

"After you shall hav been fitted out for your summer's work, the Liberals ought to giv their attention next to Aunt Elmina. A fund should be raised for her defense. The National Defense Association stand ready to receive all moneys for the defense of those who are attacked, and to appropriate such contributions in the way requested by the donor. E. W. Chamberlain, Esq., 120 Broadway, is the treasurer.

"Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE."

The Sunday Law.

The present attempt of the mayor and excise commissioners to enforce the Sunday law as it relates to the selling of liquor has had one good result. It has shown that none but a few fanatics countenance its practical enforcement. This law as it stands upon the statute books of the various states is merely a testimonial to our national hypocrisy. Those who would vote for it would break it if they felt inclined that way, and would consider themselvs none the worse for so doing.

This law belongs with a dozen other ethical beliefs which Christians profess to hold, and which they do hold up to the point of practicing them. Every Christian, if he knows what his religion involves, believes "that the blessed are the poor and humble, and those who are ill-used in this world; that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven; that he should judge not lest he be judged; that he should not swear at all; that he should love his neighbor as himself; that if one take his cloak, he should giv him his coat also; that he should take no thought for the morrow; that, if he would be perfect, he should sell all he has and giv it to the poor." What is this professed belief but hypocrisy, pure and simple?

So with the Sunday liquor law. The virtuous Christian has stood behind this law with voice and vote just so long as no attempt has been made to enforce it. But when this attempt is made, a howl comes from every quarter about the infringement of personal liberty, and not the law but its executors are held responsible for the outrage. This time the Christian ox is gored. But do these religious wine-bibbers want the law repealed? Perish the thought, and perish him who suggests it. They wish its enforcement to be just lax enough to giv them the modicum of liberty they exercise, and yet strict enough to punish those who exercise more. With this end in view, all manner of ridiculous recommendations hav been made and bills introduced into the legislature. The good Mr. Hewitt would hav certain reputable places specially licensed to sell beer and wines Sunday afternoons. This is an implication that without some such restriction the citizen would not keep sober during church service in the fore part of the day. Assemblyman Crosby would allow hotels to serve wine with meals; under which provision those who do not drink wine might go thirsty. Then we hav had Messrs. Giegerich and Daly with other special bills, none of which goes to the root of the matter.

The only sensible solution of the question is to remove all Sunday laws except such as provide for making it a secular day of rest. The liquor question should be considered separately.

Editorial Notes.

HERE is a sentence from Unity, a Unitarian journal published in Chicago, that we commend to everybody, and conservativ opportunists in particular: "The right of anything takes care of the end of it." Burn that into your brain, and you hav a measure for all thought and action.

MR. CHARLES WATTS has our hearty thanks for his defense of the dead founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the slanders of a man of God in Toronto. The Rev. Mr. Johnson is a minister of the jackal sort, and delights in tearing open graves; but Thomas Paine and D. M. Bennett cannot be hurt by him.

"IF Barnum really wants to procure a curiosity which shall overtop all others," says The Earth, "he should secure the services of a millionaire who did not begin life barefooted and without a cent." We fancy the great showman will hav difficulty in finding a man who did not begin life barefooted, unless the great modesty of Comstock compelled him to enter the world with shoes on.

THE Christian Advocate (Nashville) says: "You can't teach religion either in a church or a school without teaching dogma. All pretenses to the contrary are delusiv." We commend this plain statement to those people who think that the Bible can be read in the schools without a sectarian bias. That the Bible, as a collection of books, exists, is all that we positivly know about the Christian salvation scheme. All else connected with Christianity (except its secular history) is taught as a dogma to be believed, not as a theory to be investigated.

THE Christian papers, especially the Roman Catholic organs, hav been making much of a story that Garibaldi's son has been converted to the religion his famous father despised, and has suffered baptism. The Turin correspondent of the Paris Figaro recently sent to his paper the following account of a visit to Garibaldi's widow and her positiv denial of the canard: "The family of Garibaldi livs in a quiet street in Turin. Donna Francesca, a middle-aged woman, received the correspondent of the Figaro in her little drawing-room, the walls of which are covered with scarves, flags, medals, and photographs of monuments which hav been erected in Italy to the memory of her husband. On the table stands a boot of patent leather, the present of Garibaldi's bootmaker, in which the proportions of the well-shaped foot are plainly seen. As to the baptism of her son Manlio, Donna Francesca indignantly declares that the whole story is an invention. 'My son,' she says, 'is thirteen years old, and has been studying at the Collége International for several years. The director has compelled him, against my will, to take part in the religious ceremonies, and, fearing that my interference might cause unpleasantness to my son, I hav told him to do as the others do, and to go to mass as he goes to the theater. I hav been asked several times to let him be baptized, but I hav always refused, for, like my husband, I detest priests and religion. I only believe in a supreme being, and I hav only one altar, which you see.'"

EXCEPT that Christian courts are known to be ludicrously idiotic in adherence to forms, we should hav difficulty in believing that the following from the National Reformer is an account of a real court scene: "The other day an action was heard at the Liskeard County Court for breach of horse warranty brought by Mr. Henry Wardroper, of Ladywell Park, against a local farmer. Mr. Wardroper having given his evidence, the defendant's solicitor, Mr. Borlaise Childs, before cross-examining him, asked whether in being sworn he kissed the gospel or his thumb. Plaintiff: 'I kissed my thumb.' Mr. Childs: 'Why did you do that?' Plaintiff: 'Because it is a version to which I am not accustomed.' His honor (Mr. Underhay, deputy judge): 'But you ought to hav raised the objection before. Your evidence thus far is worthless.' Plaintiff: 'I only object to the version.' Mr. Childs: 'I believe you are a Roman Catholic, and you didn't kiss the gospel. You kissed your thumb?' Plaintiff: 'Yes. His honor: 'Then he has not been sworn at all.' Mr. Preston Wallis (plaintiff's solicitor) said it was a pity Mr. Childs did not call attention to this before. Mr. Childs said he had only just been told of it. He had seen ignorant men do that kind of thing with the intention of telling a lie and saving their conscience, though he did not suggest that was the case in this instance. His honor suggested that Mr. Wardroper should take an oath on a version he would acknowledge, and then hav his evidence read over to him, and he asked whether he held to it as correct. A Douay Bible was accordingly sent for, and Mr. Wardroper having taken his oath upon that the case proceeded. In giving judgment his honor strongly reprobated the conduct of Mr. Wardroper in kissing his thumb instead of the book, and declined to place any reliance upon his evidence of the warranty and nonsuited him."

Letters from Friends.

LINCOLN, ILL., May 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find draft for a man who wants the illustrations, in place of the brother who quit when his bigoted friends took exception to the bugs on Noah's dish. My friend's stomach is not easily upset by reading about the ark, its victuals, etc. Why don't our qualmy friend read about Rab-shakeh in 2 Kings if he loves "scripter?" Tid-bits are plenty, and humbugs abound therein. Why not illustrate the facts as believed to hav occurred? Let the pencil go on! There is nothing more ridiculous than the old stuff called the "word." My respects to John Peck.

Yours truly, JOHN BUSHEL.

ABILENE, KAN., May 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50 subscription to your paper for six months. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER and can't do without it, but so much about Bruno, and Servetus, and the stinking past of the church makes me tired. Life is too short to squander in even discussing the old church nonsense. Let us teach them something better, broader, grander, holier, by a pure living and growing faith in this life.

I like your comments on Mrs. Slenker. One might as well run naked through the streets to show the human form divine as to exhibit our beautiful English in its Five Points nastiness. I'm sorry for the old lady, but she is "luny" on the subject of heredity.

I am a great admirer of Colonel Ingersoll, studied law in his office when a young man, and keep his picture hanging always in sight. A. G. ELLSWORTH.

DIANA, TEX., May 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The people of Texas are now excited over the question of Prohibition, and will vote upon it the fourth of August, which fact you no doubt are aware of. Every person should investigate this question, that he may be able to vote intelligently upon it. I feel that I, like a great many others, need information on it. I hav ordered the list of books inclosed, because I believe they will greatly assist me in this matter.

The proposed amendment will prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors within the borders of the state, even prohibiting wine and beer. There are, however, four exceptions—for medicinal, mechanical, sacramental, and scientific purposes. I do not favor the amendment, and think it will be a failure.

The Prohibitionists are circulating the report that Colonel Ingersoll is a strong Prohibitionist. I do not believe it. Please inform me of the truth of the matter, and also, your idea of Prohibition. Success to you and yours, and the cause you advocate. J. M. WOODS.

[Colonel Ingersoll is too firm a believer in personal liberty to be a Prohibitionist; and so is the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.—ED. T. S.]

ALLEGHENY, PA., May 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Will you, or some of your readers, giv a searcher after light some explanation on some scripture points? The first point to be explained is Hosea xii, 9. Does not this prove that the Jews got their God from Egypt? The next point is contained in Acts xxv, 11 and 21. The latter verse reads: "But Paul, appealing to be reserved to the hearing of Augustus, I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cæsar"—i. e., Augustus Cæsar. Now, Augustus died A.D. 14, and Paul was born, according to the received chronology, in A.D. 5, and converted in A.D. 37. Then, accordingly, Paul would hav been nine years old when Augustus died, and as he was not converted until he was thirty-two years old—well, I think there is a screw loose somewhere. It is true the Roman emperors did adopt the official title, "Augustus," but it was certainly after Paul's time, as the Emperor Pertinax, when elected to the throne in A.D. 193, was "saluted as Cæsar."

I sent the first of the above questions to the editor of the Christian at Work, but, with the true Christian spirit, he refused to even publish it. INFIDELIS.

AXTELL, KAN., May 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav delayed writing for a long time, not because I am less enthusiastic in our cause, nor that there was not plenty to say of interest, but I thought that others ought to be heard from. Liberalism in Kansas is aggressiv. For four months past "Father" Hurley and M. H. Cone hav been conducting a debate through the Axtell Anchor on "The relativ merits of Christian and Secular teaching in producing moral men." We hav shaken up the town completely. We feel that Secularism was well defended, and Catholicism, the Bible, and Christian training were shown to be incentivs to crime. I do not think that any place has been so thoroughly shaken up as this. We keep the four hundred books and tracts out. We meet all their sophistries on the streets. We offer challenge after challenge to debate. We offer anyone that will read the very best works extant. The "bell sheep" in the churches say that "Liberal union is the worst thing that ever took place in our town." They hav quit calling us bad names, as they find that don't pay; we hav replies for such talk. They quit quoting the Bible at us, for they find we quote back what they don't like to hear.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is indispensable with my family. I would rather giv a cow than see the paper go down. I am very sorry to see that our giant, T. B. Wakeman, has such feelings, but hope he will reconsider.

I see mention of the arrest of Mrs. E. D. Slenker, "our ewel." How long are our best men and woman to be arrested and disgraced, and our own cherished opinions ridiculed, and our cause retarded by such hellish work? I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER most of the time since it started, and all of her writings are of the most lofty and cultured kind, and are the product of as pure a character as exists. Will some friend of humanity be kind enough to bury Comstock and his laws alive in one grave, doing it quietly, as we don't need to make any noise about such an infamous wretch? I lived at Prospect Park, Ill., at the time of the Bennett trial, and did all I could for him, and will do still more for her if the opportunity comes. We must fight the same fight over again, or we will all be slaves. The churches see that if they can hiss on the state to prosecute and persecute, they will in that way answer the arguments of Infidelity—and by adding lying—in the best way possible. I like your paper better and better. The Rev. Dr. Jones's report is exceptionally good. The pictures and Children's Corner teach the truth to the little folks and those that would not take time to read and think.

We are suffering for rain, and I tried to find some one in town yesterday who was on speaking terms with the fellow that runs the weather, but did not succeed.

I just read a letter from Elmina, and will donate to her defense, and hope every one of your readers, and the readers of every other Liberal paper, will do the same.

Yours for liberty, E. W. MINER.

LEMOORE, May 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: While writing you on other business I will send the money for another year's subscription. I am now, and hav been for a long time, taking a large number of papers and journals, and a year ago I thought I would drop THE TRUTH SEEKER for awhile, but your just and honorable position in regard to the Chicago Anarchists, together with the unjust criticisms of some of your subscribers, caused me to renew again at that time, and does now. I became first interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER by the outrages upon Mr. Bennett; not that I do not enjoy and appreciate your paper and your effort for truth and right, but my knowledge, not belief, compels me to be a Spiritualist, hence THE TRUTH SEEKER would be read second. Yet you are very fair in your treatment of Spiritualists. I would not hav you think that I am an Anarchist. I am not. Neither do I belong to any of the orders, but I followed the testimony of the Chicago trial of those men, and felt that it was one among the many great outrages committed in our age and time. Hoping you will continue firm for the right as you see it, and not be intimidated by fault-finders, I remain,

Yours truly, DR. L. L. MOORE.

ST. JOHNSBURY, May 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. I don't see how I am going to get along without the paper. It is the best paper that I hav found yet, and I shall continue to pay for it, as every subscriber should, and as every man will. St. Johnsbury is afflicted just now with the Salvation Army, which makes more hellish noise for heaven than all the hoodlums in town. They are the especial favorits of the Advents and Methodists, and I suppose that accounts for some of the noise they make. The Methodists were holding what they called conference the week that Heston made the picture of the Methodist conference in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Didn't it fit? well, I should snicker! I showed the paper to some of my Methodist friends. They acted as if they were mad, but I might hav been mistaken. It is the strangest thing to me, in this nineteenth century, to see enlightened people, so called, follow in the footsteps of their savage and superstitious forefathers who established the most cruel and foolish religion ever followed by man. I can't see why they do it, but they do, and pay well for it, too.

JOHN BELKNAP.

VERSAILLES, MO., May 12, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I must say that I am an admirer of your most valuable paper, and do not see how I could get along without it, as I am in one of those benighted back-ground localities where the weeds grow thick and rank. How could it be otherwise so long as the people reject reason and common sense, and try to rest on a pillow filled with Baptist porcupines, Presbyterian vultures, Methodist hawks, Campbellite geese, sanctified ducks, and Catholic buzzards, and not one of them can get a comfortable nap on that pillow (the Bible) without being punctured and tormented by the hard, unyielding quills of the others? And if one of the unregenerate happens along and tells them that their heaven and New Jerusalem is to be burnt up, and all ungodliness is to be burnt and destroyed, and there is to be no more pain, sickness, or death, then they are grieved again.

Not long since, when in company with several Christians, an intelligent looking gentleman came up, and one of the brethren said, "Here is a college student, he can tell you about it." I asked him if his geology was in unison with the Bible story of creation, and he shocked the true believers by saying, "Not by a damn sight." J. B. BOWERS.

DU BOIS, PA., May 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Is civilization retrograding? If not, what is the meaning of the great Bismarck yielding to the demands of the pope? What is the meaning of the preposterous demands of the pope that the king of Italy shall become his slave? What means the no less impudent demand on France that the scions of the church shall be exempt from military duty, and his grossly impudent demand on the Knights of Labor in Canada that they shall be ready at any moment to giv up their organization when he demands it? All these things go to show that the church is gaining power in all countries where it has the chance of propagating its doctrins and superstition among the ignorant masses and through them working on the fears of the ruling tyrants, and in this country using demagogs to do his bidding by giving them the votes of their ignorant and superstitious followers, the priests forever working to place the church above the state in all countries. What can be done to check the onward march of this head of all tyranny, while the Protestants themselvs are ready to destroy anyone who fights superstition? They cannot see that they are indirectly aiding in their own destruction by acquiescing in the exemption of church property from taxation. They are helping that church to attain a power in this country above the state that will work their own destruction. J. D.

PATOH GROVE, WIS., May 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading about Mrs. Slenker's case, and I would add to your questions, What about having such a law in these United States that any and every person can be arrested for sending obscene matter through the mail? We got along one hundred years very well without such a law. Why can't we get along longer? I think it is about time the Comstock law was repealed, for I think that each head of a family can better protect his respectiv charges without the law. It seems to me a great burlesque to hav such a law at the same time that we hav the "holy Bible." It would be hard to find anything more obscene than that holy relic.

And what about those limber-backs that dare not go on and continue to demand the repeal of the Comstock law? I hope it will get hold of some of them yet. Poor Mrs. Slenker! I presume she never wrote anything to anyone against their consent.

It seems to me that all the law that we need in the matter is this: If anyone should send to another without their consent or demand, or at least against their commands, then the individual should hav cause of action against the one sending. Freedom of the press and pen was the corner-stone of our republic, but we seem to be in a fair way of realizing the truth of Heston's last picture. M. Y. B. H.

CANTON, O., May 20, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: On last Sunday evening, in accordance with public notice given, Mr. Louis Schaefer, proprietor of the Opera House here, delivered a lecture before an audience of over twelve hundred on the subject of "The Moral, Intellectual, and Christian Character of the Pulpit." The audience was composed of our most intelligent citizens, of ladies and gentlemen. What prompted Mr. Schaefer so to do was the aggressiv attacks by the pulpit in some of our churches here, without discrimination, against the stage in general. He spoke for over an hour, taking his text from Luke vi, 41, 42, and proved by reliable statistics that ten times more crimes are committed by reverend gentlemen, in proportion to their number, than by any other class of people in the country, and are annually on the increase; mostly crimes of a character in which women are implicated; that there are at the present time fifty ministers in the penitentiaries of the United States where there is one actor. He advised clergymen when they make pastoral visits to hav their wives accompany them, and urged upon fathers and husbands to take the cue. He spoke of the inception of the drama and theater in Greece, bringing their history down to the present day, referring to the assassination of President Lincoln. The stage, he said, has produced more intellectual giants and poets than any other institution we hav any knowledge of; that none but cranks and fanatics in the pulpit will place themselvs in opposition to the legitimate drama; that in earlier days such performances were held in churches, palaces, castles, and palatial residences; that Christ himself was friendly to social enjoyment, even on the Sabbath day. He warned his hearers against wolves in sheep's clothing, and not to be influenced by Pharisees and hypocrits. Mr. Schaefer during the delivery of the lecture received rounds and rounds upon rounds of applause, and has since been solicited to repeat the lecture. ONE WHO WAS PRESENT.

FOREST GROVE, May 5, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You do not seem to hear from this corner of the Lord's vinyard very often. I thought I would send a few words of cheer. For some time past I hav wanted to tell you what we think of the illustrations in the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, but as every picture seemed better than the last, I hardly knew which one to praise. The one which represents the women as supporting the clergy ought to be sent broadcast all over the United States, for there is nothing more true to life than that picture. THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a grand work for the cause of Liberalism, and it ought to be better supported than it is.

We are hoping that S. P. Putnam will make us a visit during his stay in Oregon. There are not many strong Liberals here, but what we lack in quantity we make up in quality. We hav a few as stanch Liberals as America can produce. And that reminds me that we hav in Forest Grove a few bigots who will compare favorably with anything produced in the twelfth century. The farmers near town wished to start a creamery, and in order to do this they wished to interest the business men of the village, not feeling able to bear all the expense themselvs. They therefore arranged for a meeting of all the farmers and business men at Bert's Liberal Hall on a certain day. Well, it was talked over in the mean time among those most interested, and one of the bigots made the statement that if the meeting was held in that Infidel hall he would take no stock in the creamery, nor attend the meeting; and another of the same class said it was all he could do to go into that hall where they had Tom Paine's picture framed and hanging up. Now, Mr. Editor, I want you to find out what Paine's picture would hav to do with a creamery. Must we not only hav the Bible in our free schools, but is it absolutely necessary to compel the use of it in the cow-yard? Had I been at that meeting I should hav proposed to the committee that there should be an appropriation made to buy a Bible, hymn-book, and the Thirty-nine Articles for every cow belonging to the creamery.

Dear editor and brethren, as Josiah Allen's wife says, I would not like you to repeat this, but really what I think is, that the Liberals around Forest Grove need a little more backbone. They don't take enough interest in Liberal lectures, and they don't take enough Liberal literature. We must hav a revival here, and we look to S. P. Putnam, as our presiding elder, to begin the awakening. We shall probably hav a visit also from Dr. York; at least, we hope so.

We hav read Helen Gardener's book, "Men, Women, and Gods." What a grand work it is! It ought to be put in the hands of every woman and girl in America. I am doing missionary work with my copy, loaning it to every woman I can get to read it. Of course I hav to be careful whom I loan it to, for some would burn it, just as a few hundred years ago they would hav burnt the writer. How many hearts throbbed with fear and sympathy when the sad news went over the land that our noble leader, the silver-tongued orator, Colonel Ingersoll, had a similar throat trouble to that of our grand warrior, General Grant! And how much our hearts hav been relieved by better reports of his affliction! May he liv many years yet, for there's a grand and glorious work for him to do. May he liv a thousand years, and his shadow never grow less.

Yours for U. M. L, MRS. SARAH C. TODD.

NEW YORK, May 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 14th appears an article from Mr. George H. Dawes, to only a part of which I object; that is, where he says, "Liberals of this country date the era of man from the execution of Bruno, and this is Anno Scientiæ 287." It is given that Bruno suffered martyrdom Feb. 16, 1600. If this is correct, then to found an era from that date and count now 287 is an absurd error, a gross error of fact. It has been exposed before, and to persist in it wilfully any longer is not only absurd, but one will stultify himself and the whole class in which he counts himself if no objection is put in. Therefore I, as one of the Liberals, for this reason protest against and repudiate it. But there are plenty of other good reasons to condemn it, as anyone will find by reading the article on "Chronology" in the Encyclopedia Britannica. To separate into divisions and to multiply impediments among the human family is to retrograde. Progress tends to simplify, to unite, and equalize—equal rights and equal duties for all, and privileges for none. Progress strives for uniformity in languages and writings, for the same standard of money, measure, and weights, and time. Progress is opposed to all barriers in intercourse and trade. When this epoch once arrives, as it surely will, then war will be a thing of the past, a relic of barbarous ages. Let us hear no more of this so-called new era, it is a nuisance now but would prove to be a curse. By the way, I will ask any one of its adherents, Is man not older, or is science not older also? Then why start from half way? FREDERICK KOEZLY.

PITT, OHIO, May 19, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: We hav recently had an interesting exhibition of the harmony, charity, tolerance, and brotherly love that pervade the Christian camp. Its happening was after this manner, i. e.: For many ages the Methodists had had sole, undisturbed, and undisputed control of this bit of Christian pasture. Then peace, harmony, and brotherly and sisterly love seemed to prevail so completely that the guardian angels could go off junketing for weeks without danger to the fold.

But a short time since, some Baptists thought it was not good for one denomination to monopolize the field, and accordingly undertook to organize a church after their kind, just for company's sake. Then trouble commenced all along the line, and "there was whispering with white lips, 'The foe! They come! they come!'" A few weeks ago the Baptist shepherd preached a sermon on baptism, demonstrating from his standpoint many things in general, which life is too short and precious to mention, and two things in particular, whereby hangs my tale: 1. No baptism except by immersion worth a ——!" 2. Infant baptism unauthorized and absurd. These points in particular made the Methodists as was the place of everlasting torment before the new version put out the fires and compelled the devil to go outside to warm his toes, as shown by Heston. Accordingly something had to be done to allay the fears of some of the Methodists that they were not duly washed. Accordingly, as soon as their shepherd could collect ammunition and load his gun, he went for what he termed "this unauthorized Baptist nonsense." During the Methodist shepherd's reply, one of the pillars of the Baptist church, composed of such material as martyrs or persecutors (as they are the under or upper dog in a fight) are made of, sat close and conspicuously before him, alternately taking notes, shaking his head, and looking wise and severe.

Finally the reverend brought his discourse to a close in substance about as follows: "I hav now preached and unfolded the truth as it is contained in the Bible, and nothing but the truth. And you clearly perceive: 1. There is no warrant, not even a shadow of it, for the claim that efficacious baptism must be by immersion. 2. There is abundant authority for the administration of the saving ordinance of baptism to little children; but," added he, looking and pointing severely at the aforesaid old Baptist soldier, now about ready to explode close in his front, "I see, and I am pained to see, there is one who does not believe it. But I defy him to disprove it." Now the old man did not stand upon the order of exploding, but exploded at once, by jumping to his feet and, with great excitement, declaring in substance, "Sir, you hav not preached the truth, but lies from beginning to end, and the truth is not in you."

At this critical juncture the flames were opportunely quenched and oil was thrown upon the troubled waters by an old lady, the wife of the Baptist warrior, stepping up to him, plucking him by the sleeve, and saying to him in a paralyzing tone, "Come on, pop. Let them sprinkle their kids if they want to, and see where they'll go to."

Pop went on. And the Methodists and Baptists then and there parted with much the same feeling for each other that prevailed between the different sects in days gone by, when, left unrestrained by outsiders who think no baptism of much efficacy without soap and towels, they manifested their brotherly love and Christian charity and forbearance by racking and roasting each other for Christ's sake, just as they would now if the wicked outsiders would leave them free to bear fruit after their kind. MR. EDITOR: The man who runs the risks to life and limb, who soils his hands and clothes, in pulling down an old, condemned, decaying temple, is entitled to as great, or greater, compensation than the one who builds the new; and as I find that you are thus employed, and as you seem to voice my views most aptly on theology, I hope to encourage you a little by a few kind words, and by giving you my own and a friend's name as subscribers on probation. When the time is up, if I should not again remit, please do not send longer, as I expect and hope to leave for Europe soon.

The following was written in a spirit of kindness, as was the note inviting me to attend an Advent meeting and hear the evidence of the immediate second coming of Christ, as foreshadowed by the prophecies, visions, and dreams of John, Daniel, Belshazzar, and others of Bible notoriety:

LEBO, KAN., ——, ——, 1887.

FRIEND E., Dear Sir: Many thanks for your invitation to accompany you to the Advent meeting, but as I am familiar with the line of sophistry they would dignify as argument while yet ignorant on many scientific points that I regard as more important to us than the second, or even the first, coming of Christ, "or any other man," you will please excuse me, as I hav no time to waste, and believe me, Thine truly, F, M.D.

Believers in dreams and prophetic visions
Scarcely deserve any student's derisions.
A man must hav cheek like a government mule,
Or money at stake on your being a fool,
To ask your attention to cackle so flat
As are visions of cranks in this age or that.
Go study the science and use of the brain;
Go plant a few trees or a few hills of grain;
Go fatten or slaughter musketoes and mice,
Or study the nature and habits of lice;
But talk not to me of old Dan or Belshazzar,
Jonah, or Job, or old Nebuchadnezzar.
I relegate them to the moths on the shelf
If I wish for dreams, I can dream them myself.
Nor ask I for aid at interpretation,
Being content with my own explanation.
Church dogmas stand out in open defiance
Of truth as revealed and taught us by science.
All that they teach from the dawn of creation
Gets scorched in the flames of investigation.
They execrate all who exercise reason,
And curse them as villains guilty of treason
To God's holy government, founded of old
By preachers, who claim they must manage the fold,
Or all will be plunged into darkness and gloom
More dreadful to think of than that of the tomb.
With such I wish little or nothing to do.
But I do not desire to influence you.

ONEIDA, KAN., May 16, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The cuts by your artist, Mr. Watson Heston, which appeared on the front page of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 16th inst., we must say illustrate most vividly Mr. Pecci's (commonly called Leo XIII.) modus operandi by which he intends to capture our most formidable citadels by swamping us at the ballot-box. Mr. Heston portrays this in four acts, viz.: Act 1st. An embassador of Pecci's placing the foreign eggs in the nest, being assisted by a Protestant clergyman, and Columbia standing by endeavoring to quiet and pacify the eagle, who seems to demur.

Act 2d. After the eggs are hatched, it is astonishing to see the physiognomical transfigurations exhibited by Columbia when she beholds that the incubating (mutual) has resulted in one young eagle, two serpents, or vipers, and one crocodile.

Act 3d. The crocodile having grown (by s'all feeding and pampering) to enormous proportions, is lying across and has crushed Columbia, as well as our American eagle, and as one of the serpents is in the act of swallowing the young eagle, the crocodile is swallowing both the serpent and eagle.

Act 4th. Now the crocodile has consumed the whole outfit, except the Protestant clergyman who aided in the incubating process, and who must hav got away. Said crocodile, being swollen to immense size, is reposing with his head lying across the Stars and Stripes, bearing thereon inscribed, "E pluribus unum." The crocodile has a huge cross on his spinal column.

Now comes the farce to conclude with, which is our political "Punch and Judy" demagogs aiding in the construction of the grand propaganda university at Washington city; the university near Central Park, N. Y.; the placing of a nuncio in this country; the crowning of Gibbons with the red hat; the passage of the Freedom of Worship bill in the legislature of New York, as well as the Murphy Protectory bill, inviting and permitting foreign criminals and paupers to land at Castle Garden at the rate of ten thousand a day, etc., etc.

Such a farce is too ridiculous and absurd for any sensible nation of people to tolerate. The idea of our Solons at Washington spending their whole term, almost, legislating on protection to home industries on the one hand, while on the other inviting starved-out pauper labor from all other nations to this country, and thereby driving to the wall our artisans, is too preposterous. What use is protection or protectiv tariff under such circumstances? Shut down the gates to foreigners, repeal the naturalization laws, or amend so as to read twenty-one years before citizenship is granted aliens; appoint a commission to investigate all secret designs (vigilantly) that are alien to our free institutions; pass laws prohibiting any priest or clergyman from performing the marriage ceremony, and it will not be long before we can with all propriety call this America. Our motto should be, "America for Americans," for it is evident that Americans Europeanize more readily than Europeans Americanize; and by our Solons acting upon the above suggestions, they would be placing such protection around our most formidable citadels, free schools, as well as the ballot-box, that we might feel secure against foreign invasions of ignorance, superstition, criminals, and paupers. AMERICA.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., May 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The best omen for the Liberal cause in America at this moment is that it produces such heroins as Elmina. The worst is that her defense is being taken up by the Freethought press in such a feeble, half-hearted manner. I had hoped the arrest of this "mother in Israel," with its certain consequences, would hav aroused the whole Liberal world to a united demand for the absolute repeal of the infamous postal laws which bear the name of Comstock. But I perceive I was mistaken. Let us consider the points of the situation. In circulating facts concerning the relations of the sexes, which hav been covered by the screen of conventional hypocrisy and laws devised for the especial protection of lust and its worst consequences, Mrs. Slenker has been rendering a service to science and morality whose importance can only be appreciated by the very few who hav gone below the surface of these tabooed but vital subjects. I can scarcely believe that you do not consider the laws of propagation a legitimate branch of science, or that you doubt it must be cultivated by the inductiv method, if at all. Why, then, do you quote the word "data" as applied to Mrs. Slenker's facts? How can you say she "has gone to intolerable lengths in circulating them?" Can they be circulated too much? Do they not need to be ventilated the more in proportion as they are themselvs the more revolting and atrocious? Hav you a particle of sympathy with the Comstockian idea that the door of the nuptial chamber should be the mental, as it is the legal, screen for the enormities which fill the world with idiocy, deformity, disease, and crime? For my own part, as a Freethinker, a cultivator of science, a friend to humanity, and the father of daughters, I find no words to express my abhorrence for this most pernicious and dangerous phase of the movement in favor of ignorance.

With regard to the language used by Mrs. Slenker, there may be more show for a difference of opinion among those whose good opinion is worth having. But allow me to say that you entirely misconceive when you remark that "the English language is rich enough and flexible enough to convey all shades of meaning without borrowing from the vocabulary of the abandoned class." The words used by Mrs. Slenker are the only words for the ideas expressed which belong to the English language (the others being barbarous modern Latin); they may be found in a work as standard as Bayle's Dictionary, and, though prudishness has commonly kept them from the eye, they were familiar to the ear of every man, woman, and child who has spoken English ever since Vortigern went sparking to Rowena.

But even if it were otherwise, the point is of no importance. "Whether a thing shall be designated by a plain noun substantiv or by a circumlocution is," says Macaulay, in his usual felicitous style, "mere matter of fashion. Morality is not at all interested in the question." But surely morality is interested in this, that crime, and especially legalized crime, shall not be treated mincingly. It is more than a matter of fashion which shall be considered worse—to commit the most infernal outrages upon womanhood and maternity, or to call them by their right names. Mrs. Slenker's bad taste, if it be bad, is far from a sufficient reason why there should be any hesitation, when a powerful common enemy is in view, about coming up to the aid of a Freethinker and moralist likely to die in prison for publishing literature of a strictly ethical and scientific kind, couched in what she at least considered decorous language—she, an old woman of unquestioned good education and good character.

Suppose that Mrs. Slenker had used Latin words instead of English, hav you any idea that the inquisition would hav let her alone? Surely it is within your knowledge that Harman and Walker are now under arrest, with excellent prospects of conviction, for publishing one such item as Mrs. Slenker's "data," in which the sole "obscene" expression was one of those very Latin words for which she has substituted Saxon tantamounts. The object of the movement in favor of ignorance is to emasculate science and destroy it. Coarseness of expression on the part of scientific writers was never anything but an excuse.

It is, however, an excuse to which we hav allowed a great deal too much. Years ago the cry of obscenity operated on the hosts of Freethought like the historic appearance of a skunk at what should hav been a great Union victory. Such a thing might be excused once, but officers and soldiers who turned success into disaster by running away a second time, even from a skunk, would hav deserved to be shot. At whatever cost of disgust and trouble, the polecat of prurient prudery must be slain if science and Liberalism are to be preserved. The Comstock gang hav made the issue squarely, and we must not dodge it. Science is to be put down. The means are to imprison scientists on charge of indecency. We cannot do less than come square up to the front, with our battle formed on this line, that while knowledge is indispensable to morality, some breadth in the expressions of its cultivators is but a venial offense at worst. This is the attitude of Mrs. Slenker, of Heywood, of Walker, of Harman. While too many of our soldiers are trying to repeat the grand retrograde movement, others are training all their guns upon that skunk. There are more of them than there were. Mrs. Slenker's fate will make more, just as the prosecution of Heywood and Bennett gave "Cupid's Yokes" a national celebrity. And so at last the movement in favor of ignorance will, I trust, defeat itself. But such victories are won only through the blood of martyrs, and none of us can be held excusable for vacillation in the hour of trial. C. L. JAMES.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

May Days.

Now the pretty birds are coming,
From the sea-born islands roaming,
And our own wild bees are humming
In the plum-trees clad in white,
Fanned by breezes soft and light.

Low beside the Elkhorn waters
Noisy wild geese and their daughters;
But the wounded waits and loiters
In his lonely wandering—
Sad he hears the song of spring.

Soon the toiling, busy farmer,
With the aid of many a charmer
(Modest maiden, naught may harm her),
Plants the checkered fields with corn,
Heeding not the proud world's scorn.

'Neath the new sun daily shining
Gray clouds turn their silver lining,
Sadness brings no sad repining
When the violets dipped in dew
Lift their starry eyes to you.

In the grove the yellow-hammers
Rend the air with saucy clamors,
Thrilled with May-time's brightest glamours.
Neighbors now just o'er the way
Holding concerts every day.

Thrushes brown and gayer swallows
Up and down the breezy hollows,
While the blooming blue-bell follows,
Calling to the rose of June
In a dreamy, tender tune.

Hasten, May, the royal comer,
Red rose paints the cheek of summer—
Pen of mine be never dumber
Than the liquid notes and free
Larks hav learned across the sea.

Bluebirds, too, recross the billow,
Building in our waving willow—
Not a thorn be in the pillow:
Little feathered friends of mine
Welcome to our northern pine!

All About the Bears.

Now, some of you, perhaps, hav seen a bear, and you know that it appeared exceedingly funny walking about on its hind feet.

Bears belong to the carnivorous or flesh-eating animals that are plantigrade, which means that they can walk on the soles of their feet. Do they eat anything else except flesh? Oh, yes, they eat vegetables, grains, and insects, and they are very fond of sweets, like honey, and they like milk, too.

They do not kill animals by biting them in a vital part and sucking their blood, but they tear them with their claws, or hug them to death. I guess we would not any of us like to be hugged to death.

Where are bears found? Oh, in almost all latitudes that are not inhabited by human beings. Where men are, bears are not, for they are soon killed or driven away.

The white or Polar bear is now the largest and most powerful of the bear tribe. A polar bear sometimes weighs fifteen hundred pounds, and is very savage. Bears are very affectionate and loving to each other, although cross and ferocious toward other creatures, especially when attacked. They are very much attached to their babies, and when one dies, the poor mother is disconsolate. It will fondle the dead body, bring it food, and try to nurse it back to life. And if the mate dies or is killed, the one who remains mourns and cries, and refuses to be comforted. It sits by its dead in great distress, and will be killed rather than leave it.

The grizzly bear is more savage than any other of the race of bears.

You hav heard of the cave bear, I suppose. He was large and strong, and lived in the caverns of Europe in what is termed the "post-tertiary epoch," which means in geology, the second period after the age of mammals.

Did you ever hear of a bear that wore spectacles? No? Well, away down among the Andes mountains in Chili, there is found a black bear, with smooth and glossy fur, except its muzzle and breast, which are dingy white. But there are half circular marks around its eyes, which make him appear as if he had on spectacles; hence its name, a spectacle bear.

Some bears can be tamed if taken in hand when very young, and they will become quite attached to their masters.

Performing bears are sometimes seen in the streets of cities, accompanied by their masters, by whom they hav been taught to do many clever tricks. I saw one once at Rocky Point, a Rhode Island summer resort, who was very fond of beer, sarsaparilla, lemonade, etc. The crowds who visited him were very fond of buying drinks and seeing the bear swallow them. Bruin would stand on his hind feet, draw the cork with his teeth, take the bottle in his fore-paws, tip his head back, and swallow the contents in very quick time. He finally guzzled so much beer that it killed him. He was what we might call a bear drunkard, and met the fate of other drunkards.

Bears are found occasionally in the White mountains, and used to be quite plenty there, as well as in other parts of New England.

In the West and Southwest of the United States they still exist in numbers, and hunters take great pleasure in hunting them.

Bear meat is said to be very fine. It occasionally finds its way to our markets. A gentleman bought some bear meat once at a great price, but, sending it home for dinner, Bridget thought it would be nice for pies, and she boiled it and chopped it up for mince-meat! The bear pies were very good, however.

There is a bear story in the Bible about two she-bears devouring forty and two children at one time. It is undoubtedly a myth.

Below is a true bear story, relating to the capture of a bear in our own country.

A BEAR STORY.

There are plenty of bears in the far West, away in the forests and on the plains where civilization has not yet set her foot. Chas. F. Blackburn, mining prospector and geologist, and who has traveled extensivly all over the great West, givs many interesting accounts of meeting with bears in his travels. His bear stories are actually blood-curdling, and make the cold shivers run up and down the spinal column.

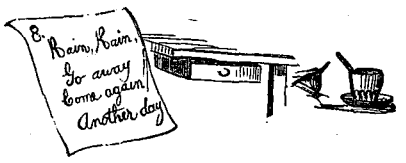
His first exciting bear-hunt was along with a man called Captain Jack in the famous Black Hills.

They had trailed a huge cinnamon bear to his home, a large cave in a hill. They were hardly brave enough to face the bear within his den, and they sent in their big dog.

The meeting of the dog and bear was not mutually agreeable. The bear was gruff, and growled at the intruder, and the dog howled and barked at such a rude welcome. Pretty soon the old cinnamon bear came out of his cave home, walking on his hind feet and holding the big dog under his left arm, as if he were some little insect. The poor dog looked as if he hadn't a friend in the world, his eyes were bulging, and he was held as tightly as if in a vise; and, besides, Bruin was striking the poor fellow with his right fore-paw terrible blows which weakened his voice with every well-directed cuff. He finally dropped the dog, and then caught him again in his iron-like jaws by the back of his neck, and gave him such a shaking as he never had before; then he threw him fully thirty feet to one side, looking at him as if to say, "I'll teach you, sir, that you cannot enter a gentleman bear's abode in such an unceremonious manner as that!"

Ths dog lay quite still, unable to move, and the bear's eyes flashed with triumph mingled with anger.

At that moment he espied Captain Jack standing under a pine-tree squarely in front of the cave and his bearship. The bear did not hesitate, but jumped fully fifteen feet toward the captain, who fired with his needle-gun and shot the bear endwise. The bear jumped again, and would hav had Captain Jack for dinner had he not jumped too. He dropped his needle-gun and caught the limb of the pine-tree, swinging himself out of the reach of his bearship. Mr. Blackburn, who was on the top of the cave, then gave a shot or two to the bear, when he dropped, seeing which Captain Jack dropped, too—from the tree. Of course it was a relief to see Bruin lying there so still, for no one can fancy being made into mince-meat by the teeth of a bear. In the mean time the dog began to come to life and gasped for breath, which had been very nearly knocked and scared out of him. The bear kicked and commenced rolling down the mountain side in his death agony. The poor dog was assisted to his feet, but as he saw the old bear he felt like retreating. It was a year before the dog regained his accustomed vigor, and after that terrible experience he would strike out for camp as soon as he caught the scent of a bear, believing, no doubt, that "discretion is the better part of valor" when bears are around. He did not fancy such an everlasting shaking and pounding as the bear gave him, and nobody can blame the dog.



That bear weighed 1,300 pounds, and it was good to know he would never shake dogs, or any other creature, again.

QUESTIONS.—To what species do bears belong? What is the meaning of carnivorous? plantigrade? How do bears kill animals? Where are bears found? Tell what you can of the polar bear, their attachments, etc. What of the cave bear? the spectacle bear? Can bears be tamed? What of performing bears? What can you say of the bear who drank beer? What was his fate? Where do bears still exists in this country? What of bear meat? What of the bear story in the Bible? Tell what you can remember of the story of an encounter with a bear in the West.

Our Puzzle Box.

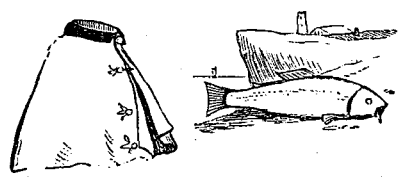
1.—REBUS.



Possessed by a jack-of-all-trades.

2.—A STYLISH ENIGMA.

Now here is a style
That will make you smile,
And you'll guess it the very first trial;
It does not denote
The style of a coat,
But the style of the good old sun-dial.
Behead it, and there
'Tis, a palindrome fair,
Whose center if yet you but take away,
'Tis a curious fact
That it shows you exact,
And at all times, the mid of the day.
So our sun stands still Over Puzzler's Hill.
As for Gideon once on Gilboa;
And it even runs back
In its palindrome track,
As once for the king Hezekiah—
If the Bible don't tell us a-lie-ah!

Correspondence.

May 15, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I saw so many boys and girls writing letters I thought I would write one too. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for eight years. I hav two little sisters, one of them is five and the other nine. I am a girl twelve years old. This is the first letter. Excuse my poor writing. Your Freethinker friend,

MATILDA A. STICE.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., April 28, 287.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: In offering the inclosed lines I do not wish to intrude upon the rights of others who are more capable of entertaining the children of the Corner than myself. I rejoice, and I am sure there are many who share this feeling with me, that the Children's page is always so filled with tender, humane, and scientific principles. "As the twig is bent the tree's inclined" is an old saw, but none the less true. Children who are given the right start on the path of life will not accept silly superstitions when they are grown up. With best wishes for the prosperity of the Corner, I am,

Ever yours for the truth,

MARY B. FINCH.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER: It is quite natural to expect to hear a Finch sing, and sing well, too, as she often does in our Corner (I mean Mary B., as a matter of course). But a Crow, or J. Crow, or, to be facetious and doubly punsome, a Jay Crow—why, "it beats all nature," and no mistake! Two very unmelodious birds in one combination for perfect harmony—the very embodiment of euphony and impersonation of poesy.

Dagmar's "Virginia's Visit" was a fine puzzle to me, and called all my mind-reading faculty into play, as I am unacquainted with both Dagmar and Virginia. Virginia is the daughter of Bishop Snow, and no matter what gentile prejudice may say, she is not over-estimated by her friend Dagmar. Your puzzle artist is doing excellent work. But above all others, I desire to praise that very fine contribution on "The Right and the Wrong," by Jessie Brewster. Don't print anything from your Old Boy as long as there is anything like that on hand. We must hav more from her. She is a giantess. Who is she, anyway? Your OLD BOY.

Saint Anthony's Sermons.

Saint Anthony preached to the Priory throng;
Saint Anthony's sermons were terribly long,
So dreary, so weary, so learnedly deep,
That all of the brothers were soon fast asleep.
He sighed as he looked at them, placid and still,
For he loved his own sermons, as some people will;
Then away in a huff to the river he sped,
A sermon he'd preach to the fishes instead.

He stood on the brink and his sermon began,
But fish are not fonder of sermons than man.
So he girt up his cassock; quoth he, "I must go
And see if they'll listen to me down below."
That night as the monks in refectory sat,
They wondered and asked what the saint could be at,
When a young brother said, as he bent over his dish,
"He's gone to the river to preach to the fish!"

So down to the river they started in quest,
And peered through the water with curious zest,
Till they spied in the bed of the river below
The saint and the fish sitting row upon row.
And 'tis said ever since that historical night
Not a fish in that stream can be tempted to bite.
The reason's as plain as the waters are deep,
Saint Anthony's sermons hav sent them to sleep.

—Frederick E. Weatherly, in Temple Bar.

Patrick O'Finagin's Church Dues.

One evening, weak and weary,
When my mind was sad and dreary
At my prospects of the future, too disconsolate to tell,
I went to Father Carey,
Who is always light and airy,
Faith, he never seems to bother about heaven, earth, or hell.

"Och!" says I, "dear Father John,
I've an awful taking on
About my sins and my shortcomings, and I dread the judgment day;
But your rev'rence can retrieve me,
And with fitting words relieve me,
And with holy consolations take my terrors all away."

Then, with repentant fearing,
I whispered, in his hearing,
Many a sad thought which I long had kept a secret in my mind;
And I asked him to excuse
If I couldn't pay my dues
To the church and to the priest, as the crops were far behind.

"Sure poor Biddy and the childer
Need so many things they hinder,
And I scarce can keep the devil of starvation from my door;
But holy Father Carey
You can make me bright and airy
With a word of consolation from the church's ample store."

There I ended my confession
Of the cause of my depression,
But my sins were so enormous that the priest had to refuse;
For his "claim in a disaster
Is the first—all others after—
And the church givs consolation to the man who pays his dues."

Sturgis, Mich. THOMAS HARDING.

Might and Right.

The people's love for Father McGlynn shows a wide appreciation of the stand he has taken for human rights. His position has a high significance. It means that authority, to be respected, must make itself respectable; that it is not enough to assert authority, but that the title to authority must be proved by reason and based upon fundamental right.

No more dangerous or disreputable prostitution of authority has ever been exhibited in this country than the imposition of a fine upon Mr. Charles B. Reynolds by one Judge Childs in a New Jersey court for "blasphemy." The law put into the hands of this judge the power to take $75 from Mr. Reynolds, and he hastened to demonstrate his unworthiness to be intrusted with this power by taking the money. This $75 was taken as a thief takes. It was honest money, and no equivalent was rendered for it. If ever there was a bold, licentious defiance of right, this outrage by Judge Childs was one. In his anxiety to uphold an obsolete law he ignored the fundamental law, "Thou shalt not steal." In his anxiety to pander to the worst elements in New Jersey he has written his name on the roll of infamous judges.

My soul goes forth in reverent admiration for Father McGlynn because of his firm stand against the most corrupt autocracy the world has ever seen, and my soul rises to adoration of Colonel Ingersoll for his noble defense of Mr. Reynolds's rights, which must excite approval all over the world. As a lawyer, loving my profession, I want to sound a note of warning. The bar and the bench cannot stand many such trials as that of Mr. Reynolds. The strain is too great. Already lawyers are beginning to be looked upon as unable or too indifferent to remedy the mischiefs of such trials, and if lawyers and the law fail to represent human rights, then we may fairly expect before long to see the bar and the bench held in as light esteem as the pulpit is to-day. If theology is dishonest in its imposition upon McGlynn, the law is no less so in its swindle of Reynolds.

Stealing $75 from Mr. Reynolds seems to hav vindicated and appeased the Jersey Joss and reëstablished his mighty dignity. Some people were afraid that Mr. Reynolds might spend the rest of his life in prison, and that even that would not ward off the earthquakes and cyclones which an offended God might send to New Jersey, but it turns out to be only a matter which justifies the theft of $75. A great scare all for nothing, and the Jersey Joss is shown up to be a very small-potato fellow after all.

Public sentiment has a great restorativ effect in such cases; and as public sentiment stands upon fundamental right when it supports Father McGlynn in his difference with that beggar on horseback, little Mickey Corrigan, so public sentiment, guided and directed by the master mind of Colonel Ingersoll, should be strong enough and right enough to sternly rebuke this Judge Childs and his infamous work. Let such judges be taught that the world has no sentiment toward them but intense loathing and contempt, and such crimes as Judge Childs has been guilty of will cease and such judges as he will become rare. ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

Sunday Laws in Illinois.

A bill has recently passed the House in Illinois prohibiting the playing of baseball on Sunday. The bill was introduced by Representativ Vickers, of Johnson county. On the 13th of May J. E. Remsburg spoke at the home of Mr. Vickers on the Sunday question. Instead of openly attacking Vickers and his bill, Mr. Remsburg argued against Sunday legislation in general, defended Sunday recreation, and made an earnest plea in behalf of liberty, and by this method carried a majority of Vickers's constituents with him. The following "special" to the Chicago Times shows the effectivness of Mr. Remsburg's address:

SPRINGFIELD, May 20.—[Special.]—Representativ Vickers's constituency is not a unit in the support of his bill prohibiting the playing of baseball on Sunday, and 111 sent a petition to Senator Garrity to use all his influence in securing a defeat of the measure. In the Senate this morning Senator Garrity had the petition read, after which it was referred to the committee on license and miscellany. The petition is as follows:

MR. GARRITY, Senate Chamber, Dear Sir: At the request of many of the citizens of Vienna, I inclose the within petition to you. We desire to acquaint the Senate with the fact that a majority (and a large majority, too,) of the citizens of this (Johnson) county are opposed to the bill prepared by Vickers. The signers of this petition are in earnest. We want this bill defeated. We are opposed to it becoming a law—

1. Because it is unconstitutional.
2. It is an open attempt to infringe upon the rights of the people.
3. It is not in accordance with the spirit of progress and liberty of our state and people.
4. It is only characteristic of its author's idea of liberty.
5. It prevents honest, hard-working, moral young men, who labor from ten to twelve hours a day, from enjoying themselvs on Sunday.
6. It is par excellence with the infamous old Sunday laws of Connecticut.
7. It is an attempt to re-enact the religious intolerance of a century ago.
8. It virtually bars labor from amusement and makes pleasure a crime.
9. It is infamous, brutal, and heartless.

It was born of policy; political aspiration was its father, and the author's hope its mother.

It takes sunshine from the many to satisfy the selfish wish of the few. We are opposed to all this. We are for law and order, but we are against inquisitions. Giv the young men liberty—just a little. Let them play ball. We are in favor of being law-abiding citizens seven days in the week. Anything that is immoral on Sunday is immoral any other day as well. Vickers is too narrow to see this. If any man disturbs the peace the law covers the case. If the law as it is be enforced, the rights of all will be protected. Every Sunday-school, every church, every family, every home and fireside, every picnic, and every public meeting will be protected.

The names on the petition represent more than two-thirds of the business men of Vienna, and two-thirds of this number supported Vickers last November. You are at liberty to use the petition in any way you may deem proper.

Asking you to kindly lend your aid in opposing the law, I am, Very truly yours,

L. O. WHITNEL.

PETITION.

TO THE HONORABLE SENATE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS: We, the undersigned citizens, business men, and firms doing business in the town of Vienna, Johnson county, Ill., do hereby emphatically enter our protest against the passage of the bill which lately passed the lower house of the general assembly, prohibiting the playing of baseball on Sunday, because in our judgment said bill is an infringement on the rights and liberties of the people, prohibiting, as it does, innocent amusement, recreation, and pleasure.

Signed by 111 citizens of Vienna.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,
The Present and the Future Republic of North America
BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

"I could pronounce no benediction upon Romanism. It h s done mischief enough to deserve transportation for life. I regard Roman Christianity as the worst form of tyranny. It commands the arm to work and the brain to die; it feeds faith and starves thought; it loves oppression and hates liberty. It has given falsehood a crown and truth a scaffold."

News of the Week.

EDITOR O'BRIEN was shot at in Hamilton, Ont., last week while returning to his hotel from the hall where he had lectured in behalf of Ireland. His driver was hit in the wrist, but the lecturer escaped uninjured. Mr. O'Brien is a Catholic, and his assailants are supposed to be Orangemen.

QUEEN KAPIOLANI has sailed for Europe.

SPAIN has just had built a new torpedo boat with a speed of over 33 miles per hour.

THE Jacob Sharp trial has not progressed visibly during the past week. Great difficulty is experienced in selecting a jury satisfactory to both sides.

TIFFANY still refuses to take back his employees unless they will leave the Knights of Labor, and has also declined an invitation to confer with the state Board of Mediation and Arbitration.

THE Opera Comique at Paris was destroyed by fire on the night of May 25th. Two thousand persons were in the theater at the time, and 200 are reported to hav perished, many of them actresses.

IT is getting to be the general belief that New York has at present another board of boodle aldermen. The mayor is having a desperate struggle with them to prevent their corruptly awarding the city electric light contract.

MAJOR BEN. PERLEY POORE, the writer, died last Sunday at Washington.

HANLAN, the world's champion oarsman, was beaten at Chicago on the 30th ult. by Gaudaur.

J. H. RUNYON, of Keyport, N. J., was denied the right to testify in a case in which he was plaintiff last week, because he admitted that he was an Infidel.

THE burning of some car stables in this city last week destroyed 1,200 horses, and the flames spreading burnt a number of tenement houses, and left several hundred people homeless.

DECORATION DAY was observed in New York with a fine parade and a big meeting in the Academy of Music, where Governor Hill was present; Mayor Hewitt presided, and Talmage orated.

THE proprietor of a Chicago dime museum has written to the postmaster at Morristown, N. J., instructing him to engage the twelve men who sat on the Reynolds jury in the blasphemy case. He wants to exhibit them as freaks, and will pay them $500 for two weeks.

CANON FLEMING, of London, has just issued a book of sermons one of which is said to be plagiarized almost wholly from a discourse delivered six years ago by the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, of Brooklyn. The canon's bad taste in stealing is generally condemned, and he has apologized in a published card.

THE New York legislature has adjourned without modifyi ng the Sunday laws, and the liquor-seller will now proceed to oil the hinges of his side door for use upon the first day of the week. Mayor Hewitt has done his best to enforce an obnoxious law in order to get it repealed. Having failed in this object through the stupidity of the legislature, it is not likely that he will trouble himself much further in the matter.

IT is announced that the visitations of the priests in St. Stephen's parish, which Dr. McGlynn was bounced from, hav been unusually successful, and will be extended another month. A "visitation" means that the priests call at all the houses in the parish, and pray with and prey upon the inhabitants. Every good Catholic, on these occasions, is expected to giv something, if it is his last penny. Those who giv nothing run the risk of being damned. There are 20,000 persons in St. Stephen's parish.

ABRAHAM GOETH OUT TO OFFER UP ISAAC.

And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him.—Gen. xxii, 3.

Odds and Ends.

THE woman whose favorit hymn is "I Would Not Liv Always," has spent $230 for patent medicins during the last ten years.

DR. TALMAGE denounces 99 per cent of novels as pernicious. The doctor will now hav numerous letters of inquiry as to the titles of the volumes.

A METHODIST minister in Connecticut is reported as saying that there will not be as many Congregationalists in heaven as there are icicles in the other place.

CITIZEN: "Pat, would you be in favor of home rule if you could hav it for the asking?" Pat: "No, sor! You don't find me a-takin' for nothin' anything I might fight for."

REV. MR. BLANK: "My dear, I've brought you this pretty parrot to cheer your hours when I am away. He can't talk yet, but we'll soon teach him; won't we, pretty Polly?" Pretty Polly: "Not by a —— sight!"

"SPEAKING about the artist who painted fruit so naturally that the birds came and pecked at it," said the fat reporter, "I once drew a hen that was so true to life that after the city editor threw it into the waste basket it laid there."

OMAHA lady: "Dick, you havn't told me all about that new baby." Little Dick: "I don't know much about it yet. It only got here this morning." "But you havn't even said whether it is a sister or a brother." "Well, it looks like a little brother, but mamma says he is goin' to be a sister, an' I suppose he will."

NORTHERN lady (who has not been long in the South): "How is your sister Matilda coming on in her new place?" Colored lady: "Matildy is comin' on first-rate, but de baby am mighty colicky." "Baby! Why, I didn't know she was married." "No wonder yer didn't know hit. Matildy herself didn't know hit."

PARSON SQUIRE: "I understand, deacon, that the church carpet is being ruined by water from dripping umbrellas." Deacon Goode: "It is so, parson, and something has got to be done." Parson: "Why not hav a rack in the vestibule, and leave the umbrellas there instead of carrying them to the seats?" Deacon: "I am afraid it would spoil the solemnity of the benediction." Parson: "You think so?" Deacon: "Yes; everybody would want to be the first out so as to get the best ones."

IN a conversation drifting toward the many wise provisions of nature the Rev. Mr. Mackwell said: "The other day, in my intellectual excursions, I came across a wonderfully sensible paper treating of the use of snakes. The long black snake is especially useful. He goes into the dense swamps, worms himself among the reeds and flags, and devours thousands of scorpions and lizards, which, without his timely interference, would become too numerous. So, you see, everything, even the black snake, is useful, being created for a purpose." "That is all very well," one of the reverend gentleman's listeners replied. "We recognize the usefulness of the snake, because he devours scorpions and lizards, but of what use, pray tell me, are the scorpions and lizards?" "They eat innumerable insects," the minister triumphantly replied. "All right; but of what use are the insects?" "The insects? Why-er—they serve as food for lizards." "Yes; but of what use are the lizards?" "Why, you must be blind not to see that they serve as food for snakes." "Of course I see that, but that only brings up the question of what use are the snakes." "To eat the lizards, I tell you. My dear sir," the minister added, "it is not strange that Christianity advances so slowly when we think of man's narrowness of understanding."

MRS. PIOUS: "I do wish, Mr. McSnorter, that you would come up and see my husband. He is very ill, and I am afraid he will die without experiencing religion. Don't you think you can convince him of the necessity of atoning for his past neglect?" Rev. McSnorter: "I will try, Mrs. Pious. I will come up this afternoon and see if I can't induce him to leave some of his fortune to the new theological seminary." Mrs. Pious (hastily): "On second thought Mr. McSnorter I don't believe your presence will be necessary."

A TALE OF PIETY.

On Sundays little William went Unto his Sabbath-school:
He learned his lesson every week,
And never broke the rule.

He kept that up until at length,
When he had older grown,
He knew enough to take and teach
A class all of his own.

Behold what good may come to those
Who lead a pious life,
And mingle but with righteous men—
Abjuring sin and strife.

The president of that same bank
Where William was a clerk
Beheld with joy his interest
In doing Christian work.

"Of such a very pious man
There surely is no fear:"
So said the president, who then
Made William his cashier.

Now William livs in luxury
Somewhere in Montreal;
Securely fixed with this world's goods,
Whatever may befall.

And to his children, when they come
And cluster 'round his knee,
He says, "Be good, for just see what
The gospel did for me."

Gems of Thought.

THE swamps of the Carolinas could tell stories of Protestant cruelty to Protestant slaves that would make the very trees sigh in sorrow for the brutality of Christian slave-drivers.—D. M. Bennett.

REASON was given to man to be exercised, not to be stifled. Destroy that and you dwarf man to a brute. Take reason away from man and you take all that is noble in him; it is the motion from the air, the hue from the flower, the light from the sun. Reason bids a man throw off his false reverence of customs, and embody his life in higher forms. Reason is radical. It does not believe that goodness is all known, that greatness is all dead, and that man's whole duty is to worship the former and weep over the latter; but it points him forward, and says: "There are holier truths to be learned, loftier hights to be reached, and a better humanity to be lived."—L. K. Washburn.

IT so happens that of late the death-beds of believers hav been possibly less peaceful than those of unbelievers. Terrible doubts hav intruded themselvs. Orthodoxy is bound to believe that Voltaire and Paine, and other so-called Infidels, died miserable deaths, and still goes on asserting it, though there is not a particle of proof. But it would not be difficult, were the proof (as to the miserable death of these so-called Infidels) abundant, to match these cases with a score to one of the unhappy deaths of orthodox Christians of the most saintly character.—John W. Chadwick.

I DO not believe in forgivness as it is preached by the church. We do not need the forgivness of God, but of ourselvs. If I rob Mr. Smith and God forgivs me, how does that help Smith? If I, by slander, cover some poor girl with the leprosy of some imputed crime, and she withers away like a blighted flower, and afterward I get the forgivness of God, how does that help her? If there is another world, we hav got to settle with the people we hav wronged in this. No bankrupt court there. Every cent must be paid.—Ingersoll.

A SUNBEAM piercing the forbidden shade
Of some drear prison cell has often brought Quiet to troubled spirits, and has made
Dark, morbid brooding change to peaceful thought.
So one good life will prove a guiding light,
To brighten paths weak mortals oft find drear—
A beacon in the narrow way of right
To lure the fallen to a higher sphere.

SCIENCE worships truth alone; her steady gaze is fixed upon the real; she never glances aside to follow expediency. Her work is to declare what is; she leaves to others to say what ought to be. Pure, serene, unwavering, Science walks through this world of ours, a grand, clear, daylight in illuminating all dark places, revealing with equal lucidity, beautiful facts and ugly facts. As the rays of the sun fall alike on gorgeous palace and on filthy hovel, on fair and happy faces, and on those plowed deep with the lines of misery and want, so does the sunlight of science throw clear beams on the glory of nature, and illuminate with equal brightness its stains and its dark blots.—Mrs. Annie Besant's Christianity and Freethought.

THOU hast been
As one, in suffering all, that suffers nothing;
A man that fortune's buffets and rewards
Hast ta'en with equal thanks; and bless'd are those,
When blood and judgment are so well commingled
That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger
To sound what stop she pleases. Giv me that man
That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him
In my heart's core, ay, in my heart of hearts,
As I do thee. —Shakspere's Hamlet.

SHAKSPERE says we are creatures that look before and after. The more surprising that we do not look round a little and see what is passing under our very eyes.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

THE Egyptians laughed in the faces of the Greeks, and called them children when they talked of their gods of yesterday, and so well did their pupils profit by their lesson that they soon laughed at the Egyptians for believing in the gods at all. Xenophanes (550 B C.) declaimed against the Egyptian myth of an earth-walking, dying, rescuscitated God. He said that if Osiris was a man, they should not worship him; and that if he was a God, they need not lament his sufferings. —Winwood Reade.

FOR ourselvs, we own that we do not understand the common phrase, A good man but a bad king. We can as easily conceive a good man and an unnatural father, or a good man and a treacherous friend. We cannot, in estimating the character of an individual, leave out of our consideration his conduct in the most important of all human relations: and if in that relation we find him to hav been selfish, cruel, and deceitful, we shall take the liberty to call him a bad man in spite of all his temperance at table, and all his regularity at chapel.—Macaulay's Milton.

A CONTRAST.

Notes and Clippings.

IN Venezuela, S. A., a newspaper editor is in prison for intimating that that country has not progressed under the rule of the present king.

A DAKOTA organization has on its letter head these words: "Office of the Brule County Horse-Racing Association, Successor to the Young Men's Christian Association."

GOVERNOR HILL has vetoed Vedder's Special License bill. Some 300 other bills, passed by the legislature at the last session, await his action, Comstock's "Disgusting" bill among the rest.

GEORGE H. DISQUE was hanged at Jersey City, N. J., June 1st, for the brutal and unprovoked murder of his wife. In his confession of the crime he said, "I put my trust alone in God, and hope he will be gracious to my soul."

THE council convened by the First Baptist church, one of the largest and most important places of worship in St. Paul, Minn., to investigate charges of untruthfulness and unchastity against the late pastor, the Rev. R. R. Ridell, hav found him guilty, and recommended that he be deposed from the ministry.

A DELEGATION of New York hotel men, headed by Colonel Ingersoll, called on Mayor Hewitt last week to ask him for a more liberal construction of the law which prohibits the drinking of wine with meals on Sunday. The mayor assured his visitors that while he did not indorse the present construction of the law, he had no discretion in the matter, and advised them to make a test case and carry it to the Court of Appeals.

THOSE who trifle with the unknowable sometimes bring about results that are unexpected. On Sunday, May 22d, the Rev. Mr. Griffiths, of the Episcopal church at Kent, Conn., prayed long and fervently for rain. The following Thursday rain came, and with it lightning. A bolt struck the church and damaged it to the extent of $100.

THE presbytery at Hudson, N. Y., in the case of the Rev. Mr. Schabehorn, charged with drunkenness and immoral conversation with women, finds that the pastor's usefulness is at an end. It warns him to abstain from these vices in future. Mr. Schabehorn has taken a total abstinence pledge as to beer, and has gone to work as pastor at Clarkstown.

SOME Rhode Island Christians lately, in an orthodox discussion of "divine" mysteries, appealed to a silent listener to giv his views on the subject. "My opinion is," said Mr. H., "that one man knows just as much about unknowable things as another;" a proposition which called for so much study in order to seize the point of attack that it broke up the discussion.

THE Pall Mall Gazette says that the explanation of Canon Fleming, the queen's chaplain, that he quoted inadvertently from Talmage's sermons, instead of copying them, in his recent volume does not cover the case. It appears strange that several pages could be accurately copied without the knowledge of the copyist. This is not the first time Talmage has been stolen from. A Harrisburg, Pa., minister was tried and condemned for that offense a few years ago, which has recalled the remark of an exchange that "the standard of morality in Harrisburg must be very different from that of Brooklyn, for whereas the people of the former city rose up against a man for merely repeating one of his sermons, the people of Brooklyn, where they were originally delivered, made no disturbance at all."

THE Rev. W. E. Solomon, a Baptist preacher of Salem, Mo., was last week convicted of living with too many women, and sent to jail for three months and heavily fined. The trial was largely attended. The reverend gentleman set up the plea that he had a worthy example in his great namesake, who had seven hundred wives, but a Salem jury didn't think so. He had already been turned out of the church for his misconduct.

THE older members of Plymouth church believe that Beecher's successor should be one who will stick to the theology of the dead pastor. At a business meeting held last week Mr. Thomas G. Shearman, a trustee, said: "It would be a sorry thing for us to seek the fellowship of those who are willing to fellowship with us now that he is gone. We should never take a step toward asking anyone to condone our offense of having that greatest and best man for our pastor. We hav also a duty in holding up a light here to the world. It would be our eternal disgrace to be led into the deplorable error of calling as a pastor one who should deem it his duty to rectify Mr. Beecher's errors, and call us back to the theology of Calvin. We don't want to go back with Jonah into the belly of any sea dog. We want no man here, however eloquent or pious, who represents ideas not of the school of Mr. Beecher, the school of which he was the leader and light. We want the next man to hold up that light, and to sustain and rejoice in the church founded and built up under the theology of Mr. Beecher, which we hav found good enough to liv by and to die by. I trust we shall call a man as our pastor who will be faithful in preaching the gospel of love and not of fear."

AT the conclusion of Mr. Reynolds's recent trial for blasphemy, the Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost wrote to the editor of the World of this city: "I hav read with interest your account of the trial of Mr. Reynolds in Morristown, N. J., for blasphemy, and think some one ought to express the disgust and shame which many Christians must feel at the proceeding. How silly and stupid it is to fine a man for expressing his honest opinions, in whatever bad taste, so long as he infringes on no one else's equal rights in doing so. Will men never learn anything from history? It seems incredible that a statute against blasphemy can be operativ in this or any state. This silly and wicked statute has succeeded in giving a thousand times the circulation to Mr. Reynolds's pamphlet that it otherwise would hav had. I am a Christian minister, but in my opinion, if God and the Christian religion cannot take care of themselvs without resort to courts of human law, both are in a bad way. Truth takes care of itself. If we hav the truth we need not fear blasphemers. If Mr. Reynolds has the truth, judges and jurors will not suppress it. That cause is a very weak one which will not bear discussion. I venture the opinion that there are many Christians in New Jersey who are ashamed of the Reynolds trial and conviction, as I certainly am."

Communications.

Protection to Labor.

And here let me say the so-called labor organizations are in fact organizations of workingmen into unions to withhold their labor from market until certain terms are granted. None of them are therefore really and in fact organizations of labor. Labor is never really organized except as it is actually engaged in industry in conjunction and partnership with capital.

Any organization of labor which fails to include within itself the capital necessary to the employment of labor, evidently implies the existence of another organization of labor, exterior to, and more or less independent of it; viz., the organization of labor by capital which employs the labor givs it all the means of subsistence it actually receives, and even the means with which it sustains all collateral and secondary attempts at organization, including the means with which labor organizes itself to fight capital when war between the two is necessary. Hence it is the primary organization of social industry, through the coöperation of labor with capital, under the inducement of wages to the worker and profits to the employer, that now constitutes the existing organization of labor as an agent in actual industry. All other organizations of labor, such as the Knights of Labor, the Central Labor Union, and the trades unions, are organizations effectiv to aid in settling with capitalists the terms upon which laborers shall enter into the final compact with capital whereby they finally become, in the only true sense of the word, organized labor, i. e., labor organically set in motion to effect industrial results, i. e., to increase the consumption, production, and distribution of commodities. What are ordinarily called organizations of labor, i. e., societies to adjust the terms on which men will work, bear the same relation to the actual organization of labor, or to Society at Work, as primaries in politics bear to the actual government. When the actual officers of government hav been selected, the primaries dissolve and lie dormant until another occasion for selection arises, while the government moves on in the hands of the officers whose choice the primaries hav aided to determin.

When the Knights of Labor, trades unions, Brotherhood of Locomotiv Engineers, and other similar orders hav done their work, labor is not yet organized. It has only fixed the terms on which it will organize. Its real organization is only arrived at when the wheels of industry are again set in motion, with every man at his post, the loom deftly weaving its product, the Bessemer caldron blazing with its silvery draft of liquid flame, the engin toiling smoothly under its tremendous burden, and the car gliding "o'er the stony street." Labor is really organized only when society is again at work.

In a paper read before the Cleveland convention in May last, by Lawrence Harmon, of Peoria, it was stated that the fact of 200,000 men striking between April 24th and May 12th, and 125 000 men being out in the week ending May 12th, had entailed a loss of wages amounting to $3,000,000, and of gross returns to capital rising to $2,500,000, of $4,000,000 in losses upon deferred and canceled contracts, and of $20,400,000 upon building contracts; the entire loss upon strikes in the three months immediately following the first of May aggregating many hundred millions of dollars. To this must be added the effort of the Anarchists in Chicago to convert the strikes into a social revolution, the slaughter of the police by dynamite, and the impending sentence upon leading Anarchists consequent upon that tragedy. No one mistakes these events for an organization of labor. They are the disorganization of labor in its most short-sighted, cruel, and criminal form.

Organizations of laborers into unions are essential to protect laborers from making injurious contracts to work, and they become mischievous in so far as they prevent them from making contracts to work which are beneficial, or as nearly so as the share of the profits derivable from the industry permits.

In so far as they cultivate in workingmen the notion that their condition as wage-workers is permanent, and dull in their minds the aspiration to become their own employers and the employers of others, in that degree they injure their members pecuniarily and mentally, and depress the rate of wages. They should be training schools for the graduation of capitalists and employers. It is only by multiplying employers that wages can be raised.

The state can do very little toward multiplying the number of employers. What little it can do lies in the direction of facilitating the formation of corporations, so that enterprises involving great corporate risks can be undertaken without great individual risk. It may be said roughly that the creation of corporations multiplies by ten the willingness of capital to take risks, and therefore multiplies in like manner the field for the employment of labor. The state can do a little, perhaps, by removing taxes from precarious forms of production, by promoting the collection of debt and the enforcement of contracts. But mainly rates of wages depend on the energy, courage, and promptness with which wage-workers leave their own ranks when they get the means to become profit-makers and employers. This depends on their savings and the use they will make of them. But the amount of their savings and the use they will make of them depend in turn on the theories of life and industry and society into which they are indoctrinated. If they become indoctrinated with the theory that all profit-makers are robbers of labor, and that in order to be honest they must always continue to be poor and to rely on some one else for employment; that the wages life is for them and for all honest workingmen as effectivly perpetual as a life sentence to Siberia is to a Russian, then the largest joy, the most effectiv spring, and the best hope in life are dead and gone to them. What is left is but half a life. If they then settle down into the apathetic torpor of feeling that the best thing they can do with their life is to file down the sharp corners in the chains they wear, to shorten their hours of labor as days-workers, to giv up their unsold hours, hours over which their employer has no control, to lounging, dissipation, or politics, instead of to working to better each man his individual condition; and if especially they allow themselvs to be deluded by prophecies and predictions of the social reorganization of society, in which that day's work not yet done or saved, which is called labor, but which in fact means only the necessity of laboring, shall be of more value and power than the day's work done or saved, which we call capital, then they are not only emasculated of half their working force, but they are on the way to be stripped of two-thirds of their moral manhood and level judgment. They are on their way toward hatred of society, complete inefficiency, and lack of industry and enterprise, and social rebellion and ostracism.

The point where workingmen decide their fate for good or ill is where they consent to surrender individual ambition, and to be one of a class or caste that shall own no property, not even the tools with which it works—no home, no land, no means of subsistence beyond the day, and no plans for getting out of this bondage except those dreams which involve getting everybody else out at the same time. Wages work should be the necessary starting-point of the young, but the exceptional condition of middle life, and should rarely befall the old. It may be wise for laborers to sell to one employer a shorter number of hours per day than they now do. But to hold that short hours of labor in themselvs considered is a blessing, is a fatal blunder. Labor is not a curse to man, woman, or child, but is our chief means of enjoyment, as well as of utility. To train ourselvs to avoid it, instead of to seek it, is the surest means to keep ourselvs under its harrow.

The only road out of poverty is to become one's own employer. The only route to self-employment is by personal economy in expenditure and energy in effort. This implies doing as much of our work ourselvs and hiring as little of it done by others as is consistent with our time and needs, and this implies long hours of labor to every one who seeks to get out of the thraldom of wages work into the freedom of working for profits on the labor-capital and skill of others. Hence the real road to shorter hours for every workingman is longer hours. All business men know this perfectly. But it does not suit the interests of all politicians to say what all business men know to be true. They prefer to cater to existing sentiment rather than to manufacture a more correct sentiment; to float with the tide rather than to turn the tide.

It is not true that hours of labor in the world generally, or in the United States in particular, are shortening, nor is there any reason to believe they ever will shorten, or ever ought to shorten, whether from the invention of machinery or from any other cause. All wealth resolves itself ultimately into the means to command the services of others, and so expansiv are our wants and the wants of all mankind that as each new want is supplied with less effort than previously, twenty new and higher wants spring up in place of it.

The infinit elasticity of our wants is an undoubted truism in economics. But its necessary corollary is an exhaustless demand upon our energies. The class of men who are their own employers, especially during the first ten, fifteen, or twenty years of their self-employment, work with all the force and nerve they possess, not merely eight, but twelve, fourteen, or even eighteen hours a day. Some will say this is only until they get their business where it will run itself. But this is not usually true. When a man of enterprise gets any one business where it will run itself, he immediately adds another. When the two will run themselvs, he takes on a third; and so on, until he is loaded up to his full capacity for the profitable expenditure of energy. This is Napoleonism; but Napoleon was simply the type of the energetic business man everywhere. As the tiger has just so much nervous energy to throw off, and if he cannot throw it off in that pursuit of game for which it is adapted, he will expend it in walking up and down behind his prison bars, so will human energy exhaust itself each day upon its work, its investigations, its recreations, or its dissipations, in some form. It will not essentially shorten its hours of expenditure of effort.

The wages class do not average as many hours per day of work in the United States as the self-employing class. It is the love of ease and the desire to avoid the risks, harassments, and worry of self-employment that chiefly keep men in the wages class. At least this is the most prominent reason after the desire to spend their wages in various forms of enjoyment as fast as obtained.

There are very few of the wages class who do not at some time in their lives amass means enough to become their own employers in that small and insecure way in which self-employment, or "working on one's own account," must always begin. But they know that to slip out of an easy and apparently secure wages-earning place into one in which they will be risking their own savings in employing themselvs and others, involves probable loss and a great increase of care, strenuousness of effort, and exertion.

Holidays and short hours will not lessen the competition of the wage-workers with each other or increase the number of their employers.

This can only be done by a large portion of the wage-workers becoming employers and working for profits instead of for wages. If wages are too low, it proves that there are too few profit-makers, and that the competition among them is not as great as it needs to be to make wages higher. How can an increasing number of wage-earners be induced to become profit-makers and enterprisers? This can only be done by multiplying the number and stimulating the activity of all the industries in which it is possible to make profits. Alexander Hamilton is charged, whether truly or not I cannot say, with having uttered the sentiment that if government will take care of the rich, the poor will take care of themselvs. This sounds heartless as an expression. If, however, it is so modified as to substitute for the rich the enterprising, those who will use their capital and that of others in giving employment to as many as their capital will cover, it then becomes true that government can more feasibly and more economically provide for those who are compelled to work for wages by multiplying the avenues in which enterprising men can make a profit, in employing capital to pay for labor, than in coming directly to the wages-workers and distributing bread and rations among them gratuitously or in legislating concerning their hours of labor.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

I was once advertised to speak in a place where I was not personally known to any of the gentlemen who had the meeting in charge. A colored lady was speaking in the state at the same time, and no one of the getters-up of the meeting knew whether the name Colman belonged to the white woman or the colored. I arrived at the station after nightfall, and the problem was unanswered. At last one of the gentlemen, a little more brave than the others in waiting, propounded the important question, "Mrs. Colman, we do not know whether you are the colored or the white lady; will you please tell us?" I felt a little mischievous, and so said: "If you are not able to tell a white person and a colored, one from the other, why should you care? If I am colored and pass for white I may gain a little among the people who are prejudiced against color;" and so I refused to tell them, and not one of the audience was able positivly to decide. The morning light gave them the much desired answer.

I think, as I am on the subject of color, I will relate an anecdote which more properly belongs some years later, but I might omit it should I wait for the more proper place, chronologically speaking.

During the war, when I was in Washington, a Dr. Thompson was sent from England by the friends of the colored people to look about and see what was the best thing for their English friends to do for them. Calling at my office, he immediately took me for his countrywoman, and was so well pleased to be with one of his own nation that before I had time to announce myself as a full-blooded Yankee he had begged me to allow him to remain my guest while he should stay in Washington. He was in company with the Rev. Mr. Leigh, of New York city, the president of the Freedmen's Aid Society, in whose employ I was at that time. Mr. Leigh's daughter was with her father, and as a great favor I was asked by Mr. Leigh to take the young lady, a miss of perhaps fourteen, into my care, and show her the sights, while the two gentlemen should pursue their business or pleasure without encumbrance. I of course took the young lady to the public reception at the White House.

Dr. Thompson and Mr. Leigh soon after arrived, and following them came Captain Carse, of Freedman's Village. Captain Carse was my friend, and seeing me, he came immediately to me, and, with great indignation in his voice and face, said he had brought Sojourner Truth, with his wife, just as he would hav brought his own mother, and that the doorkeeper would not allow Sojourner to come inside because she was colored. Dr. Thompson expressed great surprise at the atrocity, but there was no help. Mrs. Lincoln's dressmaker, a colored woman, who always dressed Mrs. President, was never permitted to go into the house as a caller; color in any degree was a bar to the entrance. Dr. Thompson said to me: "I would so like to take a colored person on my arm and enter this house!" I said: "Wait until the next reception day, and I will arrange that you shall do so." I introduced him to Miss Josephine Slade, daughter of the usher at the White House under President Johnson, and who afterward became Mrs. Wormley, wife of one of the far-famed Wormley brothers. She was very beautiful, and being on the arm of a distinguished English gentleman, the usher did not detect the color, and so she passed in. Mrs. Lincoln, however, knew the young lady, as she was sometimes employed as helper by the dressmaker, and she did not fail to scowl upon her her contempt at the intrusion. This prejudice against color looked very contemptible in the eyes of the good Englishman, and it certainly was, and is, vulgarly contemptible. But was it more so than the English caste that forbids the Marquis of Lorne, the husband of one of Queen Victoria's daughters, walking beside his wife and entering the same door with her in some of the public assemblages of the titled nobility of old and aristocratic England? "Physician, heal thyself," is often an appropriate admonition.

I now return to my work. I was in Ulster county some time, and in Greenfield I had a memorable time. In Ellenville there were two or three prominent men who were pronounced Abolitionists, and tolerant in their religion, and with their assistance I had a very successful meeting.

I always made it a point in my addresses to speak of the legal slavery in which every white woman is held, being governed by laws to which she has never given consent, and this statement of her condition raised the ire of some two or three lawyers of the baser sort, so that after my departure from the county they made loud threats of what they would do if I ever came among them again, getting up a list of questions relating to sex, very vulgarly worded, which they announced they should propound to me. The member of the legislature from Ellenville had served as chairman for my meeting, and was a personal friend. He wrote to me asking if I had the courage to come again and speak. I answered, "Engage the hall and advertise." He had by some adroitness obtained a list of the questions that were to overthrow me and the cause of woman. I was consequently informed of what I was to meet, though that matter was a secret between Mr. D. and myself. My friend had also obtained the service for chairman of a very popular man, who believed in free speech. I arrived in the morning of the day, and was met with a welcome from several friends, but they were so doleful and fearful that, had I not been sure of myself, I should probably hav failed from being affected by their timidity. The hall was filled, many more women being present than on my first visit. The chairman was skilful as a keeper of order, and the meeting was quiet.

When I took my place, I announced that I had been informed that some gentlemen, who I was glad to see were present, had a number of queries to propound, and if they would present them then, at the opening of the meeting, I would be obliged, as perhaps the entire evening's time might be required for the answers. The audience evinced the greatest anxiety, but the gentlemen kept their seats, and their tongues seemed to hav been tied. I had the list of questions in my pocket, and knew how to answer them without being in my address vulgar or obscene. The vulgarity was in the wording of the queries. I do not now find it, nor hav I ever found it, obscene to talk about the relation of the sexes. If fathers and mothers would teach their children the laws of physical life, and the sacredness of the human body in all its functions, licentiousness would soon disappear. The meeting was a great success, and was so reported in the local papers, but those base men wrote a garbled, lying report to the New York Herald, and it was published, as thousands such hav been since. I was somewhat hurt by hearing that one of the leaders of the Woman's Rights party said, on reading the report, that she was sure Mrs. Colman must hav been very imprudent, or such reports would not hav been made. How little she knew about it then! Since then she has been maligned beyond decency in a hundred papers, and in a city of which I hav long been a resident she was once hanged in effigy in such a position that to-day, thirty years after, as I write of it, the blood mounts to my face, and I involuntarily blush for poor human nature.

IT is reported that Deacon George White, of Seymour, Indiana, has been expelled from his church on account of his extremely liberal views. He boldly declares that he believes the world is a million years old, and that, as likely as not, it will last another million before the judgment day.

The Liquor Law and Sunday.

There is an absurdity about our Sunday liquor laws apart from their religious aspect, and this absurdity is that they aim at suppressing an effect instead of a cause. The alleged object of the laws is to preserve the peace and sanctity of the day; and to this end the authorities hav been forced, in the interests of the impartial administration of justice, to close the bars in our uptown hotels, even where it is admitted that the sale of liquor over them would not probably, if possibly, lead to public disturbance. It appears that the patrons of these uptown hotels are capable of using intoxicating liquors without deleterious results except to their own health and pockets, while those who patronize the saloons in the less fashionable parts of the city are liable to become boisterous; brawls ensue, crimes are committed against the peace of the people of the state and their dignity, and public order is disturbed. Here we hav two different results from the same act, that of selling liquor. Plainly there is no public harm in selling the uptown man a drink on Sunday, since the effect is innocent, and it is equally plain that directly the opposit is true in the case of the downtown or East or West Side citizen, since the effect is not innocent. It follows, therefore, that liquor may not be the malum in se, and that it is not from the sale but from the drinking by certain persons that evil results. Why, then, should the law deal with the seller and not with the drinker? Why should he be subject to the payment of a license fee which detracts largely from the profits of his business if his business is unproductiv of harm for a legal point of view? And if, on the other hand, his business is productiv of lawlessness and evil, why should he be allowed to conduct it at all, either on Sunday or any other day of the week, since lawlessness and evil are to be discouraged at all times?

The inconsistency and injustice, I hold, arise from restricting the sale of liquors instead of the drinking of them. If the law would deal with intemperance, let it make a crime of drinking on Sunday. The mere prohibition of selling on that day does not suppress the evil, because, by providing himself with liquor on Saturday, the citizen may pass Sunday in any of the various stages of exhilaration desired.

If there were no one to drink on Sunday, there would be no one to sell; but the reverse is not true. Even though none is sold on Sunday, drinking may proceed, as we hav seen, by means of liquor purchased on Saturday.

The prime cause of drunkenness, as noted, is taking liquor into the human stomach; the traffic is incidental merely. Then let the law go to the root and forbid the drinking of liquor except by such as can carry it off with impunity. Instead of licensing the seller, license the buyer. Do we license the dealer in steam-engins, or the man who is to use them? the man who sells fire-arms, or the man who carries them? Let the excise board or the mayor issue the license to drink, embellished with a photograph for identification of the bearer. The fitness of the person to receive such license could be determined experimentally by a board of experts who should, at the state's expense, furnish him with liquor to any extent he chooses to drink it, and then carefully observe the result. If the applicant in this condition repairs to the sidewalk and offers to lick all the civil officers of the municipality and half the constabulary, or otherwise menaces the public weal, the license should of course be withheld; and if he thereafter be discovered with a jag aboard, he could be punished according to the statute in such case to be made and provided. But in instances where the applicant for a license, of his own will and volition, ceases to drink when he has had enough, and then either goes peaceably about his business, or crawls into an empty wagon and sleeps it serenely off, the license may be safely issued, subject to revocation for cause.

Our present liquor laws may be both evaded and broken. The law which I here propose might be broken, but it could not by any means be evaded—which is the test of all sound and scientific legislation.

It may be objected that this method would be a restriction of personal liberty. Admitted; but so is any liquor law. Of what value is the right to buy liquor if the sale of it is prohibited? All will recall the girl who desired to "go out to swim," and received the maternal assent with the proviso that she must not "go near the water." The cases are parallel. Or, for another illustration, suppose that all men were left free to marry, while all women were denied that privilege. Would the male prerogativ be worth getting enthusiastic over? As John Stuart Mill has curtly said, "the state might just as well forbid the citizen to drink wine as to purposely make it impossible for him to obtain it." For a state to concede a right and then deny it exercise is a legal absurdity.

I will state the matter, as it were, catechismally:

Question. Is it desirable to suppress the use of liquor on Sunday? Answer. It is.

Q. For what purpose? A. To prevent drunkenness on that holy day.

Q. By what method do we now seek to attain that end? A. By prohibiting its sale.

Q. Is the attempt a success? A. Not a blooming success.

Q. Why? A. Because by working the bottle Saturday night the citizen may pass Sunday in an advanced state of intoxication.

Q. Is there no law to prevent his doing so? A. There is not.

Q. During the last three Sundays, the law against selling liquor being enforced, how many arrests for drunkenness hav been made? A. 200.

Q. During the corresponding Sundays of last year, when the saloons were open, how many arrests for drunkenness were made? A. 165.

Q. Evidently, then, it is not the open sale of liquor that causes drunkenness? A. No.

Q. What, then? A. The drinking of it.

Q. Does any remedy suggest itself to your powerful intellect? A. There do.

Q. What is it? A. To make the drinking of liquor an offense against the law.

Q. But has not the American citizen a right to determin what he shall take aboard his own stomach? A. He undoubtedly has.

Q. Is not, then, your method an invasion of personal liberty? A. It is; but when the question of preserving the sanctity of the Puritan Sabbath is up for discussion, I beg leave to observe, Personal liberty is of minor consequence.

Now, I am aware that somewhere in this argument there is a fallacy as big as the side of a house, and I hav no doubt that Mr. D. Priestley, of Milwaukee, Or., could point it out so plainly that it could be seen a mile; but I will bet a dollar and stake the money that upon close examination it will be found to be only the reverse side of Prohibition.

I hav a religious acquaintance—an Episcopalian—who sometimes givs utterance to a unique thought. He believes in the saying, In vino veritas—in wine there is truth. That is, the drinking of ardent spirits causes an augmented flow of blood to the brain, and puts into more activ control those passions which are predominant in the individual. Other restraint being relaxed, the true nature is exhibited. He would therefore place each person, at the beginning of his career—say at the age of eighteen years—under the influence of alcoholic stimulant. If in this condition the subject become devotional to a marked degree, and inclined toward spiritual things generally, it would be evident that he possessed an inherent religious nature, and hence should be preserved. But if he become irreligious and blasphemous, or inclined to draw those around him into argument about the authenticity of revealed things, it would prove him to be an undesirable person to hav in a well-ordered community, and he might properly be placed in solitary confinement for life or humanely drowned, according to his fixed prejudices on the subject of capital punishment. In this way the scoffers and hypocrits would be eliminated, and only those by nature religious would survive.

The main objection which the proponent can frame against this scheme is that the carrying it out would interfere with personal liberty, and for that reason any law officer who should attempt to execute it ought to be hanged for a pirate. In my opinion it differs only in degree from Prohibitory and Sunday laws.

As for the drink appetite, I believe that, like other evil appetites, and like the superstitious instinct, it will continue to menace human happiness until men and women hav cultivated sufficient character to control it. Maybe by opposing it with force we shall find that legal persecution strengthens an immoral propensity as well as a good one.

The Case of Charles B. Reynolds.

I am glad that our friend Reynolds has been instrumental in bringing to light the infamous law on blasphemy in New Jersey, and the bigotry and hate of her people, without having to go to states prison for it. On the whole it has been a great victory. That great champion of mental freedom, Colonel Ingersoll, had a magnificent chance to lash the religiously conservativ populace, and he did it well. It will hav a healthy effect upon that community, the state, and the entire country. Further than that, he has shown himself to be the fearless man we who are personally acquainted with him believed him to be. Some may think that discretion is the better part of valor, and that he lacked that discretion, but whether so or not, he, with the prison doors open before him, dared to stand by his honest convictions, and this is glory enough for himself and his friends.

When the self-alleged servants of Jehovah call upon the sovereign will of the people to imprison an honest, fearless, liberty-loving man because he publishes views contrary to theirs, on the plea of wounded feelings, it is a blessing to the country and a safeguard to its free institutions that the farce of the whole thing has been forcibly pictured to the people at large, as it has been done in his recent trial through the will and the ability of Ingersoll the invincible. It can be nothing but a farce for a handful of fanatics to call upon the civil law to defend a supreme divinity against a human being.

We expected nothing better from that ignominious section of this so-called land of liberty than that the full penalty of the law would be his portion. But the backdown of the court is obviously significant. The narrow souls of New Jersey should come in contact with manhood and womanhood imbued with broader and more philanthropic ideas of personal and intellectual liberty.

What a judge! And yet, what better material could be expected from such a source? Mr. Childs's charge to the jury is believed to be without precedent for its shallow reasoning, the novitious significance of its interrogatories, its assumption of things not susceptible of proof, its colorable phases, its bias, and its deplorable lack of judicial dignity by falling to the argument and plea of an interested advocate of the cause of a bigoted people, who he claims instituted and still sustain such an unjust law.

News and Notes.

Sacramento is my last camping-ground in California, and I bid good-bye with hope. I hav not been disappointed in the Golden State. The free spirit of its early people is still alive. However, the battle is not by any means won. The ecclesiastical power is sleepless. Every year large petitions are presented to the legislature for the enactment of Sunday laws. So far, however, without avail, but orthodoxy has the gift of persistency. It hangs on, and it expects some time to catch Liberalism napping, and again pass the Sunday laws, and then will occur another bitter religious fight at the polls. In all the annals of the state there was never so fierce a contest as that which raged over the Sunday laws. When religion enters the political arena, the darkest passions are aroused.

N. D. Goodell, whose generous hospitality makes my stay so pleasant in Sacramento, is a sturdy representativ of the old Californian life. He is of the blood of the Puritans, being born in New England, and brought up in its orthodox atmosphere; but was early drawn into the Universalist church, through which he passed into absolute Freethought. He came to Sacramento when there was not a wooden or brick building erected, but the inhabitants lived in tents and adobes scattered among the groves of live oak which were then here in abundance, but hav since been destroyed. Sacramento now numbers thirty thousand inhabitants. It has many elegant buildings. Merchant princes hav flourished here, and they were the first with little capital, but splendid energy, to start the Central Pacific railroad. It was at Sacramento that this enterprise received its impulse to success. Sacramento is now the railroad center of the state. Five trains per day run to San Francisco. The railroad shops employ two thousand men. It was here that the largest engin in the world two years ago was built. In these shops everything is made connected with cars and engins. Through the kindness of Mr. Lynch, superintendent of the car shops, I was enabled to view this vast hive of industry, where iron and wood are wrought into delicate and massiv shapes for the uses of civilization. It looks as if Sacramento would be the manufacturing point of the Pacific states. The Sacramento valley has not yet developed its agricultural wealth. It can produce almost anything, even the fruits of southern California—oranges, lemons, etc. Its wheat lands are unsurpassed. This valley is capable of supporting a population of millions.

My friend Goodell is an architect, and has erected hundreds of buildings in the city, public and private, wherein is pictured the combination of strength and beauty which is the flower of Freethought. His most successful triumph of art is, I think, the Hospital for the Indigent Sick. This came from "visions of the night." It flashed like an inspiration, if such things be. He awoke from a dream in which this beautiful architecture was outlined almost as it is today in material form. He immediately made drawings, and it was accepted by the con missioners as the most perfect design of all. It is a unique and original conception, and there is nothing like it that I know of in the world. It is so constructed that every room is light and airy, and has the benefit of the sunshine and healthful breeze. It consists of five branching wings, each making a separate edifice, and yet so united that all are practically under one roof. These branching wings join in a frontage of exquisit beauty and majesty, so that the whole impression is perfectly harmonious, and it appears as one building, a beautiful display of unity in variety. It is an achievement of Freethought in architecture, for it is something new, and is not a tame imitation of the old style. It is a happy dream indeed, an ideal home for those who seek rest from the storms of life.

I lecture to-morrow night, and expect to organize the Sacramento Secular Union. I find Davis, of Brighton, seven miles out, a royal ally, for he means business, and by his interest and enthusiasm I look forward to noble results in this captital of California. I will report progress next week. I hav just returned from Yosemite, and I am so full of the wonders of that mighty vale that I hav not much of an eye for business. I feel as if I had been drinking wine every minute for the last five days. I hav beaten Paul and hav gone much higher than the third heaven. I hav climbed, and climbed, and seen the wonder of the world. Next week I will try to relate my marvelous experience, if there is anything in human language by which these gorgeous pictures can be transfused into pen and ink; but of nature I hav received her grandest impulse to freedom and humanity.

I shall be at Ashland, Or., June 5th; Central Point, June 7th and 8th; Talent, June 12th; Coos county, June 13th to 21st; Silverton, June 22d to 24th; Salem, June 26th; Portland, July 3d; Corvallis, July 10th, etc. I shall be able to giv other dates more definitly next week. I hav had my vacation, and now expect a busy campaign until Christmas. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Human Phenomena.

Into the investigation of any of the phenomena of nature, especially so of those which more intimately pertain to the welfare and knowledge of human beings, the element of unbiased candor and fairness should enter, to secure the attainment of truth. After having thus ascertained a basic truth, then the greatest of wisdom is sometimes needed in the effort to develop and establish conclusions which shall be absolutely just. In the exercise of that wisdom it is sometimes necessary that the door of the human heart should be closed against all feelings which would tend to warp the cool, calm judgment of the presiding minds.

When judgment holds the helm,
No wave can overwhelm;
When feeling spreads the sails,
They're torn to shreds by gales.

The great light of the present age has, among other wonders, disclosed an established class of phenomena which history proves to hav been existing in all known ages of the world, but in the past recognized and accepted by mankind only to a limited degree. Upon these phenomena, as a foundation, the superstructure of modern Spiritualism has been built, how wisely is, to many thoughtful and candid minds, a great and momentous question, for nature has laid many another foundation upon which man has erected superstructures only to fall in error and decay on the sands of time.

The phenomena to which allusion has been made consist of so called spirit rappings, involuntary writings, trance speakings, physical manifestations, transformations or transfigurations, form materializations, and magnetic healing. These phenomena are given in the order in which they hav become known in this country, and their apparently permanent and unquestionably genuin existence is candidly admitted and positivly asserted. That they are really no new productions of nature's laws any dispassionate reader of Bible history knows, but that their existence is sufficient warrant for the adoption of the spiritual theory becomes a very grave question when it is considered how little is probably known of the inherent powers of human beings, or of their variety. Wisdom would seem to dictate that the possible compass of those powers should first be ascertained, as a theory based upon actual knowledge would prove to be of the greater value in drawing just conclusions.

Among the universally known powers possessed by human beings are the familiar ones of the ordinary senses, and reason, and memory; and among the more unfamiliar ones admitted are mesmerism, clairvoyance, clairaudience, psychometry, and healing. The former class, being the common heritage of all, are styled human faculties, while the latter, being of rarer possession, are denominated gifts, because erroneously considered as pertaining more specially to man's mentality. That all men do not inherit or possess these faculties and gifts alike is true to the order of nature, infinit variety being a universal law, and that the gifts should be accounted marvelous the facts warrant. And yet it is quite as strange and unaccountable how a human beings should see through the medium of the eyes as to see without them, or as to how perceptions are received through the exercise of any of the other senses is as great a marvel as those received by means of the rarer gifts mentioned, and more so when the exercise of reason and memory is duly considered.

Standing in full view of all the marvelous powers even now known to be possessed by human beings, in propria persona, modesty, at least, would seem to dictate a conservativ waiting before ascribing to disembodied beings results which may be quite as likely to emanate from those embodied. For behold how one human mind can, under proper conditions, control absolutely the action of another; how events in human lives, past, present, and to come, are clearly perceived and told; how existences which hav been are seen; how voices are heard which once hav spoken in the by-gone years, and nothing but the deathless echo left to vibrate in the deep abyss of the unfathomable, and this all human power.

And further, the condition of entrancement is also another recently admitted power possessed by human beings, and which seems to differ only in degree from the long-accepted one of sleep-walking, and both appear to prove the possibility of speaking and of acting without conscious reason or memory, in whole or in part, depending on the depth or absoluteness of the condition.

And further, that human beings possess the power under rare conditions of projecting a similitude of themselvs into existence, at greater or less distances from their physical bodies, has been known in all historical ages of the world under the name of "the double," or Doppleganger.

And further, it would seem, judging from modern experience, that human beings also possess the power under some circumstances of assuming the form and features of those who once hav lived, and whose former personal appearance they possibly discern clairvoyantly as events are seen. This is called transfiguration. The seizing of persons while in that condition by skeptical investigators rudely breaks the attendant conditions, and sometimes causes great harm by the sudden revulsion to a normal condition.

And further, no fact is better established than the one that some human beings possess a power to cure the ills that flesh is heir to under conditions the most extraordinary. Instances are not infrequent where the healer diagnoses the case of a person thousands of miles away, and treats it to a radical cure. This would seem to demonstrate that personal contact of healer and patient is not always necessary, and that there must be an invisible link which connects each with all, making a common brotherhood of the whole human family. This connection is not necessarily spiritual in its nature; it may simply be a condition of human life, like the sea of air in which all forms of life exist.

To stop at this point in the highway of investigation, and to declare this the end of human power, would seem unjustifiable, especially as the road traveled is seen to extend further. Materialization stretches on beyond. After the foregoing exposé of human power, it would seem neither illogical nor unreasonable to assume that it is capable of projecting parts or the whole of human forms, or numbers of them, into temporary being. That these forms should themselvs universally claim to be reëmbodied spirits is not surprising when it is reflected that the person projecting those forms is an extreme sensitiv, and therefore readily yields to the psychologic power of those present, to say nothing of being previously educated into the belief. It is also a noteworthy fact that these forms only possess so much knowledge as may be perceived clairvoyantly and clairaudiently by the person producing them. If their creator is a poor clairaudient, the forms experience great difficulty in giving their own names even; and if their creator lacks in clairvoyant development, it is unlikely that the form will resemble the personality claimed. In other words, the form produced is as faithful a reproduction as the creator of it perceives of a once living entity. It may also be further noted as having a bearing on the investigation, that where these forms are produced for the delectation of a miscellaneous audience, it is the favorits of their creato who receive usually the most attention from the forms, and vice versa, varied only in favor of those occupying a mid-way or negativ position in the regard of their creator in the sole interest of a speculativ future. If this class of phenomena were not the positiv production of the so-called medium, the whims and caprices, the loves and hates and indifferences, of that individual could not influence, much less control, their appearance, or dictate their subsequent conduct.

These forms, as seen by clairvoyant power in their immaterial condition, yield no proof of their actual existence, any more than does an event foretold by a seer. It is possible, perhaps, that they may exist as illuminated shadows of human lives that hav been, or as attachés of human beings in mortal life, and perhaps pervaded by a certain amount of life drawn or projected from those to whom they are attached, as limbs to a tree trunk, only to fade out of existence by slow and sure degrees, and to perish utterly when all memory of their former being has passed away. In support of this theory the fact is cited that, of all the myriads of human beings who hav perished here, none are ever claimed to be seen only those who hav left in the mind of man some memory of their once having existed on the earth. Indeed, were the whole human family suddenly swept out of existence, for all that is at present known, it is possible that these shadowy attachés would vanish instantly and utterly, for there would be no memory to retain them, nor human life to support them.

This same principle may pervade all nature as a universal governing law of all living entities. The illuminated shadows of fallen trees and faded flowers, of the beast that walks no more and of the bird whose wings are folded forever, may still exist as the attachés of their respectiv living entities in the world's life, connected to them through the inscrutable working of some life-principle not yet understood, dependent on the memory of man.

Cases of entrancement furnish no positiv evidence of the subject being overshadowed and controled by foreign spirit power, for it may be simply a personation of some illuminated shadow by that second self, or double, which seems to be a component part of individual human beings, representing, perhaps, the negativ pole of human life. This double seems to act independently of the positiv part of man's nature; is not governed by the will power; leaves no memory in the mind of its actions or deeds, and is freest when self-consciousness is suspended.

Finally, it is a law of nature that whatever has a beginning must necessarily hav an ending. This is destructiv to the theory of immortality. Eternal existence in amorphous or changing conditions is possible and a fact in nature. If human spirits were once formless, or taken like a drop of water from the ocean of eternal being, they must return, in the invariable order of nature, to their original state or condition. If they originally possessed forms, they will simply revert to them upon the dissolution of the body. If spirits do actually exist as individual entities in some state of existence where they are awaiting their turn in the order of nature to be born into this world, the materialization of one of them will place the keystone in the arch of the superstructure of modern Spiritualism; otherwise the structure is liable to fall and carry with it the religion of nineteen hundred years. The destruction of this beautiful temple, every stone of which has thus far been laid by willing hands and consecrated by longing, prayerful hearts, is a sad spectacle to contemplate, but sadder yet it would be to see it standing in all its brightness an ignis-fatuus to deceive and to destroy. That this latter may not prove to be the case is the sincere wish of all right-thinking minds; and yet the cautious fears and careful investigations of very many superior intellects do not permit them to accept as conclusiv the phenomena as spiritual which appear to hav come into this strange world as a permanent factor in the affairs of life. ## Paul and Augustus Cæsar.

The solution of the puzzle which "Infidelis" propounds in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 4th in regard to Paul's appeal to Augustus Cæsar has been frequently made in THE TRUTH SEEKER by the "Man of Sin." Paul was contemporary with Augustus Cæsar and died many years before that emperor did. This discovery was made by "Antichrist" in 1878. Paul in his second epistle to the Corinthians, xi, 32, says: "In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me." A thorough examination of historical data disclosed the fact that, although there were several successiv kings of Arabia Petrea, named Aretas, one of whom was reigning at the death of the emperor Tiberius, A.D. 37, there was but one Aretas who ever had control of Damascus, and the period of his government of that city ended 62 or 63 years B.C., when he was superseded by the Roman governor Scaurus. From that time onward for several successiv centuries the Romans held unshaken control of all Syria, and no petty king of Arabia could hav marched an army two hundred and fifty miles and taken Damascus, nor would the services of such a king hav been at any time required to govern that city. (See "Aretas" in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia.)

It is said that other Roman emperors received the title Augustus among a string of others such as Cæsar, etc. But the fact is that only the first emperor is or was known and designated as Augustus Cæsar.

In Tacitus's "History" we read that "the name Augustus, and all imperial honors enjoyed by former princes, were by a decree granted to Otho," who became emperor in the year 68; but his reign was so short that the historian is uncertain whether he accepted the titles. Otho was succeeded by Vitellius in the same year, who, being on the march, sent forward to Rome an edict to "postpone for the present the title of Augustus; and for that of Cæsar, he declined it altogether."

At the very beginning of the "Annals" of Tacitus, the author speaks of "the time of Augustus," and in the next sentence refers to his successors in their order, to wit, "Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero." And if anywhere Tacitus speaks of Nero as Augustus, even as having that title among others, we hav overlooked it.

But the "Annals" of Tacitus is a forgery of the fifteenth century, and there is reason to suspect that the "History" is an earlier forgery.

The book of Acts, or the nucleus of it, is a much earlier work than has been supposed. The text is more corrupt than that of any other New Testament book, but the very name Augustus in Acts xxv and xxvii is one of many evidences that the events narrated in that book, so far as they are true, all occurred in the century before the Christian era.

A View of Ginville.

Ginville is a gushing place. It gushes with gin, and also with beer and brandy and whisky, and the gutters gush with slush. Its pavements and sidewalks are badly broken (where there are any to break), but the thresholds and floors of the saloons hav to be often renewed. The principal architectural feature of Ginville is the police-station, which occupies a prominent corner, around which circle liquor saloons in every variety, and all in full bloom. The police commissioner owns one of these saloons and his brother another. One saloon proprietor is a police sargent, who hires his brother to tend bar; and the captain does business in a similar way. Any day in Ginville you may see the police traversing from the station to the opposit saloon, and countermarching back to the station. Sometimes they seem to get tired, and go inside the saloon to take a rest by leaning against the bar. The saloons under police patronage are booming bravely; other branches of business are drying up. In fact, everything in Ginville is drying up except the mud and mustiness. Ginville would be Gin City but the legislature thinks otherwise. And the revenue rolls on as the river swirls by, and no mills but the gin-mills grind their grist. J. P. GUILD.

The Tent.

Time is quickly passing; opportunities to help forward the cause of mental liberty are available now. It is useless to wait till all things are favorable; there will always be something in the way. We can never command success, but energy, self-sacrifice, and perseverance generally secure it.

I hav great need to remain home and attend to my own affairs and recuperate an exhausted exchequer. But under the spur of persecution by the Jersey fanatics, I am loth to even seem to ground arms or sanction a truce. The enemy realize their desperate condition, and are making mad, desperate struggles to regain lost power and prestige. Now is the time, when honest hearts are eager for the facts, and excited by spirit of inquiry, to hav Tent lectures and afford friends and neighbors opportunity to escape the cruel bondage of superstition. We must help them to free themselvs of fear and sectarian hate, and help them to liv lives of love and peace, and in their turn do valiant service for the cause of universal mental liberty.

Those who desire Tent effort can secure it by a little energy and perseverance. But "the affair cries haste, and speed must answer." Write at once. Address Box 104, North Parma, New York.

A Profitable Exchange.

A blasphemer in New Jersey has been fined $25 and costs, amounting in all to about $75. He had published and circulated a pamphlet, which contained pictures of the most vile and insulting kind. In one of them was a pig-sty labeled, "The Holy Virgin." Hogs were branded with the holy cross, and names of the different churches. The whole pamphlet was a most brutal attack upon the sacred principles which a Christian nation holds dear. Robert Ingersoll, who defended the wretch, attempted to get sympathy for him by claiming he was denied the rights of free speech. But the law of the land does not recognize any speech as free that is devoted to lampooning the faith and belief of the people. It is just as much an insult upon personal rights as to strike down his body, or destroy his property. The offense of this man was against the moral sense of the community, a wanton assault upon the principles nine-tenths of the people hold dear, and he was justly punished.—Oskaloosa Times.

The malignant bigot who wrote the above probably did it with eyes overflowing with tears. His dool was evidently on account of the absence of a law making the penalty for blasphemy the stake and fagot, as in days of yore. The advent of this editor on earth has, by some mistake, been delayed at least a century; he should hav been "dug up" when laws were in force that were more in harmony with his shallow conceits. It shows unmistakable evidence of progress when the prison, rack, and fagot can be swapped, even up, for a twenty-five-dollar fine.—Industrial Appeal.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Freethought University at Liberal, Mo., will hav its first annual Commencement this year, from June 28th to July 2d. G. H. Walser and C. W. Stewart will make addresses and the scholars will contest for elocutionary and oratorical honors.

THE Wisconsin State Association of Spiritualists will hold its next quarterly meeting in Omro, Wis., June 24th, 25th, and 26th. John L. Potter, C. W. Cook, and other speakers will be there. Round-trip tickets to meeting for one and one-third fare on all railroads in the state are promised. A life assurance will be organized in connection with the State Association at this meeting. Hotel rates, $1 per day.

OUR friend and former neighbor, D. L. Scott-Browne, who could find nothing to liv in Clinton Place for after THE TRUTH SEEKER came away, has moved his Shorthand College and Phonographic Headquarters to 251 West Fourteenth street. He occupies a whole house now, and keeps a shorthand boarding school. Last Saturday evening he opened his handsome parlors to his friends and gave them a reception. Mr. Scott-Browne is all that could be desired as a shorthand teacher, and as an entertainer he proved to be more than those best acquainted with him had expected. Music, dancing, and refreshment were provided, in which all joined and partook without getting ſ, as it would be expressed phonographically according to the American Standard system. Probably as enjoyable a time has not been had in this settlement since the TRUTH SEEKER editorial and composing rooms were formally opened.

Mr. Remsburg and the Rev. Dr. Lucas will hold a four-days' debate at Leon, Kan.. commencing June 15th. The following propositions will be discussed: 1. The Bible, believed by all Christians to contain a divine revelation from God to the world, is purely of human origin. Remsburg affirms, Lucas denies. 2. Jesus the Christ of the New Testament scriptures is the son of God, as taught therein. His religion is therefore divine. Lucas affirms, Remsburg denies.

THE Rev. Wilbur Crafts, of the First Union Presbyterian church, this city, says that the laborers "want a half-holiday to drink whisky in," and that "the eight-hour movement is a lazy movement instead of a labor movement." Mr. C. F. Henry writes to a daily paper to say that this sort of pulpit utterances hav driven him from the church. He declares that it is left to Colonel Ingersoll, who is called an Infidel, to say kind words for workingmen, while the minister too often paints him as though he was a ruffian. Mr. Henry expresses too his fear that many ministers preach to the rich man and for the rich, and adds: "I would rather be shot than to hang around a church and be a Christian pauper." Mr. Henry is to be congratulated that the light has broken in upon him. If he continues his observations he will discover that the clergy as a class are not favorably inclined toward industrial reform. Anything that sets the laborer to thinking about his rights they regard as a species of heresy. If labor agitation does not benefit the workingman physically, it at least stirs up his dormant mind, and so educates him to a certain extent. The clergy know this, and hence their opposition. The church wishes the laborer to remain a stupid and ignorant mendicant, incapable of self-government. Its charities are its stock in trade. It poses as the friend of the poor, although it does not return to the poor a thousandth part of what it takes from them. It opposes the half-holiday, on the one hand, because it knows that what the workingman spends on Saturday afternoon for enjoyment will not find its way into the contribution box on Sunday morning; and favors it on the other because it believes that possibly the toiler may be satisfied with a half-day of amusement and will observe the whole day following. Between these conflicting views the laborer is left to work out his own salvation. Consequently he will get the half-holiday if he can, and spend Sunday as it suits him best; and certainly, while there are in the country so many loafers like Crafts and his eighty thousand fellow-priests, the workingman will hav performed his share of labor if he works eight hours per day. The policy of the short-hour movement is another question. The "lazy movement" is the one that advocates the existence of an army of next-world pilots who liv upon the labor of others.

THE Forum for June contains the first of a series of papers on "The Object of Life." The initial article of the series is contributed by Prof. George J. Romanes, disciple of the late Charles Darwin, and exhibits the views of an evolutionist philosopher on this weighty question.

WE hav upon our exchange list a couple-of dozen or so of labor papers. We hav seen in but one of them a word in condemnation of the conviction of C. B. Reynolds.

Infidel Thoughts on Death.

To-day I liv. I know not for how long. An hour, a week, a year, or many years. Death will come, and come soon, for the longest life is short. What follows after I know not.

No man knows any more than I do. But there are thousands who believe that after this they will inhabit another world. They profess to regard this only as a preparation for a future existence. Do they liv better lives and die happier deaths for this belief? I think not.

We did not prepare this earth for our dwelling-place. We did not prepare ourselvs to dwell in it. The preparation was made by those who dwelt here before us. They left us a state of society, laws, and customs, organized according to their knowledge. It is for us to improve them, for our own benefit and that of our successors here. If, hereafter, we become citizens of a land of spirits, it is reasonable to suppose that the spirits who are there before us will know more of the requirements of spiritual existence than we who hav no experience of a spiritualistic condition. This life is all we know. Life with flesh and blood, bones, muscle, and brains. Our business here is to make life happy for ourselvs and others, and to meet death fearlessly and cheerfully. If we liv again it will then be our proper task to learn the duties of our new position thoroughly and perform them well.

The present is all we hav. The future is uncertain. If there is another life after this, all the preparation we can make for it now is to prove our worthiness to enjoy it by making the best use of this.

The pious Christian does not make the best use of this life. His object is not chiefly to contribute to the sum of human happiness here, but to secure his own happiness hereafter. Practical realties are, with him, brought into subjection to visionary anticipations. Human sympathies are crushed out by sanctified selfishness. The certainties of time are held to be of little importance beside the uncertainties of an imagined eternity. He livs in fear, for he is commanded to work out his salvation with fear and trembling. He believes that if there is an eternity of bliss there is also an eternity of woe, and that most men find it; that, ever-present beside him, are evil spirits who, themselvs condemned to everlasting misery, are seeking to secure him as a companion in their torments; that his fellow-creatures are hurrying into hell, and unless he constantly resists will bear him along with them; that his own nature is prone to evil, and must be conquered at every step at the peril of his own eternal loss. And his brightest hopes are dashed, his passage from earth darkened and made terrible, by the fearful sentence that "no man knows whether he is worthy of love or hatred."

Perhaps he is a more liberal Christian, one who professes to follow Christianity, but is, in great part, guided by the principles of humanity. He has discarded hell, but still believes in heaven. He has rejected the literal meaning of scripture, but, interpreted by human reason, he receives it as divine truth. May he not meet death with joyful anticipations, regarding it only as a portal to an immortality of bliss? I think not, for heaven rests on the same foundation as hell; and he who believes that God will one day say, "Come, ye blessed," believes it on the same authority which declares that he will also utter, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire." Christianity and humanity are opposing forces. Through life they hav fought for the possession of that man. Whether his death be one of religious dread or of calm philosophy depends upon which is victor in the last hour of consciousness.

When Christians die, in spite of promises of eternal mansions, in spite of hopes of immortal crowns, in spite of consoling sacraments and words of spiritual comfort, the damp sweat of death is made more chilly on the brow, the last agony more terrible, the thought of what may come after more appalling, by the faith which teaches that eternity depends on that last moment, and that in the same direction that the tree falls it shall forever lie.

We hav all read in story books how pious people die. We hav been told of angels that were visible to them as they lay stretched upon their couches, of their smiling faces and happy hearts, as they went forth to meet the God of their love. But some of us hav stood beside their death-beds when they were conscious that their last hour was at hand. For us such tales hav lost their force. I remember a remark I heard many years ago. It was made by a young man, himself a most devout Christian, who practiced surgery in a German hospital. He had seen many die; those who had faith in Christianity, and those who had none. He said: "It is strange with what calmness Infidels meet death, which fills religious people with fear." It was strange to him; it was strange to me then; it is not so now.

What follows death according to the belief of the orthodox Christian? Eternity of inconceivable happiness or unutterable misery. He knows not which. Immortal consciousness of the possession of all good or of total and irretrievable loss. He knows not which. A God, the object of all worthy love, who will receive him to his bosom or cast him forever forth. He knows not which. A throne of glory, or the worm that never dies, the fire that never will be quenched. He knows not which. He knows not whether he is worthy of love or hatred.

If the brain of the Infidel be not impaired by his sickness, if his reason has not already fled, taking with it the fruits of its labors and leaving his memory to revert to the time when its exercise had not yet begun, joining in a mysterious circle life's ending with its beginning, he meets death in the spirit of humanity. He has the struggle of parting with life, of parting, probably, with some objects that hav been dear to him. That is common to all, whether they hav religious faith or not. He has no fear of an existence hereafter, because he has no reason to suppose that if there be any such existence it will be any harder to endure than this. He has known others who hav died. They were hidden from sight. The elements of which they were composed were dissolved. The iron, the water, the salt, the lime, and all the other ingredients of man passed into other forms. No particle of them perished, but as human beings they were no more. It is his turn now, and he has no cause for fear, for it is the common lot of all.

In the possession of health and the enjoyment of life, to shrink from death is the natural spirit of animal self-preservation. When life has run its course, and age or disease makes it no longer desirable, the fear of death is the result of belief in a religion which made a God it called good and pictured him as evil. It springs from the idea that happiness is not a reward justice renders a well-spent life, but a gift mercy may bestow, if earnestly sought, in the last moment of conscious existence. On that last moment, religion teaches us, eternity depends. A good life may be blasted, an evil one retrieved, in that flickering second. Demoralizing belief! that after death comes the judgment, and that that judgment is passed upon us, not for how we hav lived, but for how we hav died. Consoling thought for the Infidel! that before death comes the judgment, and that at death the judgment is over and the sentence has been carried out.

Yes, before death the judgment and the punishment. In life we pay the penalty for our misdeeds. We seek no mercy, for there is none. Mercy never stays the effect from following the cause. Our good and evil deeds follow us, not in another world, but here, close at our heels. And when we come to die we hav no more to fear, for we hav suffered all.

"Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." Sufficient for this world its pains and griefs, its sorrows and crimes. Death comes as nature's sweet sleep after a weary battle. May be the sleep will be eternal, dreamless. May be we shall wake again. If so, with the coming of another day will come its own hopes and fears, its own duties and trials. We shall go forth to do its work and win its rewards. And if that day is not without its evil hour, again "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." No need by vain imaginings to anticipate it now.

Death, divested of his imaginary after-terrors, comes to us in the evening of life, when the day has been well spent, wearing a pleasant smile upon his face, and carrying in his hand rich and precious gifts. He brings to the suffering ease, to the toil-worn rest. He is the friend of nature, for when nature has done its work it longs for sleep. Therefore, when the Infidel, who measures the unknown by the known, still retains his rational faculties, he meets calmly the final dissolution which ends at once his joys and his sorrows, his faults and their penalties.

The hour of death, when the enfeebled limbs refuse to obey the will, when the mind is but dimly conscious that consciousness is departing, when familiar objects are scarcely visible, or take fantastic shapes to our delirious vision, and voices dearest to us strike dull and strangely on the ear, is the hour in which religion tells us eternity must be won or lost. The agony of death, with the added agony of responsibility for a never-ending future, is crowded into a single moment. It is not strange that such a death should not be calm. Nature acts otherwise. When life is near its close the mind deals not with the future, but the past. It knows no future. If any future there be, the knowledge of it has yet to come. Well is it if the past bring up no fantastic visions. Well if no imaginary angel visit that dying couch. Well if no delusiv hopes of heaven are whispered round it. Heaven may be lost, angels may be transformed to devils, and the moment when all should be peace racked with doubt and fear.

Those who hav charge of the young should be careful of the impressions their minds receive in early life, for, although mature reason may scatter those impressions, in the end, when reason has weakened or altogether fled, and memory, passing over the interval, goes back to its beginning, those impressions may materialize before the eyes of the dying. But if this be not the case, and reason retains her throne until consciousness of existence has ceased, the Infidel can meet death with a philosophical resignation which religion has ever failed to impart.

There is no reason that he should not. The vengeance of Jehovah, like the thunderbolts of Jupiter, he has long regarded as creatures of the imagination of others, which hav had no place in his own mind. The errors of his life he has already suffered for. He has received the rewards and paid the penalties of his conduct here. He has done his work and he is weary. He is going to his rest.

The monks of old whispered to each other, "Brother, you must die!" And we, in bold, clear tones exhort our fellows: "Brother, sister, you must liv! Liv one life and liv it well; then, if another follows, learn to liv that well too."

Brother, sister, you are young, and life may seem long before you. Do not waste its hours in dreaming. It is very, very short. Before its early morning seems to hav passed away you will hav reached its close. It is the only life, so far as you know, that you will ever hav. Spend it wisely, that in its passing you may enjoy its flying sweets, and in its ending, when memory strays back to these, your early days, it may find no evil done, no good left undone, to trouble it with vain regrets.

Brother, sister, years hav passed away since first you started on your journey through life. A few more winters and summers—perhaps only a few more risings and settings of the sun—and you will hav reached its termination. Waste not your time in idle repentance of the past. All you hav is between now and the fast approaching hour that will be your last. Do your duty in this time. Make the world within your reach better and happier for your presence in it. Then, when the end comes, your dying eyes will not close upon the fading vision of a wasted existence.

Brother, sister, it is here. Your course is run. For good or for evil you hav lived among us, and will liv among us no more. All you hav now is your past, and that is fast disappearing. The future is a blank page. The present is but the period which, before you drop the pen forever, you are putting to the sentence you hav written in the book of time. I know not what that sentence is. Those who stay when you are gone may point to it as the teaching of wisdom, or the warning of bygone folly, or they may blot it out as a useless memento of a worthless life disfiguring the page. But for you life is over. Over alike its virtues and its vices, its riches and its poverty, its joys and its sorrows. Meet death calmly, resignedly, cheerfully. If your life has been a benefit to humanity, you are receiving now the last coin of your reward in pleasant memories of kind thoughts and gentle words and loving acts. If it has been a curse, the recollections that embitter your last moments are but as the grating of the prison door that opens for your release. The world in which you sinned is the world in which you hav paid the penalty. You hav satisfied the last claim of justice. Your title to everlasting freedom has arrived, and the bearer's name is Death.

Advice.

"They gave me advice and counsel in store,
Praised me and honored me more and more;
Said that I should only 'wait awhile,'
Offered their patronage, too, with a smile."

It is well known to all how lavish people are with advice. I think I am realizing this a little more fully than I ever did before. Advice and sympathy are sent ad infinitum, and I appreciate it as few can; for love of appreciation is one of my most prominent "bumps." I prize friends' sympathy and encouragement above all price. Plautus says, "Every man, however wise, requires the advice of some sagacious friend in the affairs of life."

One friend says, "Write as you never wrote before," realizing that now is the golden opportunity of getting truths before the world, and making history that shall ring through the ages. Another says, "Talk little and write less;" while there are intermediates who giv advice all the way between these extremes.

One pious friend says, "Right is always right; make no compromise with wrong. If you were doing good work, why did you not do it openly and above-board?" But the friend forgets that she also says, a little further back in her letter, "Thee is right. Alpha was the beginning, but thee must remember that extreme is seldom right." Now I would ask, Is there any extreme to right or truth? Are they not like round and square; simply full and complete, and incapable of comparison? How, then, can one go to extremes in either of them?

Now, friends, please wake up and see the whole animus of this prosecution. It is one of the greatest outrages of the age—a lot of men coming and arresting an old woman, who has broken no law and done no one an injury; demanding before her arrest that she giv into their hands her private papers, which may implicate others equally innocent; taking an advantage of her ignorance of "the majesty of law" and robbing her to her own injury! Like their head, Comstock of cruel fame, they take every possible mean advantage, regardless of law, right, decency, or justice.

They knew I was alone and powerless, and therefore put the bail so high as to preclude ninety-nine-one-hundredths of my friends from the possibility of assuming it. A lady friend in Chicago says, "I do not know what to say about Mrs. Slenker's case, except that I think the bail is an outrage, especially when compared with the rate of bail asked in this city in cases of rape. One hundred dollars in such cases is considered quite enough." Now, I hav no doubt saved many a woman and girl from being raped by means of giving real truths regarding sexual temperance and sexual morality, and yet my bail was $2,000, and no one to plead for its abatement.

Friends, while thanking you each and all for letters personally and to the press in my behalf, I must still ask for more. It is not my fight alone. It is a fight for freedom, a word dear to every heart. Our Constitution guarantees liberty of speech. Yet, I speak needed words to the soul-sick, the ignorant, and the mentally starved, and for sending this bread to the hungry I am jailed like a vile criminal.

Friends, I need more than advice; I need "the sinews of war."

Remember, I am not fighting for my right alone to free speech and free mails, but for your rights and your children's rights, for the rights of all coming generations.

Yesterday I received twenty-five letters, all expecting replies, and not so much as a two-cent stamp in the whole batch. It costs about four cents to answer a letter, making it as short as you may. A few hav done nobly in contributing money-help.

But right here let me say, twenty-five cents from each sympathizer will be at least good backing to good words, and there are few who cannot send this much.

I hav sent it to nearly every call that has ever been made in our papers, or by individuals, for help. Now I need this "bread cast upon the waters." Will it come? Or will the closing lines of the poet from whom I quote in the commencement be the finale?

> But with all their honor and approbation,
> I should long ago hav died of starvation
> Had there not come an excellent man
> Who bravely to help me along began.
> Good fellow, he got me the food I ate;
> His kindness and care I shall never forget.
> Yet I cannot embrace him—though other folks can—
> For I myself am this excellent man.

I do not, however, believe that this is the end. Little by little the light is breaking through the clouds, and the sunshine of hope smiles upon the landscape of life. The imaginary "obscenity spook" is fading away, and the real personage of good work comes to the front, and what to me has been the great trial time of terrorism is proving to be a glorious opening for more, better, and stronger work than any I hav yet accomplished. Better, because it goes clear down to the foundations of life, and builds them upon a pure heredity of cleaner blood and wiser brains.

By to-day's mail I send out from Snowville three pecks of papers, books, and letters, all treating on hygiene, health, and morality, and through this one case of mine tons of similar matter will on this same day be sent from thousands of other post-offices all through the Union.

I hope everyone of our readers will be enthused to take hold in dead earnest and help the work for the repeal of all laws that abridge the rights of individuals, and especially one that fines and imprisons for furthering the philosophy and science of life's foundations. If our private letters to our nearest and best friends are to be made public property and censors set upon them, where is our boasted freedom of speech? Not a word or line of my public work is under ban; only what has been lawfully mailed as first-class matter under letter postage, and sent to those asking, desiring, and needing it, is condemned. No one complains of being injured by any of it, and hundreds assert they hav been benefited morally and physically by it, and yet here am I in bonds because I tried to learn, teach, and educate; because I sought earnestly for facts and gave freely of them.

Come to the rescue, friends. If you cannot save me, remember that every blow will count for the good work, and nothing will be lost. Scatter the seed, and the harvest will come. Now is your golden opportunity; to-morrow may not be yours. "Ring out the old, ring in the new," and bend all your energies toward making ours indeed a free country.

> Till the sound of the trumpet
> Far, far off the daybreak call—
> Hark! how loud and clear I hear it wind!
> Swift! to the head of the army!
> Swift! spring to your places!
> Pioneers! O pioneers!—Whitman.

May 30, 287. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

---

PEOPLE WHO INDORSE MRS. SLENKER.

Through our esteemed friend, Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, we hav received the subjoined letters from Syracuse, with a request to publish:

16 GERTRUDE ST., SYRACUSE, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR: What is the meaning of this prosecution and persecution of Mrs. Slenker? Her books and papers hav been before the reading world for many years. Why this arrest? Is it not that Freethought is getting a little in the ascendant, and so this Christian Comstock wishes to blacken the name of Mrs. Slenker because she is a prominent Liberal? I hope the Freethinkers will not wait for Sumter to be fired upon, but will arouse themselvs at once.

MISS IDA VELLINGER.

4 HUGHES BLOCK, GIFFORD ST., SYRACUSE, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR: I would like through your paper to add my testimony to the worth of Elmina's writings on physiological truths, and to say that any person who finds encouragement to lewdness in any form by the reading of her works upon sexual purity must be thoroughly licentious, and ought to find some retreat where his or her safety might be insured against contact with knowledge upon any subject. My heart goes out in sympathy to Mrs. Slenker in this her hour of persecution, and I write this that she may know it. Surely all womankind, and I will add all men, who are pure and chaste will be glad to extend any help within their power to this victim of superstition and malignity.

MRS. ELIZA CRITTENDON.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., May 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am not in the habit of writing for the public, but I wish to-day I were, as my sympathy for Elmina is too strong to refrain from publishing it. Has it come to this, that a woman whose life-work has been the enlightening of her own sex upon subjects of the greatest value to them must be arrested, put into a jail (jails) with the insane, the suspected criminal, and as if that were not enough, with a company of rats to share with her her resting-place, and for what? She has used the mails to answer questions sent to her through the mails by one of the men so corrupt that the resting of his eyes upon purity turns it into temptation to vice. I inclose $1 for the Defense Fund.

MRS. FRANK RAYMOND.

16 GRACE ST., SYRACUSE, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR: I wish my name to go before the public as one who thoroughly believes in Elmina as a woman of the highest principles, "chaste as ice," one who has done and is doing a great deal to help the world by knowledge of the laws of our being, especially in the physiology relating to sex. Will you please giv this place in your columns? I inclose $1 for the Defense Fund. MRS. ARVILLA FLINT.

---

38 KELLOGG ST., SYRACUSE, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please add my name to the list of women who believe in a thorough knowledge of the laws of life, and that sexual physiology is one of the many things that should be understood? I also wish to say, All honor to Elmina for daring to write upon the subject.

MISS JOSEPHINE A. WILKINSON.

16 GRACE ST., SYRACUSE, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read of many atrocities committed in the name of law, but this one of imprisoning Mrs. Slenker seems to outdo all others. Allow me to protest against it with my whole being, and to say I fully believe in her as a true, pure woman. G. S. HARRINGTON.

---

KINSMAN, OHIO.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the papers that through Anthony Comstock Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker is to be tried for sending objectionable mail, or violating the postal laws. Now, do you believe, Mr. Editor, that the Comstock vice society is a fraud? and that Mrs. Slenker is corrupting the minds of the people? Not much! It is simply because she is a broad-minded woman, a deep and original thinker, scientific and Liberal; a non-believer in total depravity and vicarious atonement. She believes that by a thoroughly secular and scientific education and an understanding of the laws of heredity the people may become a moral people, and vice and crime be almost unknown. And now, after spending her best time in an unpopular work for the benefit of humanity, in her sixtieth year to be hunted down and persecuted seems the hight of cruelty; all because she has not used her talent and energy in the interest of the church, but for the good of humanity. However you may differ from her, let us do all we can to save her from our Bennett's fate. Being a woman, she will suffer more keenly than man, and we want her to help in the battle of moral and intellectual freedom for years yet. If all were to plead for her that she has helped by good words or deeds, I feel sure the insolent and miserable Comstock would be defeated. I love her much, knowing her to be pure, loving, and true.

Truly yours, MRS. NORA FERRELL.

The Bible and Evolution.

III.—MODERN SCIENCE.

But if the Bible is wrong on all these matters, what has modern science to say about them?

Let us first of all consider the question in its relation to astronomy. The generally accepted theory of modern science is that, æons and æons of ages in the past, all that now exists in the form of worlds—planets, moons, stars, suns—was one mass of gaseous matter filling space.

In the course of untold ages there was a loss of heat in this vast mass of molten matter, which brought the particles closer together and set them into a spinning motion, which increased as the particles became more united.

From this great whirling mass outer rings were from time to time thrown off, and from these rings still other rings, until there were a multitude of moving bodies in the universe, each revolving round the largest mass near to it.

Our sun in this way became the center round which a number of planets revolved; these planets being themselvs the children of the sun, having been thrown off from it in rings at various intervals as we hav stated; the moons proceeding from the various planets in the same manner. By this spinning motion and the law of attraction all these bodies were rendered globe-like in shape. Accepting this theory, we account for the phenomena of night and day as resulting from the revolution of the earth on its own axis, while summer and winter are explained on the supposition that the earth travels round the sun once a year, and whichever part of the earth is facing the sun in that part there is summer, while in that portion of the earth which is turned away from the sun there is winter.

The Bible statement that light was created on the first day and the sun on the fourth, is clear proof that the writer of the nineteenth chapter of Genesis was wholly ignorant of such sciences as astronomy or physics, the former of which teaches us that our planet was originally a part of the sun, and cannot exist as a world for a single instant without it, being held in its orbit by this great central attraction; while the latter makes known to us that light is not an entity but a phenomenon—a mode of motion—and so far as our earth is concerned we derive all our light from the sun.

But thinking that light was something real; something that could exist by itself independent of other existences—and that it could be separated from darkness, which was also regarded as an entity—the writer of Genesis saw nothing inconsistent in his declaration that God said, "Let there be light," and there was light, on the first day, and created sun, moon, and stars on the fourth.

How should he? He did not know that thousands of years after he was dust, an insignificant band of religious zealots would proclaim that his writings were divinely inspired. He did not know that thousands of people would regard his well-meant guesses as God-given truths. Nor did he know that the investigations of men of science would one day reveal the absolute absurdity of his statements. So he wrote confidently on, with the air of one who knows and will not be contradicted.

But human knowledge grows, and day by day the dreams of the past giv place to the realities of the present, the fancies of yesterday to the facts of to-day. The sun we now know is the grand center of our planetary system, by whose attractiv power the planets are held in their respectiv orbits, and from which source we receive all our light and heat.

Of the magnitude of this great orb it is impossible in words to convey any adequate idea. We know, however, that the ancient writers of the Bible had no conception of its vastness, but regarded it as a brilliant light hung up in the heavens to giv us light by day, while the moon served a similar purpose at night.

But, while it is impossible to convey an adequate idea of the vastness of this great burning mass by mere arithmetical numbers, still, as this is the only method open to us by which any idea of its vastness can be conveyed to the human mind at all, we must be excused if we ask our readers to contemplate the stupendous magnitude of this body by certain comparisons and by reference to the following figures. By various calculations, the diameter of the sun has been found to be 880,000 miles; its circumference, 2,764,600 miles, while its surface covers no less than 2,432,800,000,000 square miles.

It has been further computed that its solid contents comprehend 356,818,739,200,000,000, or three hundred and fifty-six thousand billions, of cubical miles. Or take another illustration. The sun is as large as 1,350,000 globes of the same size as our earth.

Traveling at the rate of forty-five miles per day, it would take more than one hundred and sixty years to make a complete circuit of the sun.

Our early ancestors had no idea of the vastness of the sun, and they were doubtless led to believe that it was not very large because of its great distance from the earth; and when we learn that it is no less than ninety-five millions of miles away from the earth, we cannot wonder at the error into which their lack of knowledge caused them to fall.

To form some idea, however vague, of what this means, let us take a familiar illustration. A cannon-ball may be shot out of the mouth of a cannon and sent spinning through space at the rate of five hundred miles an hour. Traveling at this enormous speed, it would take a cannon-ball twenty-one years two hundred and forty-five days to reach the sun. With these facts in our minds, it is easy to see that the Bible writers had no conception of either the distance of the sun from the earth or its vast proportions.

And their ignorance is even more apparent in reference to the stars, for they represent that, while it took deity six days to fashion the earth and put it into something like order, he threw into the vast expanse at one single instant all the stars that stud the universe, and shed light and heat over myriads of worlds. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Mr. Ingersoll Will Not Receive His Money Back.

NEW YORK, June 2, 1887.

E. Macdonald, Esq., Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER,

MY DEAR MACDONALD: My attention was called to an article in your paper in which Liberals are called upon to raise money to reimburse me for my expenses and amount paid for fine and costs in the case of the State of New Jersey against Reynolds.

I want nothing of that kind done. Under no circumstances would I receive anything.

Yours very truly,

R. G. INGERSOLL.

Unprincipled Avarice.

No people in the world are more avaricious or selfish than the Christians, and no "soulless corporation" fights harder to get money from the public treasury, or property from the people, than the church corporations. Not content with robbing the state of the taxes honestly due it, they would steal every foot of land in the country, if they could, and convert it to their own selfish uses.

No better proof of this is needed than the wrangle of the Congregationalists with the town of Greenwich, Mass., affords. Nearly two years ago we called attention to the fight, and are again reminded of it by the receipt of a pamphlet by H. W. Smith, a resident of the town, giving in detail the efforts of the Congregationalists to steal a meeting-house built, owned, and kept in repair by the town; the use of which was to be granted for any meeting whenever six persons asked the town authorities for it. To get at the beginning of the steal, it is necessary to go back over a century. In colonial times church and state were very solidly united in Massachusetts. The inhabitants were taxed to support the preacher, and fined if they did not listen to him upon Sunday. Greenwich is a portion of the ancient territory of Quabbin, in the Connecticut valley, and was incorporated in 1754. In 1816 the town settled up with the parish of Quabbin, which until that time had attended to ecclesiastical affairs, and all the records and papers were transferred to the selectmen of Greenwich. This wiped out the parish, and the town provided the provender for the religious beast. In 1823, ten years before Massachusetts separated church and state, Greenwich voted to "build a new house, to be used as town-house and a place for public worship." The house has been used, in accordance with this vote, by Calvinists, Methodists, Universalists, and Unitarians. The town has always paid the bills of the house, appointed committees to look after it, sold the seats therein, apportioned its use between the different sects, and on one occasion appointed a committee to "effect a compromise, and a more harmonious state of feeling among them." In 1865 the Congregationalists became incorporated. In 1880 the meeting-house needed extensiv repairs, and an offer was made openly in town-meeting to giv the house to the Congregationalists if they would repair it. They declined to receive it. The pew-rents were then used to repair the house, which, with private subscriptions and an additional $1,000 raised by taxation, put it once more in substantial order. Afterward the town shingled it at an expense of between one and two hundred dollars.

In 1883, Mr. H. W. Smith, a Liberal Unitarian, with Spiritualistic tendencies, desired the use of the house for a Spiritualistic lecture. The Congregationalists were using the house in the morning, and the selectmen granted it to Mr. Smith for the afternoon. After the posters announcing the lecture had been put up, a deacon of the church called at Mr. Smith's house and informed him that "the line must be drawn somewhere," meaning that the orthodox folks would not tolerate a Spiritual meeting in the house—though what right they had to object no one knew. Mr. Smith yielded his right as a citizen, and the Spiritual lecture was delivered in his own parlors. Mr. Smith then carried the matter into town meeting, and the citizens voted again that the house should be free for all. But Mr. Smith did not desire further trouble, and he built a church of his own.

In 1885 Mr. Chandler Powers engaged Charles Watts to deliver a lecture in Greenwich, and six persons asked the selectmen for the use of the meeting-house, which was granted. It was then the Calvinists came out strong. Though the house was built by vote of the town in 1823; though the town had paid all the bills; though the Calvinists were not organized till 1865; though they had once refused to accept the building; though all sorts of sects, except Spiritualists, had used the house—they now came forward and claimed the house on the ground that they were the heirs of the Puritans of the Quabbin parish! The fact that the Quabbin parish had been merged in the town in 1816 and the house not built till 1823 made no difference to them. Three of their number resolved themselvs into a parish committee, and nine days before Mr. Watts's lecture issued a warrant calling a parish meeting to consider the claim of the town to the right to grant the use of the hall! The town paid no attention to the warrant, and the society enacted its little farce of holding a meeting with closed doors. Mr. Watts was to lecture on Sunday, the 18th of October. Toward night, on the preceding Saturday, the citizens of Greenwich were somewhat astounded at the sound of hammer and ax in the direction of the church, and to see that the doors were being barricaded by the Orthodox Congregational Society, and men busy transporting the necessary comforts for a night's camp in the church. Blankets, stove, and provisions were carried in, and men installed inside; while, later, a deacon of the society was heard to ask from the outside, "Are your musket and cartridges all right?" This was answered affirmativly.

On Sunday, October 18th, the Orthodox Congregational Society of Greenwich sanctioned, or employed, a sheriff to parade the grounds and steps of the town's meeting-house, within whose walls were pews belonging to many of the petitioners, who were debarred and forbidden to enter the "sanctuary of the Lord" "at their peril." Just before the appointed hour for the lecture by Mr. Watts, knots of villagers were gathered here and there on the town common, while the sheriff occasionally warned the too-venturesome straggler to "keep off of forbidden ground." At 3 o'clock the town hall, close by the meeting-house, was occupied by a large audience. After dispersing, nothing was heard to break the stillness of a New England Sabbath evening but the tread of the sheriff, and his repeated warnings.

Immediately after this, the legal fight began, the Congregationalists suing the town, and attaching its property to the amount of a thousand dollars, for granting the use of the house. Of course the town had to respond, or be defaulted. A town-meeting was called, and the Congregationalists rallied their members to vote against the town defending itself! They were defeated, and the case finally landed in the supreme court, which appointed a master to take testimony, and there the matter rests. Once since, the society endeavored to get the town to drop the suit, but they were outvoted, and until the case is settled the town owns the building, though the society controls it by force.

This is one of the most flagrantly dishonest acts ever committed by the church, and is directly aimed at the Liberals and Spiritualists of the town. To prevent these latter from having a lecture, the Calvinists deliberately plan to steal a building to which they hav no more claim than hav the Freethinkers themselvs. It is another proof that the dominant religious party in this country is tyrannical, narrow, and tremendously dishonest. This is the result of their religion, and the religion ought to go much faster than it is going.

Help People Before Hitting Them.

We printed last week the appeal of the National Defense Association for substantial aid for Mrs. Slenker in her approaching trial. This issue contains a letter from Mrs. Slenker, and several indorsements of her and of her work. We hope the appeal will be successful, and that the good opinions printed will call around her many more friends.

There is great need of help for Mrs. Slenker, and that of a practical kind. A good lawyer is badly needed at her end of the line of communication. To the general public the mystery encircling this case is as impenetrable as a sea fog. No one can find out just what are the words and sentences and paragraphs upon which she is held. Even the sentiments expressed are largely subjects of surmises. If the grand jury hav indicted her, a copy of the indictment has not found its way to the public. Even the substance of the warrant for her arrest is still a matter of conjecture. It is probably this lack of facts which leads Mr. H. L. Green to say in the Freethinkers' Magazine for June:

"Elmina Drake Slenker, the well-known Freethought writer, has been arrested on the charge of circulating obscene literature through the mails. From what we learn we hav no doubt of Mrs. Slenker's guilt—she herself seems to admit the charge made against her—and yet, at the same time, we are sure that Mrs. Slenker really thought she was serving humanity in what she has been doing. She is evidently a crank on the sexual question, as are many other very good people, and who are constantly, unintentionally, bringing Freethought into disrepute by their injudicious manner of promulgating their opinions. But if people hav no more discretion than to violate, knowingly, the established usages of society, and the laws of the country, they should be prepared to suffer the consequences without murmuring, and should not expect those who condemn their course to come to their aid when they get into trouble. We regret, very much, that so good a woman should hav permitted herself to be thus entangled in the meshes of the law, and disgrace the cause of Freethought which she has heretofore so bravely advocated."

Personally, we are a little better off in this matter than Mr. Green and the public. We hav been shown "samples" of the style of correspondence indulged in by the "ring" spoken of by Mrs. Slenker, but not the identical matter complained of. The samples, we frankly confess, we do not like. In fact, they are excessivly distasteful, and we wonder that grown-up people should consider them contributions to science. But, with possibly one exception, they cannot by any stretch be classed as obscene, measured even by Benedict's definition of the word. And that one is cleaner than matter found in standard medical works. Thus far the facts, as we know them.

Keeping these facts in mind, then, the case has two aspects—the legal and the moral. Viewed from either, we consider Mrs. Slenker guiltless. In the first place, the law is unconstitutional, and capable of being, and has been, used for malicious and wicked purposes. Secondly, the matter complained of was private correspondence. It was not sold, nor advertised to be sold. It was simply the comparison of views on a certain subject by many persons who could not meet together, and were therefore compelled to write. They wrote as they would talk, and their letters were intended for themselvs only. Third, the matter written is not of that class, as defined by the Attorney-General of the United States, "the object of which is to excite the imagination and inflame the passions." Fourth, there should not be a legal standard of orthodoxy in medicin, falling below which the dabbler in physic should be punished. The most orthodox physicians lose the most patients because of their inability or disinclination to learn new methods. The first doctor who let the blood stay in a patient's veins, or gave cold water to a man in the heat of fever, was considered a heretic by the "regular" school, but nevertheless he was a benefactor of the race. And it is, moreover, a generally admitted fact that reforms in any profession are instituted by persons outside of that profession. But it has also been generally observed that under the narrowing influences of the prevalent religious orthodoxy, the professionally orthodox can say and do, without limitation, what the layman who experiments and speculates is punished for doing. Mrs. Slenker and her friends hav been engaged in propagating a theory regarding the relations of the different factors of the human race which should do away with the suffering entailed upon one of those factors by the animal brutality of the other factor. The purpose is certainly good. In advocating lives of purity they hav necessarily supported their theory with facts showing the harmfulness of the opposit way of living. Medical writers do the same in stating the results of any investigation in any particular direction, but they are legally and rightfully protected. When Dr. Foote was before the Senate Committee opposing the "disgusting" bill to which we called attention last week, he explained that by it the power was conferred on district-attorneys to suppress all medical books. Comstock, who sat on the opposit side of table, grandiloquently said, "Oh, we shan't trouble standard medical works; only the quack books." No such legal power should be conferred upon any person, for he might get the notion into his head, if he hated the publisher, that what a great many regard as a standard work is, after all, of quackish tendencies.

The moral side of the question is equally plain and in favor of Mrs. Slenker. That which makes for good is moral, and that which works harm is immoral. Christian morality—that is, those precepts founded on Christian dogmas—is much of it highly immoral. Natural morality, as the Nine Demands of Liberalism phrase it, is the true basis of human action, and the true criterion for human judgment. Natural morality is founded upon the experience of the human race. Experience proclaims all good to be moral; all bad to be immoral. If Mrs. Slenker had injured any one, she would hav committed an immoral act. But no one claims to hav been injured by anything she has said, written, or done—not even the hired spies of the soapboiler's society. Why, then, should she be punished? It is not for us, it is not for the church, it is not for any government officer, it is not for any person or persons on earth, to set themselvs up as censors to say, because Mrs. Slenker has deposited in the mails written sentiments which they disapprove, expressions they regard as in bad taste, sentences they look upon as indelicate, that she must go to prison. Who would escape if the majority could do this and the majority changed their minds occasionally? Mrs. Slenker's advice—given from conclusions drawn from the very facts for presenting which she is arrested—has benefited many persons, making their lives happier, and by so much added to the sum of human joy. If she has done this, why magnify a molehill of bad taste, perhaps, into a mountain of criminality? One wife made happier, one husband made more kind, one mother benefited, one daughter saved, outweigh all the criticisms of words one is disposed to indulge in.

Mrs. Slenker should be drawn away from the door of the prison before we cudgel her too severely for her indiscretion in working for humanity's good in what she considers a legitimate manner.

An Enterprising Man.

Mr. James Lamar, the proprietor of a Chicago dime museum, who has offered $500 to the Reynolds jury in the blasphemy case if they will allow him to exhibit them as two weeks' wonders, certainly has not missed his calling as a purveyor of curiosities. His recognition of the unique nature of these Jerseymen stamps him at once as a second Barnum.

The foundation of Professor Barnum's fortune was laid when he discovered and utilized as a freak the physically diminutiv Gen. Tom Thumb. Mr. Lamar, with equal prescience, recognizes that mentally the Reynolds jurymen are undoubtedly the prize midgets of the world, and as such would prove a drawing card in a city like Chicago. Of course, in their nativ town, where men like Mr. Cutler are district attorneys, and others like Childs sit upon the judge's bench, microscopical intellects do not excite remark.

Again, what a scope these men would afford for the oratorical powers of the dime museum lecturer. His remarks about the Wild Man of Borneo hav long since palled upon the public ear. The living skeleton, the fat woman, and the electric girl are chestnuts. The Circassian lady, with long and upright hair, who caresses the toothless and inanimate python of the jungles, is no longer new; and even the bridge-jumpers are falling into a depth of forgetfulness, beside which their falls off the Brooklyn Bridge dwindle to small proportions. Of course these are necessary to the full complement of dime museum curiosities, as the true cross is indispensable to complete the furniture of every Catholic cathedral, though, as observed, they hav been overtaken by desuetude. But, giving them a passing notice, when the lecturer reached the Jersey jury, how could he do justice to his subject? We should hear him say: "Now, ladies and gentlemen, allow me to call your attention to twelve of the greatest living products of misguided nature discoverable within the utmost confines of this terrestrial ball. How can I name them? Words fail me, but I must proceed. These creatures, ladies and gentlemen, formed in the image and likeness of men, are the twelve beings who, in this hind quarter of the nineteenth century, sitting in the jury box at Morristown, N. J., May the 20th, 1887, rendered a verdict of guilty in the case of Charles B. Reynolds, charged with the crime of blasphemy! Let me name them. The first one is Jacob Ogden. You will observe that he is alive. I thrust a pin into him and he moves. Marvelous! He is a member of the Christian church, but does not possess sufficient intelligence to distinguish one denomination from another. The second of these great living curiosities is Lewis Boing. He has never heard that there is such a thing as a church—otherwise he would be a Presbyterian. He also belongs to organic nature. The third is Andrew B. Cogan. He knows enough to be a Roman Catholic, and there cerebration ceases. Then we hav Paul H. Mandeville and George Schuyler. The first was named Paul because he will lie for the glory of God, and the second was called George, after the father of our country, because he cannot tell a lie, or the truth either. The sixth is Michael Rourke, who in spite of his Greek name is a Roman Catholic from away back. Need I say more as to his intelligence? Eugene Buchanan, to whom I next invite your polite attention, is a Methodist. How could the utter lack of reason, nature's best gift, be more laconically stated? No. 8 is Leo De Hart. No church will own him, and here, ladies and gentlemen, he first finds his God-appointed sphere. To place him elsewhere would be to question the wisdom of the creator. Horace L. Dunham, the ninth—to this one the same remarks apply as in the case of Jacob Ogden. Of Lemuel E. Pierson, the tenth, I may say that he does not know the price of putty. He was in training for that step in scientific knowledge when drafted upon this jury. Benjamin Flaharty and John McTiernan, the eleventh, the twelfth, and the last, we may consider together, their mentality being so dormant that the combined perspicacity of the two would be insufficient to send one of them into the house during a shower. Now, ladies and gentlemen, allow me to close with the remark with which I opened this address, namely, that you hav here before you twelve of the greatest living curiosities discoverable within the confines of this terrestrial ball. And permit me to add that the proprietor of this museum is negotiating with the authorities of New Jersey to secure for your entertainment next week both the attorney and the judge who acted as prosecutors in this remarkable case. You will now pass to the auditorium below and witness the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage in his great prayer and dance act."

Such a combination as is here foreshadowed would open up a new era in the dime museum business. Interest might be prolonged by occasionally adding to the collection one of those religious editors who indorse the action of the jury.

Editorial Notes.

No one but a determined bigot will deny that the one great issue in American politics is Prohibition.—Address to the Kentucky Prohibitionists.

It is indeed a great question. It is a question whether two men shall decide how a third man shall run his own stomach, and then by brute force compel him to abide by their decision.

THE so-called Reformed Presbyterians met the other day in synod, and after a long discussion resolved "that Christian professors free themselvs from all participation in and responsibility for the sin of Sabbath-breaking." We trust the synod will let the world know the number of professed Christians who keep this formal resolve. The statistics would be interesting.

THE Christian at Work says that "God and religion are necessary to man." We cannot admit this. The Jewish God is a tyrant; the Christian religion has ever worked evil to those who hav lived under its influence, and we do not think that tyrants and religious persecutions are beneficial to any race. God and religion, we believe, are necessary to New Jerseyites alone.

THE Church Messenger, of Charlotte, North Carolina, is a scandalously dishonest sheet. In reply to a correspondent, asking for the particulars of Voltaire's death, it prints an infamous libel upon the French philosopher, and excuses itself by saying it is "the best that we can do." The account is, perhaps, the best for Christianity, but for truth it is the worst that religious ingenuity could devise.

THE Toledo Blade is canvassing its readers' choice of the man for the next president. The following is its call:

"We ask every reader of the Blade to take the trouble to send us his views on the Republican presidential nominee in 1888. Take a postal card and answer upon it the following questions. Use only the numbers in answering:

"1. Who is your first choice for Republican presidential candidate in 1888?

"2. Who is your second choice?

"3. Who is your choice for vice-president?

"Sign your name, with your post-office address, and put nothing else upon the card. Address it simply, 'The Blade, Toledo, Ohio.'"

Mr. W. H. Kerr, of Dubuque, Kan., who sends this, thinks it would be well for every Liberal to send the Blade the name of Robert G. Ingersoll as first choice. We agree with Mr. Kerr. Let the people see that a champion of freedom is popular in America, ruled though she is by religious tyrants. Mr. H. Merrick, of Brooklyn, seconds our nomination of Colonel Ingersoll, and offers to giv twenty-five dollars toward the election expenses of the party that will giv the name of Robert G. Ingersoll the first place on its presidential ticket.

THE Permanent Committee on Reform chosen by the United Presbyterian Assembly, in session at Philadelphia, does not regard with serenity the present condition of religious affairs. Its report submitted to the Assembly the other day says:

"The spirit of Antichrist is abroad. Mormonism, Secularism, Socialism, Liberalism, secretism, saloonism, Sundayism, inebrieism, and other kindred evils are threatening civilization. Atheism is gaining ground. The psalmist calls the Atheist a 'fool.' There are many such 'fools' in the land who say no God, no Bible, no Sabbath, no church, no prayer, no worship. Away with all Sabbath laws and restraints, and let the first day of the week be devoted to the goddess of pleasure, to travel, recreation, and amusement; to Sunday newspaper reading, theatrical entertainments, and beer-drinking; tax the churches, take the Bible out of the public schools and giv the children of our country a merely intellectual training, abolish all chaplaincies and religious oaths, and run the entire government upon purely (or impurely) secular principles."

The logic of the committee's report would seem to be that a change is needed. And since this government has never been run on secular principles, how would it do to giv those principles a trial? The religious principles with which the state is at present corrupted appear not to hav led to gratifying results.

THE discovery of the Star of Bethlehem by the Kentucky astronomer is not indorsed by the editor of the Christian Advocate. He says that "the application of the title, Star of Bethlehem, to this heavenly body is only one of the futil attempts to explain miraculous occurrences by natural phenomena," which is another way of saying that it is of no use to try to make Bible stories appear reasonable. The editor of the Advocate does well in condemning this Star of Bethlehem theory at once. It proves too much, because when the star first appeared it was supposed to be a sort of celestial pyrotechnic display in celebration of the birth of Christ; but if it has a regular orbit and period of recurrence its appearance at that time was merely incidental, and as a witness to the divine character of Jesus it becomes valueless. An event of so notable a character that a star is specially created to commemorate it is worth talking about, but if the event merely chances to occur at the time when a certain star is in the heavens, the circumstance becomes less remarkable. If this star denoted the birth of a savior at its first appearance, its subsequent appearances should hav the same significance. However, if there are those who hold that a new messiah is actually now on earth, we would call respectful attention to the claims of Lewis the Light and Mr. Cyrus Romulus R. Teed, the arguments in favor of either or both of whom as divine incarnations are as good as we hav ever heard in favor of any one, past or present.

COLONEL INGERSOLL evidently does not believe in shutting off the supply of claret at the dinners of the dwellers in hotels. At a meeting of the proprietors of the leading hostelries of this town last week to consider the best means of getting around the Sunday laws on the liquor question, Colonel Ingersoll submitted a written opinion, in which he found holes in the law big enough to roll barrels of wine and liquor through on the Sabbath. Then he added: "Nothing can be more objectionable, nothing could be better calculated to annoy and interfere with the liberty of a citizen, than to say that every guest should be under the espionage of the police—that the city authorities shall hav the right to watch to see whether he drinks wine at his meals—to see the manner in which he livs. The privacy of a guest while in the hotel is just as sacred as when at his home, and in such privacy he should be protected by the law. Besides, it should be remembered that during the thirty years in which the law has been in force, the practice under it has never been to interfere with the dining-table, which certainly ought to create a strong presumption that the construction I contend for is the correct one. I hav read decisions with regard to the sale or giving away of wines or liquors on Sunday, but I find no case where the question is raised whether the keeper of an inn, tavern, or hotel has a right on Suuday to supply his guests with wine. This question involves another. The first question is, Has the guest a right to hav liquor or wine at his meals? If he has that right at home, he has, in my judgment, that right at his hotel. 'Shall I not take mine ease at mine inn?' is an old adage, and up to this time has never been disputed. I deny the right of the city authorities to say what a guest at a hotel shall hav for his dinner."

Letters from Friends.

CAIRO, ILL., May 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Watson Heston is a jewel in his line, and makes your paper doubly attractiv. You are both entitled to public thanks. AMARALA MARTIN.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., April 10, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am an out-and-out Liberal, and hav been ever since I was old enough to think clearly and independently. I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years, and greatly admire Watson Heston's illustrations. But one thing, Mr. Editor, I cannot possibly see what good can ever come of your persisting in leaving off the ending of such words as "have," "give," "live," etc. It looks careless and unfinished. Yours, N. J. JARLEYS.

BAVARIA, KAN., May 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to add a word of encouragement to Heston for the work he has engaged in. I think the lessons he is teaching are the very best and clearest. One look at a picture illustrating an idea is worth many times the reading of the items containing the same; more particularly to the young and those who are a little dull and inclined to excuse things apparently—as they may think—unaccountable, but which notwithstanding are in the wisdom of God.

A. K. MOTT.

ATLANTA, GA., May 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Your favor of the 21st to hand this morning. I am sorry to inform you that Mr. G. W. Price is dead. A more upright and honorable man never lived in the city of Atlanta.

I want to giv you a piece of advice this morning. It is this: Never send me a dun for my subscription to the dear old TRUTH SEEKER. When it is due, always giv draft on me for the amount, no matter where I am, what I am doing, whether I take the paper or not, for if I do not I should. I expect to contribute to the Truth Seeker Company the sum of $3 every year as long as I liv. SHOMO BROTHERS.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., May 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Alleged obscene words are to respectability what blasphemous ones are to religion, and both bear the same relation to truth. The former has its result in custom, the result of crudity; the latter, in superstition, born of ignorance. Hence, they are younger and older brothers. There is about as much real injury done when an idea is represented by a plain, definit term as when a God is blasphemed, and certainly in the same way. For what logical reason, then, can a free mind condemn the absurdity of one and not the other? Elmina penetrates them both.

H. P. REPLOGLE.

KENT, O., May 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The debate held here recently between Chas. Watts and the Catholic priest Leeming was a great victory for Secularism. The priest was so completely squelched that I don't think he will ever want to meet another Secularist in debate. Some of his own folks acknowledged his defeat, and said he made a fool of himself. One Irishman said: "Shure I could bate the priest meself." This fellow remarked that the trouble was the Infidel was under the influence of the devil. He says it is no use for a priest to debate with an Infidel when he has the devil to help him. Quite a sensible admission for a Christian—that God and a Catholic priest are no match for the devil and an Infidel.

B. F. CONAWAY.

NEWPORT, ME., May 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 21st is an excellent number. "Tales Told Out of School," if possible, is the best of all. "The Two Tyrannies of Russia" is of great importance, showing what "the mother of fools and the father of knaves hav done to murder humanity." And the article "God and His Slaves" ought to be read by millions. A thousand times hav I asked that question, "Where was the creator before creation?"

Since writing the foregoing I hav read "Tales" in your paper of May 14th—I hav been away most two weeks—and I don't like at all the word "Brother" Comstock. And this brings me to say a word about the outrage on Mrs. Slenker, that great worker for humanity. Must such a grand woman go to prison? S. M.

WILKES BARRE, PA., May 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just now read in the Christian Advocate an exulting statement in reference to the Boonton blasphemy case of C. B. Reynolds, and I am astonished that a decision so manifestly against the right to oppose the Christianity of our time, and against the freedom of speech, should hav been made. If this decision is law in New Jersey, and if it is not contrary to the clause in our national Constitution guaranteeing to every man the right to his own notions about religion, and the right in his own tent to expound them unmolested by a New Jersey mob, then it will be but the easiest thing in the world to suppress Freethought and free speech in any state of these United States of America. The Christianity of our time is equal to the task of getting a blasphemy law enacted in every state which is not already supplied, and then good-bye to any lecturer that may chance to pass along.

The question is clearly and squarely put in this case. Can Mr. Reynolds or anybody else preach against Christianity in New Jersey without incurring an indictment for blasphemy? And if not, is the law upon the statute books of New Jersey not an unconstitutional law? And should not be taken to the Supreme Court and reversed with costs, etc.? I am willing to pay ten dollars toward the expense of it, and find out whether any state has the right to keep upon its statute books laws that prevent a full and free expression of opinion on all religious subjects without incurring such prosecutions. Can we find Freethinkers enough to make the effort, and, if possible, get a decision that can be poked unceremoniously into the faces of those who through religious bigotry and malicious feelings are doing all they can to crush Freethought? Who will help this case to the Supreme Court?

J. R. PERRY.

HELENA, NEB., May 23, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav thought for some time that I would send you a word congratulatory of the splendid management of the best paper I hav any knowledge of. The dusting of John W. Truesdell's jacket, in your issue of May 14th, was just what he needed. I fear, though, that he has the "big head" too bad to appreciate it. When I saw his article in the Freethinkers' Magazine I felt as though he ought to hav a good spanking. He got it; and don't you forget it. Now, I don't want you to get vain over what I say, but the fact is, the grand old TRUTH SEEKER is getting better and better every week. Watson Heston is a "brick." His converting the American eagle into an ecclesiastical hen is immense. Keep up the pictures by all means. Let the grumblers grumble—you run the paper.

I hav just finished reading Prof. W. S. Bell's "Christianity and Civilization," and, like everything else the professor has produced, it has the true ring to it. W. BROOKS, M.D.

MORGAN, TEXAS, May 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I see in the dispatches dated the 20th that the jury in the case of C. B. Reynolds found a verdict of guilty. The Liberals of this place join with their brethren all over the country in sympathy for Brother Reynolds, and trust that the Supreme Court will reverse the decision of the jury of bigots that found him guilty. We are now commencing a campaign for Prohibition in Texas, and before August expect it will be hot, although said to be outside of politics. The Democratic leaders are, almost to a man, in opposition, and if our little town is an index, the Liberal element are on the same side. I think, for myself, prohibitory liquor laws are a humbug. I see that your correspondents are giving their opinions on the illustrations. I think the biblical ones should be continued as a help to Bible readers and students, as they are a most forcible explanation of the text. You hav my permission to continue, and I know I am with the majority. In fact, go ahead, and edit the paper as you are now doing and I will be satisfied.

MOSES MILLER.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS, May 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I received your valuable paper for a long time while I was connected with the San Antonio Daily Light as mail clerk and advertising agent, which latter position I still retain.

A hypocritical Democratic legislature has passed an ordinance or preliminary law, ordering an election to be held on the fourth day of August next, to decide whether prohibition shall be enforced in this state. The movement emanates from a set of ignoramuses who do not, or are not, possessed of sufficient strength of mind to govern their wants for the food of the inner man, and hence are trying to pass sumptuary laws, thus restricting the balance of mankind in the exercise of their freedom.

Some thief who has not the fear of God before him has carried off all the pamphlets and the two large books you sent me, but as luck would hav it, I had "Bible Temperance" in my pocket. I hav made considerable propaganda for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its publications, and shall do so hereafter. I want at least one thousand copies of "Bible Temperance" to sell to all anti-Prohibitionists throughout the state. I am going on the road for that purpose about the fifth of June, and shall make subscribers for you, also. Please send me anything in connection with the foregoing.

Respectfully, HERMANN BREUSING.

HAVANA, ILL., May 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to inform you that we had Mr. J. E. Remsburg here on Monday night, May 23d, to giv us a lecture; subject, "False Claims." The audience was a fair one, and all present took great interest in what was said, so as to catch every word uttered, except one Methodist church-member, who only listened about ten minutes. He got his little brain full and left. The next morning he was heard to remark that such men as Mr. Remsburg ought to be arrested and fined for giving such lectures. I think if his intellect had been a little more capacious so he could hav listened to all the lecture, he would hav come to a different conclusion. Mr. Remsburg's lecture was good, and right to the point. Some of our leading business and other prominent men came out to hear him, and all that I hav heard say anything about him say he is a man with great ability, and he stated facts which were right to the point. Dr. Pierce came from a distance to hear him, and we gave him the pleasure of introducing the speaker. The doctor is a Liberal out and out, and is always on hand to help the cause. Dr. J. H. Hill and Mr. E. Scott came all the way from Jacksonville, a distance of about forty miles. Dr. J. H. Hill is a hard worker in the cause of Liberalism, and always ready to help. Mr. Scott, whose hair, now white, shows that he is upward in years, is firmly fixed in the cause of Liberalism. He is generous, and looks like a man living for the happiness he could gain in this world, regardless of any other. I am going to hav Mr. Remsburg here again this fall if I can possibly make the necessary arrangements, and if he comes I am sure he will be greeted with a houseful of interested people. If he could hav lectured the second night the house would hav been crowded.

Mr. J. P. McIntire, the Methodist minister who was present at the lecture, could not wait until he got in the pulpit to talk about it, but was talking on the street about the lecture the next day. As Mr. Remsburg is gone, he will hav lots to say, and will do him up in grand shape—in his mind. I will say to Liberal friends, Get Mr. Remsburg, and hav him lecture on "False Claims." J. A. WEABER.

NEW HAVEN, PA., May 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find 25 cents, for which you will please send me "Orthodoxy," by R. G. Ingersoll, "Ingersoll Catechised," and "Bible Temperance," by E. C. Walker.

We hav a few Freethinkers in our little town. I get THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it goes the round of all that I know. This is a hot-bed of orthodoxy. We have a population of about four thousand, and nine churches; so you see we hav lots of ignorance, for the more churches the more ignorance, and the fewer churches the more intelligence. The Catholics had a big blow-out here yesterday; they made God a present of a gospel-shop, as I call it, and I suppose God is feeling good over it. I know some of the good Catholics were, from the effect of spirits. I would like to see a Freethought lecturer here. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and its pictures. W. J. WRIGHT.

OSWEGO CENTER, N. Y., May 20, 1887.

MY DEAR EUGENE: You can imagin my loneliness since the death of my loving wife, with whom I hav lived for thirty years, and who has shared my joys and sorrows during this long interval of time. I am alone (how the word hurts!) while I write; and oh! the painful, torturing stillness when I walk into our once cheerful, happy home, with no sound of a human voice or footstep of loved ones to greet me! And our only child is away from home, prostrate with sickness, and has spoken only in whisper for the last month. But I'll not take your time with my own trouble, for I am writing to challenge my Christian friends who are eternally harping on their one-stringed harp, "You won't talk so when you come to die." My wife was an Ingersoll Agnostic —i. e., she knew that she did not know—but was cheerful and happy, and would silence the preachers who called to save her soul with such answers as this, "I don't know; do you?" She had her mind and voice till within three minutes of her death, and knew her light was nearly extinguished, but passed away without a shadow of superstition, as calmly as if going to sleep. About forty rods from our home, a few months ago, an honest, earnest, devoted Christian lady died, one who always told us, over and over, "You won't talk so when you come to die;" but she died in fear that she might possibly hav left some duty undone and made a failure of heaven after all. My Christian friends, don't tell me again that "Jesus can make a dying bed as soft as downy pillows are."

Find inclosed $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would gladly make it $100.

So say I, comrades, Colonel Ingersoll for president! Let all who can compute the cost, and the probable result. I say he is the strongest man for the Labor party, the Jews, and all Liberals; and hundreds of Christians will vote for him, the anathemas of priests notwithstanding.

A. H. WALKER.

LEXINGTON, May 14, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: What hav the clergy done but propagate silly, base, and vague ideas? I reminded a learned man to-day of Carlyle's remark that "atoms were seething with the promis of future potency and life." "What a blasphemous wretch!" said my friend. "It is sufficient for us to know that Christ died for us; what hav we to do with atoms?" Oh, my friends, what should be our scorn and contempt for preachers who thus degrade the human mind almost to the level of the brute? What, if we could see the godlike soul, in their hands, dwarfed, distorted, half-paralyzed, contaminated by the coarsest associations—and that, too, which nature fashions so heavenly, so divine? Behold the howling, grinning demons, exulting over the miserable wrecks they hav made! They know that they could admit the light by degrees into the darkened minds of men; but—momentous question—how, then, would they be able to pay their board bills? What do they know of statesmanship? Jefferson said, "Beware of them." While the people should be the fountain of power and influence, Constantine caused the rich to supply the wants of the state, and drew from the revenues of the churches funds for the support of the poor. Emerson and Machiavel hav both emphasized the idea that the people know their own interest, and in times of great danger the last appeal can be safely made to the people. Herbert Spencer remarks that the exchange made every morning between country and city people, according to their own judgment and wishes, is better than the plans of kings.

Joseph Cook has been lecturing here on "The Certainties in Religion," including, "Shall we liv when we are dead?" A certain rusticus, listening with open mouth, called him "the eighth wonder of the world." Joseph forgot that when dining upon the sweets of paradise, there is always a skeleton at the feast. I think I hav been better pleased with the exquisit reflections of Montaigne upon the fear of death.

Some timid gentlemen and ladies are distressed because our country is trying to part with some of her barbarous ways, when the only thing necessary for safety is to remind the people every day and hour that the change should be peacefully made, instead of quarreling like Kilkenny cats. What shall we do when the Socialist rallies the world beneath his banners? They come here for peace, and not for war, with overwhelming numbers, and laws which hav long been desired can soon be made. Preachers and monopolists will offer with blushes and shame the use of palatial residences and churches for factories and dwellings for the poor. I see it as in a vision. ALHAZA.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., May 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to tell of something which happened not far from here, and which givs the lie to the idea of a prayer-hearing and answering God. I do not know the names of the people concerned, so I will not try to giv them, but it was a farmer, and he was having a well bored near his house. It seems they were in rock from the start. The well was fifty-five feet deep and only an eight-inch hole. One day when they were not working at the well, and no one was about it, a little child, just beginning to walk, found its way to the spot. Its mother saw it standing by the well. She at once called to it, and, on hearing her, it looked around and slipped into the well with both feet. When its mother got to the well, it had slipped down until she could just touch its little head with the tips of her fingers, but could not help it in any way. Every motion the poor little helpless thing made to extricate itself only pushed it further from its frantic and grief-stricken mother. Down, down it went, in spite of the cries and screams and prayers of its mother, until when help (if help human powers can be called) came, it was out of sight, out of reach, and out of hope of recovery, yet still crying for its mother. They could not help it. So it went on until it was at the bottom of that dark, deep well, and there it stayed alive for three days, crying for its mother, with merciless rocks crushing its little heart to death. On top of the ground, in the free and open air and in the free and open sunlight, in hearing of their little darling, yet powerless to help, were the parents. Remember, the hole was only eight inches in diameter, and the little child fitted so closely that it went down very slowly. And yet a God so kind and tender that he watches even the falling of a sparrow looked on with the indifference of a heartless fiend, and would not help it out. And the people waited until it died, and rescued its little body from the hands of God by blasting. Who could worship such a fiend? I hav no prayer for him.

BERLIN, N. J., May 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You have told a greaf deal of truth in your paper, but never struck a richer vein than in the "Tales Told Out of School." You ought to publish it in pamphlet form, and every Liberal ought to be willing to liv on two meals a day, as I will agree to, until he has enough to buy a dollar's worth to distribute among churchmen. If an Infidel had written the same, churchmen would sneer at it, and call it false and blasphemous; but here they hav the plain, naked truth from one of their most intelligent parsons, who was chosen by themselvs to travel a year and get at the true state of the churches, and my experience and observations in a life of eighty-six years prove that he has told the truth, and now let it be scattered to the ends of the earth!

Well, Brother Macdonald, the Boonton churches hav defended their God. The jury of wise men decided that Mr. Reynolds injured his character to the extent of $25. What an idea! A finite man injuring the character of a supreme being $25 worth, and the damage can be paid in "filthy lucre!"

But they will find in the end that it is not a God but priestcraft that has been injured, and that they hav injured it themselvs more than Mr. Reynolds did. There is one thing I would like to know. How are they to get this $25 to their God? Does he ever come down, as it is said he did in olden times, or are some of the saints to carry it up to him when they go? And what will their God do with the money when he gets it? We do not read that his son, in his thirty-three years' life on earth, ever had but one piece of silver, and that was taken from the mouth of a fish, nor did it cost anything to get. As there are so many pious tricks played off in the churches now, I think the court should hav appointed some honest Infidel to see that the Lord gets his pay for the damage done to his character, for if it is left in the hands of the church, I don't believe he will ever get a farthing of it. And I would like to know how their God approves of their manner of defending his character, as they say he is supreme in power, and can strike blasphemers dead or punish them in his own way.

Yours, J. HAOKER.

A REPLY TO MR. PIKARD.

MIDDLE FALLS, N. Y., June 1, 1887.

MR. PIKARD: I hesitated for some time before asking THE TRUTH SEEKER for space in which to reply to your open letter in the number for May 7th, since my former article meets and answers all your objections to my position, and only that you are so unfair in your treatment of me in this connection I would remain silent, trusting to the good sense of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers to fairly comprehend my views when they hav been so plainly set forth. But you show so evident a determination to misrepresent and distort the statements which you are trying to answer, that I feel compelled to briefly notice your errors, and partly restate my views regarding the changed words.

First, I would say, if you hav read my communication with the care you speak of, you ought not to incorrectly quote from it, or tack on a meaning that it does not express. By the way, the letter appeared in the issue for April 2d, and not March 7th, as you hav got it. You say: "You would be in favor of making all right at once, or none of it. You would want to build a house in a day, or not begin it. Laying three or four bricks would be so distasteful you would abandon it altogether. You wouldn't plow one acre of ground unless you could do it with one furrow," etc. Now, friend Pikard, where do you find any statement in my letter from which to draw such a conclusion? I hav intimated nothing of the kind. Again you say, "You make a singular expression when you say nine new characters to represent letters," an expression I did not use. I said "to represent the letters we now lack to express the sounds of the language;" quite a difference, and in this form entirely correct. I fear you are given to quibbling when you are more intent to trip me up in grammatical expressions than to refute my argument. Thus you quote, "So sweeping a reform would, of course, produce an almost total change in the structure of our language in its represented form," and then try to overthrow it by saying, "Letters do not determin the structure of a language; they only signify the elements of words. Words are elements of language." Well, what of that? Can you change the letters of a word and not change the appearance of the word? Mind, I said the represented form of the language, i. e., its appearance as written or printed, not as it is spoken. Will you deny it? Take a page from a book with the words as now spelled, and place beside it another with the same reading, but spelled entirely by sound, with the new letters proposed, and no one unacquainted with the spoken form of our language would believe they were in the same tongue. Their appearance would be as dissimilar as Italian and Spanish. In the face of the fact that I said notwithstanding this I would be glad to see the change adopted by every periodical and every educational institution in the land, you will hav it that I am no friend to spelling reform. You say, "The idea that a man will say he wishes the adoption of so great a matter to bless the world, and yet ridicule the very first and necessary steps to educate the people to appreciate it, does not sound very logical to me." You may think that the very "first and necessary step" to correct an error is to substitute another error, but I do not. Would you correct one falsehood by telling another in its place? Certainly not. Neither can I consent to correct a wrong spelling by adopting another equally incorrect. There is an old and true saying that you must strike at the root if you would remove an evil, and I consider the "first step and the necessary step" is to spell the words right when we change them, and not adopt a false spelling which must in a few years undergo another change. I will explain this further on. You say, "You would be glad to see right spelling adopted, and yet you call those who are laboring to promote it 'spelling deformers.'" This is as far from the truth as the sun from the earth. I call no one a "spelling deformer" who is laboring to hav "right spelling adopted," but only apply it to those who seek to introduce a sham reform, such as hav, giv, liv, and nolej (see table below).

Passing over your harmless little stories of those Illinoisians with the "sheepshin," the forty-acre field, etc. (which, by the way, are highly amusing, and which, I trust, will yield you an infinit amount of merriment whenever your mind reverts to them), allow me to introduce right here a table or alphabet of sounds used in spelling, by which I will endeavor to show you the fallacy of spelling as you do the above-mentioned words. I will try to show by familiar examples what vowel sounds should be represented by single letters, placing a number for each lacking letter, since THE TRUTH SEEKER has no type to represent (singly) those sounds.

|---|---|
| A, ay. | M, em. |
| (1), ah, as in far, heart. | N, en. |
| (2), aw, as in fall, walk. | O, oh. |
| (3), sound of a in hat, land. | (7), uh, as in won, bulb. |
| B, be. | (8), uuh, as in wolf, push. |
| C, see. | (9), ooh, as in move, fool. |
| D, de. | P, pe. |
| E, ee. | Q, que. |
| (4), eh, as in get, when. | R, are. |
| (5), er, as in germ, dirt. | S, es. |
| F, ef. | T, tee. |
| G, pronounce always g hard, as in girl, not je. | U, you. |
| | (10), ow, as in growl, mound. |
| H, aitch. | V, ve. |
| I, eye. | W, double you. |
| (6), ih, as in fit, hymn. | X, ex. |
| J, Jay. | Y, wy. |
| K, kay. | Z, zee. |

Let us now apply the principles of the above alphabet to a few words, using one of these figures whenever a vowel occurs which our regular alphabet does not represent by a separate letter. I shall thus be able to show you why my "falsely cultivated taste" will not allow me to spell nolej (knowledge) as you do. It seems a trifle strange for a man who has been a spelling reformer for thirty-five years to giv the sound of o and e in this word—sounds which are not heard in it at all—omitting the sounds which are really heard, marked (1) and (4) in the above table, and then triumphantly remark: "I hav spelled all the sounds in it." On the contrary, you hav done nothing of the kind. Correctly spelled, the word must be, n(1)l(4)j. You hav shortened the word by your spelling, but hav not bettered it in any other way, nolej being just as much a blunder as knowledge; both are wrong. And this brings us right back to the postulate in my former letter, that, "except in the one item of space saved, the old adage of 'every little helps' does not apply," to answer which you cry out, "I differ with you, inasmuch as it familiarizes the eye with correct spelling." Correct spelling, eh? Let us see. You spell have hav, and give giv, whereas, correctly spelled, they would be, h(3)v, and g(6)v (see sounds marked thus above), the sounds a and i not being heard in these words. Perhaps to all this you will say you could not spell them correctly because the papers do not hav the proper type. Very true; but when I mentioned that nothing of moment could be accomplished by those who are lopping and pruning among the twenty-six letters we now hav, and said that nothing short of a radical reform would suit me, you seemingly indorsed me by saying, "As to being radical, I am with you, and the first thing in order is as many letters as sounds;" and then, in the face of these brave words, you, in common with others, reproach me because I cannot indorse your spurious reform of hav, giv, liv, and nolej. What position is this for a spelling reformer to assume? You would be glad to see right spelling adopted, and yet you wish our papers to adopt a sham reform in order "to accustom our eyes to correct spelling." Fy, Mr. Pikard, how can you be so inconsistent?

A spelling reform in accord with the above simple yet comprehensiv system will not hav to be modeled over as the years go by. The change in use and pronunciation of the other letters (consonants) in connection with it, such as c, k, and g, I hav mentioned in my other letter. Such a radical reform goes to the bed-rock, and revolutionizes the appearance of more than four-fifths of the words in the English language. The spelling-book may be dispensed with; under such a system a child could hardly spell a word wrong if it tried. As you claim that our American children hav to content themselvs with only three-fourths of the education they might acquire but for our faulty spelling, you will readily see how, under its influence, our people must reach a much higher plane of thought and a grander horizon of mental development I am not probably so sanguin as you, yet I readily admit its importance, and will hail its adoption as a great blessing. There are a few drawbacks in connection with a system of spelling entirely by sound, where all words pronounced alike are spelled alike, since at times a writer's import may not be exactly clear in regard to the intended meaning of some of the words used. The sense of the subject will generally show us the right meaning, but not always. There is a remedy for this, however, which may be decided upon when the proposed system comes into use. May we look for its adoption? You will probably say, May we work for its adoption? Be it so. I care not if you commence by laying three or four bricks only a year, as you propose, or overturn the old system at once; but what I wish, and I hav tried to make it clear to you, is to hav all words which are changed spelled in accordance with the common-sense method, and the percentage which can be thus corrected without the use of new type is small. You are disposed to blame the printers for not furnishing new type to illustrate the new spelling to their readers, but how can the printers provide themselves with new type until some form for the characters has been decided upon? Would you hav every printing-office running a system of spelling "on its own hook?" Our publishers are not to blame; it is a subject for a national convention to meet upon and decide.

I will tell you, friend Pikard, why I do not think the proposed change is likely to be adopted anywhere in the near future. In 1866 Congress authorized the adoption of the metric system in the United States—a system of weights and measures giving the same ease and facility in reduction and business calculations that is secured in money computation by the use of our decimal currency. Twenty-one years hav gone by, and the people still use the old tables. Children are still laboring over the old problems of grains and penny-weights, and yards and rods, puzzling their brains to commit a lot of musty old tables, and there is no prospect of this useful system being adopted until it is made compulsory in each state by enactment. And I fear it will be so with a radical spelling reform. The great majority of the people are blind to their own interests—like to drift idly along in the slow current of popular errors, and it is hard indeed to arouse them from their lethargy.

In conclusion, I can say as you do, "I hav not exhausted the subject by a good deal," but I trust I hav shown you why I do not favor your alleged reform of displacing one error by adopting another, and that my position is entirely logical notwithstanding your doubts. D. LOUIS BODGE.

JOSEPH, OR., May 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I think I hav pretty thoroughly dissected the little pamphlet entitled "The Theory of Evolution," by Prof. Thomas Henry Huxley. I differ widely with the professor, as it were, from my point of view. I hav a small stock of ideas or conclusions which, though not inexorable, I use as a source of reliance under the present condition. However erroneous, I think the professor has knocked the Miltonic or theological system higher than Gilderoy's kite, and has supplanted it with a theory rather more absurd and retrograding; for I, from some cause, probably ignorance, am not able to distinguish the material difference between 6,000 years of duration and 100,000. It seems to me that there is nothing gained by chasing our ancestry back to the monkey, pachyderm, or any other species of lower grade. We, as he states his views, originated from something inferior. Where will he come to in the course of time on his string of inferiority? On page eleven, in the pamphlet of his lectures, it will be seen what he wishes to throw out of court. I don't propose to throw anything out of court. When his argument is traced back and found without foundation he comes the theological dodge on it. The question is asked, Who was God's ancestor? and he supports the theory of no existence without a universal first cause. As regards the different formations it would be only a matter of time until we would pierce the heart of the earth. What then? Another theological stump. It will be seen on the eighth page of the aforesaid pamphlet that the universe has come into existence somehow or other. That is as much as to say, there was a time when it (the universe) did not exist. How is that compared with Uncle Moses's statement? It appears to me very clear that there is no existing thing with one end. In case there is one end, there must be two; and if this is accepted, and the universe had a commencement, it must naturally hav an ending; and if there is any indication in the front ground of its destruction, I think it is recent. Again, if the earth were once in a molten condition, in what condition was it before that, or was that its original condition? If so, would not the cause of it possess the power to keep it in that condition? If such was the case, which seems to me impossible, it must hav been the place described by ancient clergy as hell, as most of our druggists hav scraped up a little brimstone for future reference.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Thinkfidel.

He may not a Freethinker be
Who boldly boasts he thinketh free;
'Tis only freedom from a thought
Not to hav by wisdom wrought
Some kindly deed to cheer and bless
A child bereft of happiness.

His is the independent mind
Who good in all can duly find.
Whate'er his chapel or his creed,
Or having none, who does a deed
To light the loads that others gall,
Not bigot but a brother call.

Then call not him an Infidel,
Nor damn him to a devil's hell,
Who not believes and will not own
The gods or ghosts with name or none,
But faithful does what seemeth good
As reason makes it understood.

He only is the faithful one
Whose work will stand in time to come,
Who cares not most for things of might,
But craves to guard the weakest's right.
Hope, truth, and justice shall approve
Of him whose faith is work and love.

Our Flag Above the Cross.

Not long since attention was called to an advertisment in THE TRUTH SEEKER of some paper and envelopes with this heading, "Our Flag Above the Cross." The advertisment recalls to mind a letter received in the beginning of the year from a Liberal friend, Mr. J. Waters, in which he advocated a plan to keep alive in the minds of growing children the heroic deeds of the fathers of the republic, and at the same time inspire them with greater love and veneration for the institutions of our country which hav been given into our keeping.

It is, perhaps, a sad truth that children are not duly impressed with the significance of liberty and equality in a free land like ours, and forget to whom they are indebted for the blessings and privileges enjoyed.

For new inspiration, for further stimulation of thought and memory, Mr. Waters recommends that the national holiday, the fourth day of July, should be used, together with its grandest celebration of our national independence, as a gift-making holiday, as the day itself is typical of the great gift of liberty to America.

The idea is sensible, beautiful, and praiseworthy. If we should "giv good gifts" on any day, there is no time more auspicious than America's birthday. The proposition of Mr. Waters will, no doubt, meet the approbation of every lover of liberty throughout the land.

The impression made upon the minds of children by Christmastide is evident upon all sides. And yet this time celebrates an occasion of the truth of which there are many and grave doubts. Were the main ideas connected with Christmas in exact accordance with the truth, instead of much error, as is the case, even then there is not so much reason to celebrate the day with festivities and gift-making as clusters around the fourth day of July, the birthday of American Independence.

If it is desired to associate the day with myths, "Uncle Sam" and "Aunt Columbia" stand out in bold relief, ready to be utilized and woven into the joy and happiness of the holiday.

It is seriously to be hoped that the ideas suggested above will find approval in the minds of everyone, and that a beginning will be made this year to lift the birthday of American Independence into such light, prominence, grandeur, and beauty as shall inspire enthusiasm and kindle the fires of appreciation and devotion until they burn in the bosom of every child as they never hav before. Let gifts, mementoes, and blessings be exchanged; let the poor, the needy, and unfortunate be made glad and rejoicing that they liv in a land of liberty, free men, and some day to come, it may be added, free women.

Let the flag be lifted above the cross and float upon the air of heaven, the symbol of freedom and fraternity. Let the bells ring and chime the glad songs of liberty and equality, and the sweet interchange of gifts make the Nation's Birthday the holiest, the sweetest, the noblest occasion known to men, women, and children. ## Correspondence.

PERRY, ILL., May 23, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been reading the Children's Corner and I thought I would try and write. I go to Sunday-school; the teacher thinks I am a great Bible reader, but it is THE TRUTH SEEKER I read. Our town has 770 inhabitants and 6 churches. Pa is the only one in town that takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. He has taken it for eight years. I am thirteen years old and this is the first letter I ever attempted to write to a paper. I hope this will escape the waste basket.

Yours truly, GEORGE J. DOWNER.

TONAWANDA, N. Y., May 24, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write and see if you are well. I hav four little kittens at home. I am at my grandma's now. I was going home to-night, but it rains so that I cannot. I am nine years old. There is a little baby here and he is very nice. My grandma has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for twelve years, and I like it very much, especially the Children's Corner. I think that you are a dear, good woman to take so much pains for the children. I liv on Tonawanda Island in Niagara river. I am not home-sick with grandma, but I want to go home and see mamma.

Your little friend, NORA L. MILLIOHAMP.

JESSIE STARK CROW.—Your poem went astray, and arrived too late for publication last month. It is very good and will keep.—ED. C. C.

Orthodoxy. 56 pages, 12mo, paper, 10 cents. $1.00 per doz. post paid. Printed in large, clear type, and containing as much as could be delivered in two ordinary lectures. This makes a grand missionary document. Liberals should scatter it generously.

Ingersoll Catechised: His Answers to a Number of Vital Questions Propounded by the editor of the San Franciscan. 5 cents; 50 cents per dozen; 25 copies, $1; 100 copies, $3. Millions of these should be circulated.

Vindication of Thomas Paine from the attacks of the New York Observer, by Robert G. Ingersoll. Price, 15 cents.

Address on the Civil Rights Bill. Large size octavo, paper, 10 cents.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Photographs of Colonel Ingersoll. boudoir, $1; cabinet, 40 cents.

Price, single copies, 25 cents; 6 copies, $1. Special discount on larger quantities.

Sabbath-Breaking. This is the best and most thorough work ever written on the Sabbath from a rational point of view. Large and handsome print. The question is discussed under the following heads: Origin of the Sabbatic Idea; The Jewish Sabbath; The Christian Scriptures and the Sabbath; Examination of Sunday Arguments; Origin of Christian Sabbath; Testimony of the Christian Fathers; The abb ath during the Middle Ages; The Puritan abbath; Testimony of Christian Reformers, Scholars, and Divines; Abrogation of Sunday Laws Price, 25 cents; six copies, $1.00.

Thomas Paine. The Apostle of Religious and Political Liberty. Tells the story of the Author-Hero's life, delineates the leading traits of his character and genius, and vindicates his name from the aspersions cast upon it. Choice extracts from "Common Sense," "American Crisis," "Rights of Man," and "Age of Reason" are given; also, tributes to Paine's character from more than one hundred noted persons of Europe and America, many of them written expressly for this work. Second edition, 160 pages, printed on fine tinted paper, neatly bound, and containing a handsome steel portrait of Paine. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Image Breaker. Six Lectures: Decline of Faith, Protestant Intolerance, Washington an Unbeliver; Jefferson an Unbeliever; Paine and Wesley; Christian Sabbath. Each 5 cents; bound, paper, 25 cents; per doz. 40 cts.

The Apostle of Liberty. An address delivered in Paine Hall, before the N. E. Freethinkers' Convention, January 29, 1884. Price, 10 cents.

How the Robin Came.

Happy young friends, sit by me,
Under May's blown apple-tree;
Hear a story, strange and old,
By the wild red Indians told,
How the robin came to be.

Once a great chief left his son,
Well beloved, his only one,
When the boy was well-nigh grown,
In the trial lodge alone.
Left for tortures long and slow
Youths like him must undergo,
Who their pride of manhood test,
Lacking water, food, and rest.
Seven days the fast he kept,
Seven days he never slept.
Then the poor boy, wrung with pain,
Weak from nature's overstrain,
Faltering, moaned a low complaint:
"Spare me, father, for I faint!"
But the chieftain, haughty-eyed,
Hid his pity in his pride.
"You shall be a hunter good,
Knowing never lack of food;
You shall be a warrior great,
Wise as fox and strong as bear;
Many scalps your belt shall wear,
If with patient heart you wait
One day more!" the father said.
When, next morn, the lodge he sought,
And boiled samp and moose meat brought
For the boy, he found him dead.

As with grief his grave they made,
And his bow beside him laid,
Pipe, and knife, and wampum braid—
On the lodge top overhead,
Preening smooth its breast of red
And the brown coat that it wore,
Sat a bird, unknown before,
And, as if with human tongue,
"Mourn me not," it said or sung;
"I, a bird, am still your son,
Happier than if hunter fleet,
Or a brave, before your feet
Laying scalps in battle won.
Friend of man, my song shall cheer
Lodge and corn land; hovering near,
To each wigwam I shall bring
Tidings of the coming spring;
Every child my voice shall know
In the moon of melting snow,
When the maple's red bud swells,
And the wind flower lifts its bells;
As their fond companion
Men shall henceforth own your son,
And my song shall testify
That of human kin am I."

Thus the Indian legend saith
How, at first, the robin came
With a sweeter life from death,
Bird for boy, and still the same.
If my young friends doubt that this
Is the robin's genesis,
Not in vain is still the myth
If a truth be found therewith;
Unto gentleness belong
Gifts unknown to pride and wrong;
Happier far than hate is praise,
He who sings than he who slays.

—John G. Whittier in St. Nicholas.

Lost Souls and Saved Bodies.

"A STEAMER LOST!—The steamer John Knox. . . . She struck the Channel Harbor and sank in half an hour. Every soul on board perished. Some bodies were saved, having been washed ashore."

We would most respectfully inquire of the chronicler of the above paragraph his meaning in stating, "Every soul on board perished?" If he means every person on board lost his life, died, or perished, why not say so? Why call the crew of the steamer souls? Holding the chronicler to an accurate use of terms, we can call him to an account for fixing the state of these "souls," for without any reservation, limitation, or qualification, he boldly declares "every soul perished." Then these "souls" are dead; they can neither rise at judgment in glory, nor to shame and everlasting contempt. They are dead, every one of them; "perished," utterly annihilated!

Is it not about time for newspaper men to drop these Bible terms and phrases, and report their news items with a little more sense?

There is another error we see often—oh, so often!—"The couple became man and wife;" or, what is still worse, "the parson made them man and wife." Why not report it he "made them woman and husband?" as much sense in the latter as in the former. Just think how ridiculous! The parson makes the groom a man by marrying him to the bride, while the bride remains a woman, just what she was before! He was not a man before, but the marriage has made him one. They are now only man and wife, not husband and wife. She becomes a wife by the marriage, but he does not become a husband. His relationship is not changed toward the wife; he is simply a man as before, not a husband, while she is his wife; for did not the parson after the ceremony declare, "I now pronounce you man and wife?"

Recently this vulgarism has been very apparent in the Walker-Harman trial, where the offenders were indicted for "living together as man and wife," and this in law repeated until one would grit their teeth and exclaim, "What fools these lawyers and lawmakers be!"

Away with such Christian Bible nonsense, and use proper language when describing the common events of life, and if the churches and priesthood choose to use holy twaddle, myth, fire, blood, and thunder, let them do so to their hearts' content, but let those who know better leave them severely alone in their false Bible expressions and sacred phraseology, and if they choose to chronicle a narrow escape, "it was miraculous," and thus expose their inaccuracy and bigotry we can afford to let them and smile at their folly. But let us arm ourselvs against these infringements on a correct use of language, and stick to a scientific vocabulary bereft of their insane renderings and divine interpolations without sense or reason.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

A Dialog.

Infidel. Was Adam a perfect man or not?

Christian. God made him perfect, but he sinned and became imperfect.

I. Could a perfect being sin?

C. Adam was a free agent, and could do as he pleased, right or wrong.

I. You hav not answered my question. Could a perfect being sin, or would a perfect being want to sin?

C. Well, he might be tempted.

I. Suppose God had made two men, and suppose the one had no desire to sin and could not be tempted, while the other had a taste for forbidden fruit and finally ate some—would one be better than the other?

C. Yes.

I. Then could both be perfect?

C. Well, no; not if one were better than the other.

I. Which would be imperfect?

C. Why, the one that wanted to sin—the way you put it.

I. Well, is not that the one that God made and the one that you said was made perfect?

C. You talk like an Infidel, and such remarks may cost you your soul. It will matter but little to you whether Adam was perfect or not when you get into hell.

I. At your string's end, eh? Your own answers make you admit that if Adam sinned he was not perfect. Now, is not the God that made him responsible for the sin resulting from his imperfection?

C. I don't want to discuss such things. God's ways are not man's ways.

I. Why didn't you say that at first?

Tyrone, Pa. WM. SCOTT.

How a Church Extension Failed.

A Sioux Falls minister recently went out to another Dakota town to help organize a church. On his return his wife said to him:

"I trust you were successful and laid the foundation for a prosperous church society."

"Well, I'm afraid I can't say that I was."

"Why, I don't see what could hav prevented?"

"I'll tell you; I got those together who appeared to be interested, and we talked the matter over some little time."

"Well, why don't you go on?"

"Why, they didn't appear to be very enthusiastic, and to test the matter I said, 'Gentlemen, I move that we proceed to organize a Presbyterian church.' Just then a prominent business man arose and said, 'I move to amend the gentleman's motion so that instead of a Presbyterian church we organize a board of trade and get up a boom.' 'Those in favor of the amendment,' said I, 'will please rise.' You ought to hav seen them get up! Every man stood up except one lame man, and he was feeling on the floor for his crutch. Some got up on the chairs, and one man tried to crawl on top of the stove. When I came away they were talking about moving the cemetery to make room for a street-car line."—Winnipeg Siftings.

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

News of the Week.

WILLIAM A. WHEELER, vice-president under Hayes, died at Malone, N. Y., last Saturday, aged 67.

NEWMAN LITTER and Herman Hehrskrowitz, tailors, were arrested last Sunday for breaking the Sabbath by sewing.

THE clearing away of the débris from the site of the Paris theater fire brought to light the bodies of seventy victims.

THE latest development in the Sharp trial is the charge of jury-bribing by the defendant. An investigation is being made.

THE Episcopalians of New York talk of erecting a cathedral, to be the finest building of the kind in America and to cost $10,000,000.

THE birthday of Jefferson Davis on June 3d was celebrated at Richmond, Va., by a concert for the benefit of the Confederate Soldiers' Home. Davis is 79.

THE Rev. W. C. Stiles, reported lost, strayed, or stolen from Pittsfield, N. H., was seen in New York, and later turned up at Norway, Me., where his mother livs.

THE pope has written to his nuncios abroad saying that the restoration of his temporal power is the only terms upon which he will treat for peace with the Italian government.

THE backbone of the Sunday beer famin in this city appears to hav been broken.

A THOUSAND men were employed last week in the ruins of the car stables recently burnt, digging out the carcasses of the 1,200 horses destroyed by the fire.

THE Italian woman, Chiara Cignarale, charged with shooting her husband in a New York tenement-house, has been found guilty of murder in the first degree and sentenced to be hanged July 22d.

NEWS has just been received at Manson, Calhoun county, Ia, that the Rev. Dr. Reid, who left that place last winter to become a missionary in Central Africa, had been killed and eaten by a tribe of cannibals.

LEWIS MASQUERIER, the land reformer, dedicated his own monument in Cypress Hills Cemetery, Brooklyn, last Sunday. A few friends were present and listened to his address. Mr. Masquerier is 85 years old.

CHARLES SEIDHORF, aged 91, and his wife, aged 93, of Union Hill, N. J., committed suicide last week rather than go to the poorhouse. The poormaster called for them and found them both dead upon the floor. A letter which the old man left set forth the reasons for the act.

THE new Scotch cutter, the Thistle, built to capture the America's cup, now held by New York yachtsmen, has proved herself to be a remarkably fast boat, having beaten the Genesta by eleven minutes in a forty-four-mile race over the Dover course. She will come to America and try for the cup.

JAMES HOPE, the notorious bank burglar, was taken to Auburn last week for robbing the Manhattan bank in this city several years ago. He has just served out a sentence in California for a similar offense. Other sentences in different states are hanging over him. He is upwards of fifty years of age, and will probably end his days in jail.

THE workingmen of New York, to the number of more than 50,000, turned out last Saturday night to giv a reception to Mr. O'Brien, editor of United Ireland, but Mr. O'Brien refused to show himself. He said in explanation that he could not appear upon the same platform with John McMackin, who had once presided at a dynamiter's lecture; neither would he fellowship with Henry George, on account of his land doctrins, nor with McGlynn, because of his trouble with the pope. He is severely criticised by the leaders of the labor movement.

ABRAHAM PREPARETH TO CARVE ISAAC.

And Abraham stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son. And the angel of the Lord called unto him out of heaven, and said, Abraham, Abraham.—Gen. xxii, 10, 11.

Odds and Ends.

THE fashionable clergyman is feeling very ill just now, and his congregation are skirmishing round to raise money to send him to Europe.

THERE is a couple living in the vicinity of Boston, who two years ago were nursed in the lap of luxury; that is to say, they were very wealthy. In a fatal hour the husband took to amateur farming, and the wife became her own milliner and dressmaker. The last seen of the unfortunate pair was last week, when they entered the cars en route for the state almshouse.

JOHNNY was sick last summer and had to stay in the house while there was a circus in town. Naturally it did not sweeten his temper, and his mother had to talk to him. "My child," she said, "you must not complain because you are sick. It is very wicked. You want to go to heaven, don't you?" "Yes'm," he growled, "but not till after the circus. A little boy can go to heaven any time, but a circus ain't in town every day."

A CERTAIN gentleman had a mother-in-law with whom he did not liv on a very peaceful footing. Finally she died, and the son-in-law in a few days afterward met Jones, who is somewhat of a literary character. "I suppose you hav heard of my misfortune," said the distressed son-in-law "Yes, I read the sad news." "Well, I want you to get me a nice epitaph for her—something short." "Yes," replied the friend, "the shorter the better. How would 'At Last' do?"

"MY son," said a minister, placing his hand on the head of a freckle-faced boy, "do you attend the Baptist Sunday-school?" "No, mum," replied the boy, "but me and Billy Powers goes a-swimmin' in the baptistry in the basement." "But," said the minister, "you will never get religion in that way." "Oh, come off!" growled the boy. "The baptistry hasn't been pumped out for six months, and the religion in it is a-gettin' so thick that it will stick to us when we don't use soap."

TRUE, THOUGH REMARKABLE.

"Yes, I'm from Dakota," he said meekly as he got into conversation with a man on an Eastern train.

"Ah, is that so? I am thinking of going out there myself to invest in some farming land."

"We hav some very fine land."

"So I understand—but are not some of the stories they tell of its fertility exaggerated?"

"Why, my friend, I am sorry to say some of them are downright untruths."

"That's what I thought. Now, what is the most remarkable instance of the fertility of Dakota soil which ever came under your observation?"

"Well, I believe the case of my pump might go at the head of the list."

"What was it?"

"I dug a well about forty feet deep the first season I was there and put down a wooden pump. It happened that it was made out of a small cottonwood log which was a little green, and the soil at the bottom of that well, forty feet from the surface, was so fertil that the pump took root, and it also grew up and branched out, and now while my children play in a swing attached to one of the branches I pump water through the hole which still remains in the trunk."

"Do you tell that for the truth?"

"Why, certainly, sir; I never tell anything but the truth."

"Are you engaged in farming or the real estate business?"

"Why, I'm engaged in neither, my friend, neither. I'm a preacher. I went out there as a missionary seven years ago, and though my work has been humble I trust it has had a beneficial influence on our people."—Dakota Bell.

THE CZAR'S PLEASURE TRIP.

The czar started out on a pleasure excursion,
To travel a few miles by rail,
With stockings of iron that he had to pry on, and a steel undershirt that wouldn't show the dirt, and a riveted ulster of mail.
I need for this trip stout clothes that won't rip,"
Said the czar, "when they catch on a nail."

And he took for his friends on this pleasure excursion
An army of soldiers so rough,
With gun and with cannon, with flag and with pennon, with carloads of shot, and a monstrous big lot of muskets, and rifles, and stuff.
Says he: "'Twill be tame if we find any game,
And don't hav ammunition enough."

So he started forth on his pleasure excursion,
This jolly and fun-loving czar;
And they halted, 'tis reckoned, on every third second, hit the wheels with a whack, and examined the track, and tore up the floor of the car.
"What a jolly sweet life," said the czar to his wife:
"This pleasure excursion, ha, ha!"—S. W. Foss.

Gems of Thought.

SLAVERY, its perpetuation and crimes, are an eternal blot upon the Christian church of America.—D. M. Bennett.

WHEN we entreat a fellow-creature to forgiv the offenses we hav committed against him, we mean to entreat that he will not, by any act of his, punish us for them, that he will not revenge or repay them, that he will retain no rancor in his breast against us on account of them; and such a prayer addressed to a being of like passions to ourselvs is rational and intelligible, because we know that it is natural for him to feel anger at our injuries, and that, unless moved to the contrary, he will probably retaliate. But when we pray to our heavenly father to "forgiv us our trespasses as we forgiv them that trespass against us" we overlook the want of parallelism of the two cases and show that our notions on the subject are altogether misty and confused; for God cannot be injured by our sins and he is inaccessible to the passions of anger and revenge. . . The expression of God's taking vengeance is an Old Testament or a pagan expression and can only be consistently and intelligibly used by those who entertain the same low ideas of God as the ancient Greeks and Hebrews entertained—that is, who think of him as an irritable, jealous, and avenging potentate.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

THERE are wide and irreconcilable differences of opinion among Christians. These differences are inconsistent with the claim that the Bible is a revelation from God. Should a being of infinit wisdom make a revelation to man, he would, it is reasonable to believe, make himself understood; otherwise his communication would be no revelation at all. To reveal is to make known. Men are liable to be misunderstood because of the indefinitness of their ideas and their inability to express their views with clearness and precision, but is it possible that such a being as we are told God is has taken the pains to inspire certain individuals to write his thoughts, and has so obscured his meaning by doubtful phrases and ambiguous expressions that learned and honest men cannot agree as to what he has declared?—Underwood's Christianity and Materialism.

THE English laborer wants to know if the village rector of Mr. Forster's imagination has anything to say about justice here on this solid earth. He has heard enough sentimental cant about the joys of heaven, where he, the rector, and the squire, their earthly distinctions having vanished, are to stand round a throne, waving palm-branches and striking harps. These celestial possibilities somehow do not appeal very strongly to his dull imagination. But he is conscious of stern and disagreeable facts related to his actual daily life. He knows that he and his fathers hav been for generations uncared for, neglected, and permitted to grow up with scarcely higher aspirations than the beasts about him and often not so well housed as they. He has an idea in his dim mind that a religion which has nothing to say about iniquitous land and game laws is no religion for him. He finds that the rector has no word of rebuke for earthly injustice, but is, in nine cases out of ten, the friend and ally of some neighboring game-preserving landlord. But the son of toil needs and demands justice and progress here.

Not in Utopia, subterraneous fields—
Or some secreted island, heaven knows where!
But in the very world, which is the world
Of us all, the place where in the end
We find our happiness, or not at all.
—Wordsworth.

For these things the laborer looks in vain from Mr. Forster's time-serving priest with his usual pictures of celestial bliss.—William Clarke.

BETWEEN vague, wandering capability and fixed, indubitable performance, what a difference! A certain inarticulate self-consciousness dwells in us; which only our works can render articulate and decisivly discernible. Our works are the mirror wherein the spirit first sees its natural lineaments. Hence, too, the folly of that impossible precept, Know thyself; till it be translated into this partially possible one, Know what thou canst work at.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

"IN all the contingencies of chance and variety of action," says Jeremy Taylor, "remember that thou art the maker of thy own fortune and of thy own sin," which reminds one of the complaint of Minerva in the Odyssey: "How wanton mortals to reproach the gods; for men say that evils come from us. But they themselvs by their own folly suffer more than they need suffer."—Christian Register.

OUR bodies are our gardens; to the which our wills are gardeners; so that if we will plant nettles, or sow lettuce; set hyssop and weed up thyme; supply it with one gender of herbs, or distract it with many; either to hav it steril with idleness or manured with industry; why, the power and corrigible authority of this lies in our wills.—Shakspere's Othello, Act 1, Sc. iii.

No sadder proof can be given by a man of his own littleness than disbelief in great men.—Carlyle.

Notes and Clippings.

NEAL DOW charges that the rumsellers of Maine bribe Republican officials not to enforce the Prohibition law.

CARDINAL GIBBONS has returned from Rome, and last Sunday he spoke in Baltimore. He said that the pope has great affection for America!

SAVANNAH News: "The irreverence of some of the so-called evangelists has become nauseating. They are as familiar with the name of the deity as a cat with its kittens."

MAYOR WHITNEY, of Brooklyn, declines to appoint women on the Board of Education in that city. New York has three ladies on its board, and the result has not proven unsatisfactory.

THE fiftieth anniversary of Queen Victoria's accession to the throne of England occurs June the 28th, and that is what all the jubilation is about. The exercises at Westminster Abbey will cost $85,000.

THE Allgemeine Zeitung, a Vienna newspaper, mentions a project which has been hinted at to make Pope Leo king of Palestine under a guarantee of protection on his throne by all the Catholic powers.

THE Salvation Army recently made a raid on a Kansas town, and this is part of a circular with which they billed the village: "Smiling Belle, from Wichita, Kan., the girl who jumped out of a two-story window to get salvation, will be at the rink, April 18th, at 8 P.M. Cyclones of salvation! Tornadoes of power! Gales of grace! Celestial breezes! Collection at the door to defray expenses."

THE price for a license to sell liquor in Bushnell, Ill., is $2,000, and yet six saloon men hav applied for licenses. This, they say, represents about $12 apiece from every man, woman, and child in the town.

THE Rev. Edward H. Dutcher, Methodist, of Bedford, N. Y., has quit work and gone on strike. His salary was meager, and he declares that he will not break any more bread of life until he is better paid for it.

PROFESSOR ADLER'S Workingman's School on 54th street held its first graduating exercises last Saturday evening. Mr. Adler presided, and Mayor Hewitt sent a letter. This school combines education in mechanics with the ordinary school studies. The results hav been very encouraging.

THE late Mrs. A. T. Stewart, during the last few years of her life, built a cathedral at Garden City, L. I., at an expense of something like a half million dollars, and endowed it with $15,000 annually. The trustees of the cathedral are not satisfied with these munificent gifts, and are suing for more.

APPEARANCES indicate that Dr. McGlynn will not go to Rome in obedience to the pope's orders. He has lecture engagements up to June 23d, and if he fills them he will hav but eight days left out of the forty given him during which he must present himself in the holy city or be excommunicated.

THE New York Episcopalians hav begun taking subscriptions toward their new $10,000,000 cathedral. They hav already raised $400,000, and a committee is to choose a site at an early day. In order to draw subscriptions from all Protestant denominations, the promis is made that the cathedral will be conducted on unsectarian methods. If $10,000,000 is expended in the construction of this cathedral, there is no doubt that it will be ornamental as well as useless.

TEXAS liquor dealers are soliciting subscriptions from brewers and dealers in the North and West to combat the Prohibitionists in the coming elections. They say that unless speakers are put in the field the state is likely to adopt Prohibition by 25,000 majority. The dealers want high license and strict supervision of the traffic.

THE Chicago Express had recently this significant editorial: "D. B. Stevenson, of Paola, Kan., desires the Express to continue the publication of the Talmage sermons. To show how hard it is to please all, we will say that the Express discontinued them for the reason that hundreds each week declared that they were a disgrace to the paper."

THE following announcement was a few weeks since extensivly placarded on enormous posters in the town of Lisburn, county Antrim, where a series of Lent lectures was being given in one of the Protestant churches:

Sunday, April 3.
THE REVEREND CANON ——
"Descended into Hell."
You are all affectionately invited.

EDITOR O'BRIEN'S visit to New York for the purpose of arousing public sympathy in behalf of Ireland was to some extent a disappointment. The leaders of the Labor party here got up a parade in his honor, probably larger than he will ever see again with the same object, and prepared to giv him a rousing reception, but on account of the presence of a few objectionable persons he declined to present himself before the multitude. He was afterward banqueted and received by a few distinguished individuals, but there was no popular demonstration. Banker Eugene Kelly, however, placed $25,000 in his hands for the Parnell fund.

DURING the recent discussion by the General Presbyterian Assembly of the communion wine question, several clergymen undertook to explain the exact character of the wine used by the savior at the Last Supper. After the issue had been disposed of by the adoption of a resolution in favor of unfermented wine, the Rev. J. S. Martin, of Chillicothe, made a novel suggestion. "Having drawn the line on the wine question," he remarked to one of the brethren, "it's now in order for the assembly to determin the exact kind of stone upon which Moses engraved the Ten Commandments. It's important to know whether it was sandstone, limestone, or concrete."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

A PORTION of the congregation of the old Washington Street Methodist church in Brooklyn hav petitioned the bishop not to reappoint the Rev. C. W. Millen as their pastor. They charge that Mr. Millen has banished from the church a gospel temperance organization; that he indulges in unprofitable conversation; that he is lacking in spiritual mindedness, and that he is a victim of self-adulation. In view of these shortcomings, aggravated by the introduction of secular music and instruments into the church building, the petitioners represent that the pastor's usefulness is at an end. The congregation is divided, Mr. Millen is defiant, and the guardian angels are picking up clubs to preserve order.

Communications.

Protection to Labor.

CONCLUDED.

But the use it is possible to make of the savings of labor depends on the degree in which the whole country in which we liv diversifies and extends its industries.

The diversification of industries in its turn involves national protection by tariffs on imports, and by other means, against injurious international competition in our own markets, and in our spheres of industry.

I will state briefly ten distinct reasons why national protection by tariffs is necessary to the maintenance of a high rate of wages in this country.

First.—All values in commodities to you depend as much on the obstacles to the production of the commodity by others as they do on the facilities to its production by you. The American farmer's wheat would be worthless if there was any one point on the globe where it could be produced for nothing, and could be from thence transported instantaneously and gratuitously to the farmer's door. No shoemaker could get a nickel for his shoes if they could at any one point in the world be made for nothing, and then laid down for nothing beside the product of that shoemaker's labor. Hence all values which attach to what you produce depend not only on your facilities for producing, but on the obstacles to the production by others. To the extent that others, in Europe, India, or China, can produce for nothing, transport for nothing, and import for nothing the same thing you are producing, they can destroy all value in what you produce.

Hence, if values of labor are to be higher in this country than in foreign countries, the values of those products which they hav all of our facilities for producing must be higher; and to make the values of products higher foreign markets and our markets must be two markets, and not one and the same market, for no one commodity can hav two different prices in one market.

Labor has a price of say $1.50 in America, $1.10 in England, $0.90 in Belgium, $0.80 in France, $0 60 in Germany, $0 50 in Austria, $0.30 in Russia, $0.20 in Turkey, $0.10 in China and Japan, and $0 05 in India per day. These differences in the value of labor would all disappear if Hindoo labor could be supplied with the same facilities we are working with, and if its product could be gratuitously placed side by side with the product of our labor.

Whatever higher values attach to American labor and its products, over what attach to foreign labor and its products, are due, therefore, to the obstacles to the free introduction of the products of foreign labor, and to the obstacles to the general supplying of foreign laborers with our facilities. Free trade, by removing these obstacles, tends to throw the whole world into one market, having but one price, and thereby to destroy that very difference on which our higher values for commodities and for labor rest. Protection tends to preserve and increase these differences in value. And these differences in values constitute the whole difference between the condition of the free American laborer and the Hindoo cooly. Therefore the division of the world into different markets, having differences in their values for commodities and labor, is as essential to the freedom of the American workingman as is the government under which he livs or the air he breathes.

Secondly.—The higher rate of profits and wages, or of aggregate earnings to capital and labor, which prevail in America over what hav ever been obtained in other countries are equivalent to the fact that the same amount of effort relieves more human want and satisfies more of human desire; in short, produces more happiness and does more good, than a like expenditure of effort in any other country. This higher rate of profit and wages is the pecuniary aspect of a more rapid and vigorous rate of well doing in the industrial service of mankind. It springs partly from our possession of the largest area of new and virgin soils, and our application of machine power to the cultivation and transportation of its products; partly to the amalgamation into the American races of the highest race types of Europe, and the greatest number of them, whereby a higher type of inventiv energy and mental resource is evolved in the American race than ever before existed on earth; and partly and jointly with these two it is due to the abandonment of the policy of relying on the three or four industries which could be carried on in an imperfect way through the natural protection afforded by our cheap land, and grasping in addition the great manufacturing industries in the establishment of which tariff protection was peremptorily needed.

We could raise some corn, cotton, and tobacco without protection, just as we could hav some reading and writing without schools, and protection has in some instances, probably, imposed some tax on corn, cotton, and tobacco; but to-day five times more corn, cotton, and tobacco can be raised in the country because of our magnificent woolen, cotton, iron and steel, silk, salt, and sugar industries, than could be raised here if these industries had no existence; and but for protection these industries would to-day hav no existence whatever. Therefore corn, cotton, and tobacco, the articles for which we hav natural protection, hav grown fivefold faster under the labor of carrying the burden than they would hav grown if they had declined the burden. They are like the man who carried the calf every day till he became an ox, and found his strength so developed thereby that while, as a matter of power, he could still carry the ox, as a matter of fact and convenience the ox carried him. These vast manufacturing industries are the ox that to-day carries our farm products and our farming system over the Rockies to the Pacific slope, whereas, did they not exist, our farmers would be still limited to the eastern half of the great West. To this diversification of our industries is due their activity; out of their activity comes their high rate of profit on capital, and out of this high rate of profit on capital come the existing rates of wages. And this higher rate of profit and of wages in their turn, as a continual state of higher reward for well doing, stimulate us to continue in rendering a higher degree of service to mankind than is rendered by any similar number of persons or race of people on the globe. Hence we want protection for our labor from all the world in order that we may do most for all the world, thus merging the most enlightened self-interest in the most cosmopolitan philanthropy.

Thirdly.—The position taken by the free-traders, that whatever is profitable to each of the two parties to a trade must be profitable to the nation at large, and since the two parties to a trade would not make the trade unless each of them saw a profit in it, the fact that they make it shows that the nation at large is benefited by it, is made untrue by the fact that while each person buys or sells for money, the nation at large exchanges always goods for goods, international trade always resolving itself into barter. If one nation, as England, does not hav the goods with which to pay for the breadstuff, cotton, and petroleum we ship her, she buys coffee of Brazil and tea of China, and with those balances the account, leaving only an occasional small remittance necessary in money. Now, when trade resolves itself into barter of commodities for commodities, the expediency to us, as a nation, of importing a foreign commodity relativly to the expediency of producing it at home, contains two questions, viz., 1st. Where can we buy the commodity cheapest, abroad or at home? and 2d. Where can we, as a nation, barter the greatest number of the commodities which we produce in exchange for it?

Now, to the individual buyer of a commodity, the first of these questions is the only one that ever arises, because he, as a buyer, always pays for it in money, and never in goods. But to the nation both questions arise, because the nation pays for it in goods or becomes bankrupt. To pay for it in money would drain it of its medium of exchange, its implement of commerce, in which it can no more afford to pay for its purchases abroad than a mechanic can afford to pay his debts by handing over his kit of tools, or a farmer can afford to pay his debts by surrendering his farm. The nation therefore must inquire, when comparing the relativ expediency of importation and production, not only at what price can I buy, but with how many products can I pay in barter, if I buy abroad, and with how many can I buy at home?

Now, we will suppose John Bull is at his end of a telephone that connects with Uncle Sam's right ear, and that Uncle Sam has several telephones at his left ear, connecting with Brother Jonathan in Connecticut, and with the Hon. Timothy Buckeye in Ohio, and with Mr. Abiram Sucker in Illinois.

Uncle Sam first calls up John Bull, and says:

"John!" "All right," says John, "I'm here."

"John, my people need 560,000,000 pounds of paper every year, and they want to know where they can buy it cheapest. Can you furnish it?"

John Bull: "The Lord only knows whether I could or not. I never made more than 350,000,000 pounds of paper a year in my life. I don't make as much paper per capita as you do. What possesses you to be wanting to buy paper o' me? I might sell you a few thousand reams at a low price, but if you call on me for more than double the quantity I am now making, I can't tell where I'd be."

Uncle Sam: "Jus' so, John. Well, I only want to figure on it a little. Suppose you could furnish it, what can I pay you in? You know while our citizens pay money for paper, between you and me it's all barter of goods for goods. Now, what will you take of me if I buy all my paper of you?"

John Bull: "I can't take much more wheat, for our farmers are grumbling at what I'm taking now. I might take a little more cotton, but not much, for I'm tryin' to get my cotton, if I can, in Egypt and India."

Uncle Sam: "Wheat and cotton—why, I'm sending over so much of them now that the bigger the crop I raise the less I get for it. You wouldn't like say 50,000 shiploads o' pumpkins, would you?"

John Bull: "No, I wouldn't like no pumpkins, would you?"

Uncle Sam: "I can buy all this paper at home, and pay for it in straw, cordwood, corner lots, potatoes, lime, coal, railroad freights, timber on the stump, cattle on the hoof, cranberries, school teachin', preachin', clams, whisky, hay, or any other domestic product. How can I afford to buy it of you when you won't take anything in pay for it but cotton and wheat, and when you don't want any more of those?"

John Bull: "I havn't said you could afford to buy of me. Some of my cranks that are running the Cobden Club might hav said so, but I tell you your trade is most free when you trade with those who will take most freely what you hav to giv, and those are, of course, your home producers."

So Uncle Sam calls up his home producers, and finds that he can buy his 560,000,000 pounds of paper, and pay for it in straw, which would otherwise be worthless, in cordwood, lumber on the stump, corner lots, pumpkins, or any other of his domestic products. He finds his trade abroad a most restricted trade, because restricted in the means of barter which he can make use of in payment, while his trade at home is free trade, because he is free to pay with whatsoever commodity he can produce. Hence protection of domestic industry tends toward the highest freedom of our home trade, which must in any event form nineteen-twentieths of all our trade.

Fourthly.—A fourth economic reason why workingmen need protection by a tax to keep out the products of foreign labor, rather than to keep out the foreign laborer himself, is this: The foreign laborer, the instant he lands upon our shores, becomes in every economic sense an American laborer, a consumer of American products, and a part of that vast American demand which givs to all American commodities their value. He does not, like the imported commodity, merely displace the American labor previously in the market. On the contrary, he adds to its employment. It is only necessary that the labor migrating into this country shall distribute itself among the different employments according to the demand, as in the main it does, to continue the equilibrium between occupations previously existing. For instance, if one shoemaker is required for 300 persons, and if out of 300 immigrants only one, after he comes here, goes to making shoes, then the labor market in the shoe business would not be disturbed in the least by the arrival of 10,000,000 immigrants, because each arrival would increase the American demand for shoes in a ratio exactly equal to the increase of the American supply. Business to the shoemakers would be brisker than ever, as society in motion makes more life than society at rest. But suppose that instead of the 10,000,000 immigrants we bring in free the shoes which one in 300 of them, if a shoemaker, would make, but no immigrants at all. The demand for shoes is not increased at all, but shoes enough to supply 10,000,000 persons are thrust upon our markets from abroad without any new consumers of shoes. This does disturb the equilibrium previously existing in the shoe market. One-fifth more shoes than existing consumers want might cause a fall of two-fifths in the existing prices of all the shoes in the country; might, if it were an annual supply, throw thousands of persons out of employment, for the imported shoe goes on displacing American labor, but producing nothing and demanding nothing, unless it may be a drain of gold to Europe, from the hour it is imported to the hour it is worn out and thrown away. The imported shoemaker, on the other hand, is instantly incorporated into the great army of American producers and consumers; he is part of the demand which makes values as well as of the force which supplies them, and in the economic sense his presence here, if he is an honest, industrious man, is just as useful to the country as is the presence of any worker whose ancestors came in the Mayflower. They are, therefore, in the wrong who say, Let in the foreign commodity, but shut out the immigrant. They only are entirely right who say, Let in the immigrant freely, but shut out the commodity.

And now the economic reason why the commodity produced by American labor should be preferred to that produced by foreign labor, is that in the domestic production, suppose it to be of cloth or iron, compared with the foreign production of cloth or iron, two domestic or American capitals and two American sets of laborers are employed, viz., that which produces the cloth or iron itself and that which produces the corn or cotton or beef which is given in exchange for it, while in the case of the imported cloth or iron only one domestic capital and one set of American laborers is employed, viz., that which produces the corn or cotton which is given in exchange for cloth or iron. The capital and labor employed in producing the imported cloth or iron are foreign capital and foreign labor, i.e., located at the time of production in a foreign country where they constitute a part of the local demand for the land and food, fuel and other products, of that country, and are no part of our local demand for land or bulky products.

Moreover, in the case of the cloth or iron produced in this country, the American people hav two consumptions as well as two productions, where the imported commodity furnishes them with only one. They consume the iron or cloth, and they also consume the corn or cotton given in exchange for it. They hav just so much more of the comforts, conveniences, and necessaries of life. But in the case of the imported cloth or iron, the American people hav the consumption of the cloth and iron, but the consumption of the wheat or cotton given in exchange for it takes place abroad. A domestic production as compared with a foreign production, therefore, doubles both our home production and our home consumption. There is the same difference as between a circulation of the blood within a human being, which is life, and a letting it out upon the air, which is death. Out of this activ home production and consumption spring profits and wages; and as the division is nearly that of working on shares, the wages-earner shares with the profit-maker in the blessings of an activ societary circulation, thus placing it in his power to become a profit-maker himself.

Fifthly.—A fifth reason why a nation should protect its trade and production by tariffs on imports is because it is better and more humane to protect them in this way than to send armies into all the barbarian countries of the world to compel them to buy our goods at the point of the bayonet. It is cheaper in the long run to conquer the world by attracting their emigrants to us than by sending our armies to them. This protection to American labor is doing.

Sixthly.—Protection to American labor should be sustained because it is a sure and reasonably short road to cheapness. France proved that with beet sugar. When Napoleon decreed its protection in 1812, England got off such rhymes as this:

> Says John Bull to Bony, while we hold the cane
> You are welcome each year to get beat.

But now France can reply:

When you held the cane ours was the pain,
And you led us a lively cotillion;
That your toddies would chance to be sweetened from France
Some day was one chance in a million.
But now, you know, its a jolly go,
You can't drink the health of the queen, you know,
But protected beet sugar gets into the gin
And shows what a pickle old England is in.

Seventhly.—I would advocate protection to American industry, if for no other reason, for the political reason that it is the question of the union of these states under one government carried down to its foundations, back to its causes, out to its proper safeguards, and forward to its most sublime fruition and destiny. Historically, this union of states was formed solely in order to pass a protectiv tariff. That was the motiv. So far as free trade has wrought at all, it has wrought, with insidious wiles, to connect the South in its affections with England, and to connect the North in its interests with England, and to prevent the North and South from being bound together by both affection and interest. Our American Union is never secure so long as a pound of Southern cotton is spun in Manchester, or a ton of Northern iron or steel is brought from Birmingham. On the contrary, let the cotton crop of the South be spun and woven anywhere in this country, South or North; let our railroads now pointing Eastward be so turned that they will point Southward; develop the metal interests of the vast chains of Southern mountains, and the combined military power of all the nations of the world could not force the North and South apart.

Eighthly.—I would vote for protection to American industry because Germany, France, Russia, and even England hav not only indicated, so far as they hav steadfastly adhered to this policy, that it is in accordance with the ineradicable instincts of human nature, as well as with the harmony of economic interests in society; but when they hav departed from it, in part, as England did in 1846, in withdrawing protection from the farmers of Great Britain and Ireland, the result has been disastrous in every aspect of the case, when thoroughly examined. And I would vote for protection because the greatly-stricken nations of the world, Ireland, India, Turkey, and Egypt, hav been consigned to hideous desolation and famin by that foreign military force which prevented them from pursuing the natural, healthy, national policy. Every English colony, in the degree that is free, without a single exception, adopts the protectiv policy. New South Wales protects a a dozen products, and Victoria protects nearly everything. On the contrary, the barbarous ethics which till now prevailed among nations permit the supposed sovereign nations of China and Japan to be dragged at the car of British free trade under treaties imposed on them by military force.

Ninthly.—I would vote for protection to American labor because, much as it has already done, it has yet accomplished but half its work. We hav to find employment in the United States within twenty years for a hundred millions of people. The future industrial activity of the country must exceed the present as that of the present exceeds the stagnant life we led a century ago. We hav still a vast sugar, flax, hemp, tea, silk, and grain culture to develop. We hav plains as wide as empires to irrigate, forests that hav been wasted to restore, rivers to protect from wasteful overflow, a commercial marine to renew, and a new adjustment of Socialism and individualism as forces in society to perfect. Second not even to our system of free schools, or of manhood suffrage, or of representativ government in securing all these ends, will be the protectiv policy. And now—

Tenthly.—Maintain protection to American labor, because it is virtually the educating force for all adults of both sexes—the free school of all trades and industries—the forcing house of new inventions—the invigorating and stimulating energizer of all our undeveloped capacities. Upon the torpor of individual selfishness it comes like the influence of the sun in spring, breathing into it a life it did not know of, endowing it with a soul it did not before possess. Men move under the consciousness of this great national purpose, with a sense of common interest from Florida to Oregon, from Maine to Arizona. If it shall ever appear that there is any practical utility in the broader sentiment of being a citizen of the world, it will develop through and out of the sentiment of protection. Hitherto the pretense of desiring to weld all nations into one, and all markets into one, and all prices of labor into one, has been only the hypocritical pretext of the strong, with which to gull and destroy the weak. Already out of the protection sentiment and among protectionist statesmen is developing the new quality of international ethics—that weaker nations hav inherent rights of home rule which stronger nations must respect; that mankind is never benefited, but always cursed, when people of one race, language, or religious faith, no matter what, conquer with the strong arm, and force their officers or their laws, their merchants, their missionaries, or their manufactures, upon another; that heathen nations must no longer be compelled to dodge under the panoply of the Christian religion, as China and Japan are now hypocritically professing to do, in order to escape the terrible burden of foreign military despotism and industrial decimation and famin.

Not until the justice and wisdom of the national policy is everywhere admitted can there be international justice founded on international sense of right. I would advocate protection, therefore, in the interests of the broadest cosmopolitanism and human charity as the means of bringing about that condition of things in which man should recognize as of one blood all the nations of men that dwell on all the face of the earth. VAN BUREN DENSLOW.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

The evening previous to the starting of Captain Brown's followers from Rochester, I spent at the house of Mr. Frederick Douglass, and when ready for my walk home, Shields Green accompanied me. I said to him while on our walk, "Do you know, Shields, that by going with Captain Brown into a Southern state you expose yourself to the gallows; that if you are taken you will surely suffer all that a slave state can inflict?" He answered: "Yes, I shall probably lose my life, but if my life will help to free my race, I am willing to die. I hav suffered cruel blows from men who said they owned me. Death by the hands of the law for no offense save believing in liberty for myself and my race would not be degradation, but blows from an overseer crush into my soul!" Brave and good man! Virginia hung him by the neck till he was dead, but no amount of persuasion or threat could draw from him the name or residence of anyone who had helped him, either as a fugitiv or as a freeman, on that fatal mission. My own name was in John Brown's "carpet-bag," but Governor Wise wisely refrained from demanding that the state of New York should giv up citizens who had only abetted treason by words. Alas! that to-day free speech is treason.

The year following the execution in Virginia of those persons engaged in the Harper's Ferry massacre was one of continuous mobs in New York state. Those in Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, and Albany were perhaps the most noted. In all these cities the Republicans were in power, save in Albany. There the mayor was a Democrat, and he alone protected the meeting by the power of the law. The Republicans seemed mad upon the subject of preserving the Union, no matter how low they should be required to stoop to their lords of the South; but when the South precipitated the war by firing upon Sumter, Republican and Democrat awakened to their own degradation.

My daughter in November of 1862 was just entering her seventeenth year, and I had begun to feel that in her I should find my wishes and expectations accomplished and fulfilled. She was scholarly, and something of a genius. Her talent for sketching was marked when quite a child, and often in a company of a half a dozen she would make a picture very creditable, at least recognizable, of them all. Her great desire, however, was for the stage, but I could not encourage her in that wish, with neither father nor brother to protect her, and entirely dependent upon my daily labor for a living; and, realizing at least some of the difficulties attending that profession, I said No for the present.

The New England Woman's Medical College, situated in Boston, was at that time in operation, and my sister, Dr. A. F. Raymond, was a student there, so I concluded that that college was the best opening within my means; knowing also that a thorough knowledge of anatomy and physiology would be a great acquisition should she ever use her pencil as a profession. She was accordingly admitted as a student in the fall term of 1862. But in two weeks a telegram reached me saying, "Come; Gertrude is very sick." I reached her twenty-four hours before her reason left her entirely. She lived one week thereafter and died. Mr. Garrison and Mr. Pillsbury came to the college and tried to say words of comfort. I was very anxious to reach home with the remains before death should hav destroyed the natural look of the dear child, and so my sisters (Mrs. Clark was with me as well as Dr. Raymond) made all the necessary preparations as promptly as possible, and we took the 2 o'clock train for the West. My heart was broken, and I thought I would gladly die if only I could. I saw nothing in life for me.

When we reached Chatham, not the depot but a little way into the township, in an instant we were thrown from our seats, and the car in which we were was thrown over nearly upside down. The crash was terrific. The first word spoken was by my sister, Mrs. Clark. She said, "Lucy, if you are alive, speak." I answered, "Yes, and you are, as you can speak." I thought I wanted to die, but I found I did not, for I was working very hard to extricate myself from the broken seats and other timbers that held me fastened. The night was very dark, it was then ten o'clock, and we were some four miles from any help.

The engineer had gone down with his engin many feet, not killed, but badly hurt. Not one of all the number was dead, but the groans told of the suffering. We could not see our situation, but my sister and myself got together and worked our way out of the car.

We were on a ridge so steep that we could only keep our footing by putting our hands into the gravel and carefully pulling ourselvs onto the track. Our eyes having become used to the darkness, we were able to move about with safety. Our bruises were not very serious, as neither my sister nor myself had any broken bones.

The cause of the accident was the raising of a rail by some one or more persons who desired to wreck the train, as a regiment of soldiers was expected to take that train at some point east of Chatham. The time was some few days after General McClellan had been relieved of the command of the Army of the Potomac, and some people were ready to do a desperate act to gratify their revenge. The wreck remained on the track some four hours, and then help had been obtained, and we were again on our way.

Among the passengers was a gentleman in the garb of a clergyman; his cravat was white—such as marked a minister in those days—and his conduct was so ludicrous that I hav never forgotten it. As my sister and myself made our escape from the car we found some one was before us, and our voices showing we were of the feminin sex, he said: "Ladies, are you hurt?" We answered, "Not much." "Well, ladies, I'm very happy to tell you I'm not hurt in the least. At first I though I was, but I find I am not; but, ladies, did you see anything of my umbrella as you came through?" What a question! We had dragged ourselvs from a car overturned in the darkness, hardly knowing whether or not our limbs were left us, and that reverend, who could, without doubt, tell anyone how to escape hell, was so frightened that his umbrella had become the "one thing needful," and he required the help of two women to obtain it. After a time a little child, whose mother was hurt, was becoming frightened, and knowing that one can sometimes make friends with a child of two years of age by its appetite, I drew from my pocket some little crackers and gave them to it and the sisters older. The clergyman, observing it, and not to be outdone, said: "I left a paper of crackers in the car; if some one would go into the car and get them the children could hav them." If some one, at the risk of life and limb, would go into that car he would giv the children the crackers! No wonder such people want to be helped into heaven by and through a savior. LUCY N. COLMAN.

A Revised "Lord's Prayer."

Clipped from a newspaper about the time of the Ecumenical Council: "The following dexterous but slightly blasphemous jeu d'esprit has just made its appearance in Rome: 'Our father who art in the Vatican; Infallible be thy name; thy temporal sovereignty come; thy will be done in Europe and America as in Ireland. Giv us this day our tithes and titles, and forgiv us our trespasses as we giv plenary indulgence to those who pay penitently unto us; and lead us not into Ecumenical Councils, but deliver us from thinking; for thine is the crozier, the key, and tiara, Rome without end. Amen.'"

News and Notes.

We could only make a dash to the Yosemite, but that one supreme glimpse of grandeur and loveliness givs a fresh, poetic beauty to life, and in Nature's dearest haunt we find a glory for human toil.

We left Sacramento Monday evening, May 23d. On Tuesday morning we are at Raymond ready for the dusty stage ride of twenty-three miles, climbing three thousand feet to Grant's, where we take dinner. In the afternoon we climb Chowchilla, the first of the ranges of the Sierras. It is a magnificent ascent. Immense prospects spread before us—hills, forests, plains, the valley of San Joaquin, the glittering rivers, and, against the far horizon, the cloud-like summits of the Coast Range. Beneath us yawn enormous gulfs and defiles, thousands of feet below; and stretching away for miles, with every variety of color, are the masses of trees. Around our upward pathway sparkle the myriad flowers—the mountain pink, clover, lily, lupin, wild lilac, and rose—while bright birds wing their way through the vast chambers of the overhanging forest. Mighty cliffs tower above, about whose massiv sides we climb. We rise six thousand five hundred feet above the level of the sea. From the Summit Rock we whirl down the mountain-side five miles to Clark's, a beautiful valley two thousand feet below, in the bosom of the hills, where the Merced flows. Here we find a supper and night's rest, lulled to sleep by the musical waters of the stream and the cataract whose white banners float from the mountain side.

Wednesday morning dawns gloriously. A marvelous day is before us. Early we start in the splendid sunshine, away for the wondrous valley. We hav a good company of merry travelers. Harmony prevails, and the hours pass lightly by as we mount the second range of the Sierras, pass Lookout Point, where over the wide country we can glance almost to the ocean itself, a resplendent picture, the cañon of the Merced three thousand feet below, the river showing here and there like a fleeting diamond in the rocky base, the vast hills spreading beyond with dense forests on their sides and summits; and through wide openings the plains and valleys appear floating in the remote air like azure veils, till one can scarcely tell if it is earth or sky that glitters in the distant scene. On we go to the Enchanted Vale. At moments it is simply silence, ecstasy, as through the embowering trees new prospects greet the eye, while backward the towering cliffs extend, out of whose granit side the pathway is blasted by which we make our toilsome journey. At high noon we wait with trembling hearts for the wizard spell of Inspiration Point. We come to the edge of the valley, Mt. Moriah against us, and the Cascades; and if this were all, we would say, This is enough delight for our wearisome way. But the valley itself is not yet seen. It is to the right of us, behind a huge mound of rocks. On we go. Not a word is said, as with one electric whirl the rampart vanishes and the wondrous scene unfolds, as if dropped fresh from heaven; unlanguaged, like music itself, a symphony of color and form. Who can voice the tumultuous glory of that one rare moment? We see Nature's sweetest, sublimest face. She has woven for us her noblest drapery, and we are worshipers at her feet, children of the soil, overwhelmed with her grace, her majesty, and her beautiful terror. The picture appals, enchants. It is like a dainty cup jeweled with infinit wonders, and the sparkling wine flows ever forth, each draught an intoxication that blinds not, but reveals new glories.

Two thousand feet below the valley shines the river, flashing amid masses of grove. Bright green fields greet the eye from point to point, and dwelling-houses seem like little hives. The valley is a mile in width and nine miles long. The walls rise on either side from two thousand to six thousand feet in hight in superb and startling forms, cathedrals, spires, domes, castles, columns, arches, mingling in wild magnificence, while as if bursting from the very clouds the cataracts dash down the enormous cliffs, almost a mile in length, some of them "rivers set on end," as somebody says, and ere they reach the bottom roll into masses of spray that the wind sometimes sweeps again back over the cliff, like wavering ranks of cloud. From Inspiration Point we slowly descend. New aspects of grandeur are disclosed. The hights are more imposing. Picture crowds on picture. The hundred rocks seem to conspire to make a fresh wonder every passing moment. We go by the Bridal Veil, nine hundred feet in length, spreading its exquisit texture woven of liquid splendors in the dazzling light. On the other side, by the massiv El Capitan, glitters the Ribbon Fall, three thousand feet in length. Opposit to this, Sentinel Fall leaps nearly four thousand feet. Then the Yosemite flashes to view, largest of all, dashing in three torrents twenty-six hundred feet from its airy pinnacle. Right in front of this we come to Cook's Hotel, where we find refreshment for new toil. Being obliged to leave the next morning, we must make the most of the glowing hours. After dinner, with our sure-footed horse, we mount Glacier Point, thirty-two hundred feet above the base of the valley. This is a unique experience—a pleasing terror. We climb right up the almost perpendicular sides of the mountain. The valley is at our feet, hundreds of yards below, broadening to more majestic views as we mount the curious stairway. Forms that tower above recede beneath. A cliff overhangs the horse's head. In a few minutes he passes within a foot of its edge. We seem to be going right off into space. Our knowing animal turns of a sudden and shoots in the opposit direction. There is no use to guide him. He knows every crook. He has learned the fifty-nine zig-zags of the pathway by heart, and he can ascend or descend in the darkest night. After two hours' riding we reach the top. Here is the finest and most splendid view of the valley. The perpendicular wall of South Dome confronts, fifteen hundred feet in hight. Beyond is Cloud's Rest, crested with snow, six thousand feet above the valley. Over the iron railing we can look directly down three thousand feet. It makes the head swim, and the iron railing is a very comfortable assurance. I believe Mrs. Langtry stood outside the railing on the very edge, and gazed serenely down that awful chasm. We did not follow her example. Our head was level behind that railing, and we thought it best to keep it so. In full view, in the Upper Valley, are the Nevada Falls, seven hundred feet high, and Vernal Falls, four hundred feet high. Beyond is the Cap of Liberty, and Starr King, and all along the horizon glitter a hundred peaks of the high Sierras, covered with ice and snow. Far down is Mirror Lake, that holds in its "glittering eye" the encircling mountains. Opposit are Washington's Column, the North Dome, the Royal Arches, the Yosemite Pinnacle and Falls, the Eagle's Rest, the Three Brothers, and El Capitan. Scenes of surpassing loveliness greet the eye in every direction. In the late afternoon we descend as if into a mighty basin which the sun adorns with gorgeous gold and silver and jewels of every hue. We reach the hotel just in time to behold the moon's silver edge vanish behind the Eagle's Rest, while afar the sunset gleams on Cloud's Rest; the rainbows gather over the beautiful Bridal Veil, and the Yosemite booms on amid its sweeping columns of mist.

Up in the morning and away at six o'clock, in the glorious sunshine sparkling into the valley from a thousand peaks. At Inspiration Point we bid farewell to the transcendent vision. At noon Thursday we reach Clark's or Winona, the Big Tree Station, as it is sometimes called. The big trees are seven miles away. We visit these in the afternoon. What monsters they are, with enormous, twisting arms, towering from two hundred and fifty to three hundred and thirty-seven feet in hight. There are six hundred and sixty in all, and amid their mighty ranks we cannot realize their size. We hav to get out of the carriage and walk around in order to know how big they are. They are from twenty to thirty-three feet in circumference. We rode right through the base of one of them, and there was plenty of room for two horses and a coach with eight passengers. What a time these trees hav had of it—four thousand years of age, and every one of them burnt by camp-fires that flashed in these forests centuries ago. What a story they could tell if their murmuring branches were articulate! There are a thousand Iliads in their silent heart. These Homers are voiceless, but not inglorious. Their grandeur is more impressiv than that of the mountains, for they are mountains that hav grown and battled with the storms of years. They wear their crown by the royalty of struggle.

Back again to Clark's in the glorious moonlight evening, and a night's rest also amid the musical murmur of stream and fall.

We hav the jolly good fortune to ride from Clark's to Raymond on a "buckboard" instead of a lumbering stage, and in the refreshing morning, with glory in earth and sky, and a span of fleeting horses, down the Chowchilla we speed with exhilarating motion, while picture flames on picture from the glowing expanse, mountains above and mountains beneath, flowers filling the air with perfume and making the rocky chambers of the forest resplendent, while gorges with emerald groves stretch to the blue plain, along whose glittering bosom, like a silver necklace, the rivers seem to hang in motionless liquid brilliance. On we go; dinner at Grant's, and in the dusty evening, Friday, we reach Raymond, the thermometer at a hundred. It is one of the hot spells of California, and it makes one wilt. It is like a Boston Fourth of July. Even the midnight breeze is like the air of a furnace. We arrive in Sacramento on Saturday, not tired a bit, for in the heart of the Sierras we drank of the fountain of youth.

I found some good friends at Yosemite, and if I had known this before I should hav made arrangements for a longer stay. The only way now is to return, and this I hope to do. My friend, Albert Bruce, has a big park of six hundred and forty acres about Chilnualne Falls at Clark's, and it is a regal domain indeed; and I hope hereafter to spend some happy hours in this delightful retreat where the sweet waters make music. Mr. Bruce has been over thirty years in this country, and is a stanch Freethinker, and so are most of the mountaineers. I was in hopes to meet with our veteran Infidel friend, Van Campen, but missed him. I was pleased to meet with his son, R. A. Van Campen; also with Richard A. Fitzgerald, of the hotel, a gentleman of culture and liberality, who did all he could for our comfort as a Secular pilgrim. Among other friends are James Ridgeway, Joe Smith, H. N. Brindalson, etc. There was Steve Cunningham, who was the first to own the valley, and, with frontier enterprise, raffled it off.

The three Washburns also are genial Liberals, and it was their indomitable pluck that made these wonderful mountain roads by which the valley is so easily and pleasantly reached. Some day there will be a railroad from Raymond to Clark's—and then for a Yosemite boom! The country is full of gold and silver, besides magnificent timber, and there is a chance for big industries. I don't, however, want any railroad from Clark's to the valley. The stage-drive is too lovely and exciting to be exchanged for anything else. It is only half a day's journey, and is a fit preparation for the glory of the valley itself. Mrs. Jean Bruce Washburn, sister of Mr. Bruce, has written some poems on the Yosemite which surge with the very music of its life and beauty. She is an enthusiastic student of this wonderland, and its wild cascades and gigantic forms find beautiful and rhythmic expression in her descriptiv measures.

Thomas Hill, the artist, has his studio here, and a paradise it is of art and nature, of beautiful pictures and curiosities of this wild land. He is a genuin lover of the Sierras, and he can catch their brightest glory. He knows Yosemite by heart, and his paintings are vivid with the genius of the place. He has marvelous skill with the brush, and he can follow nature's swiftest change, and imprison her subtlest lines.

I must not forget Stevens, our stage driver, who can fill up the odd moments of travel with droll humor, and make us feel safe at every dizzy point. The stage drivers of Yosemite like to spin yarns, and they hav all sorts of fabrications for the credulous traveler; as, for instance, the romance of the hunter lost in early springtime, who for three weeks had nothing to liv on but fresh deer-tracks and snowballs; or the story of "The Dissatisfied Boy," who after half an hour's ride in the coach wanted some pie. After considerable difficulty the lunch basket was hauled out, and the pie given to the boy. Then the youthful fiend wanted a plate to eat it on. The fond mother finally procured a plate. Then the boy wanted "pa to take a bite." The pa was persuaded to do this act of kindness, after which the boy plaintivly burst out, "I want the bite that pa took." These, and legends of like character, denote the exceeding amount of human nature which stage drivers possess. There was a clergyman also of considerable vivacity among our number. I will not mention his name, for if his ministerial brethren should find out that he was a "hail fellow well met" they would try him for heresy. He has been to the Valley several times, and knows it better than he does his Bible, I guess, and that accounts for his genial humanity. They say he is quite an enthusiastic preacher, and once on a time when a rude fellow interrupted his sermon with a personal insult, he said to his congregation, "I will adjourn the services of the Lord for five minutes and whale this man," which he did to the satisfaction of all, and then finished his discourse. A bully minister that. I admire his muscle if not his theology.

I lectured Sunday evening, May 29th, at Sacramento. A Secular Union was organized, and I believe this capital of California will be one of our best points of work.

Along with N. D. Goodell, whose generosity is unbounded, and whose pleasant home has been one of my most delightful resting-places, where thought and genial spirit prevail, and the "fair humanities"—along with this splendid representativ of our cause in Sacramento I must rank also our coadjutor, Owen Thomas Davies, of Brighton. He subscribes for three TRUTH SEEKERS, and makes good use of them, and he takes all the Liberal journals, I guess, and keeps them on the round of missionary service. He knows how to knock the orthodox all to pieces on a theological argument, for he understands the weak points of his adversary. He was once a Mormon and knows the Bible thoroughly, and his information givs him many a sharp arrow wherewith to trouble the Christian. He believes in something besides talk, and made a generous contribution to the Union. He owns one of the handsomest ranches in the country, of nearly seven hundred acres. He gave me a picture of it, and it looks like quite a lively affair, with its stock, buildings, etc.

Among other Sacramento friends are Dr. Hughes. Mr. Chessley, Mr. and Mrs. John Avery, Mr. and Mrs. James Felker, George Cooper, James F. Day, E. T. Woodward, Dr. Light, Charles Robbin, David Ross, Frank Foster, Frank Sharden, Lewis Calish, etc. The Unitarian minister, Mr. Massey, is a man of broad views and generous spirit, and although he does not exactly agree with me, he is doing a work of radical importance, and for moral and intellectual purposes our friends here can heartily coöperate with him for the progress of humanity.

Our friend Butterfield was out of town the first two lectures, and I did not hav a chance to see him until the last. He is always ready, however, for the front line, and with friend Goodell, Davies, etc., will keep things lively for reform.

I was pleased to strike C. H. Dewey, an old-time Omaha friend, and one of the big business chiefs of that metropolitan city. With Creighton and Clark he owns Shoshone Falls, which, next to Yosemite, is one of the grandest attractions on the continent. Mr. Dewey was among the first discoverers of these falls. He has been all over the world, and says that nine-tenths of the people he meets in every land of intelligent people are Infidels. He is a true-blue Liberal himself, and I hope good fortune will bring us together again, for he has not circumnavigated the globe for nothing. He has traveled like the philosopher, with the insight of the skeptic.

I went to a seance Tuesday evening. I saw a multitude of spirits of all sorts. They materialized right before me. Where they came from I know not. I shook hands with some of them. They were warm-blooded and made of solid stuff. There was nothing weird or ghost-like about them. I know these spirits can eat a square meal, and I hope to be as material as they are when I get to the summerland. They danced also, quite lively. No grave clothes about that! What do I think of it? I don't know; the modus operandi is beyond my vision, but if hell itself should gape I would not believe in spirits. I wasn't built that way. I can't get beyond my five senses. They are all the intellectual capital I possess, and outside of them I hav neither credit nor cash.

I leave this day for Oregon. The Golden state is now a happy memory. I hav met hosts of Liberal friends, and my heart is grateful for their many kindnesses. I shall be in Ashland, Oregon, June 5th; Central Point, June 7th and 8th; Talent, June 12th; Coos county, June 13th to 21st; Silverton, June 22d, 23d, 24th; Salem, June 26th; Maballa, June 28th, 29th, 30th; Portland, July 3d; McMinville, July 5th, 6th, 7th; Corvallis, July 10th, etc.

Lectures at Grand Rapids.

We hav residing in this city one of the wealthiest gentlemen of the state, who is one of nature's own Freethinkers—a Materialist through and through. This gentleman, whose name is D. A. Blodgett, has imposed upon himself the task of enlightening our people, and driving out priestcraft with its superstitions, and to that end uses a goodly sum yearly of his superfluous cash. His excellent plan is this: He brings all the leading speakers here, secures the largest and grandest opera-house in the city, pays the speaker, as well as all other expenses connected with the enterprise, then invites the public, through the press, to attend free of charge. Mr. Watts has has been here on several previous occasions, delivering a course of four or five lectures each time, and has become so popular with Grand Rapids audiences that there now seems to be a tacit understanding that we must hav him here at least twice a year. Our people know and appreciate a good thing when they get it, and now that we hav found it, we must hav it; and so long as the people appreciate his efforts, Mr. Blodgett is quite content and amply repaid for the money thus expended.

Mr. Watts was introduced to an appreciativ audience Saturday night by the Rev. J. E. Roberts (Unitarian). Mr. Watts spoke upon "Man, His Origin, Nature, and Destiny." For the next three lectures I had the honor to introduce the speaker. We had two grand lectures on Sunday. Mr. Watts was at his best, as was evidenced by rounds of applause from the audience. The morning subject was, "Philosophy and Theology," and evening, "Religion or Morality—Which?" While the latter lecture would, doubtless, be better received by the popular audience, yet for the thinker and reasoner the morning lecture was, in my opinion, superior. In this lecture Mr. Watts shows his great reasoning powers, debating both sides of the question with himself. And in this lecture, as well as the one in the evening, he rose to the sublime hights of philosophy. It is true we hav but one Ingersoll, yet it is nevertheless true that we hav but one Watts upon the Secular platform. His thorough acquaintance with ancient history and familiarity with modern thought are unquestionable, and make him an easy master of the subject he undertakes to discuss. Although an opportunity was offered at the close of each lecture to anyone to take issue in short debate, or ask any question bearing upon the subject of the lecture, not one dared "lock horns" with Mr. Watts, and I do not wonder at it, either.

The last of the course was delivered at the Universalist church, of necessity, on Monday evening.

Speaking generally of these lectures, the Daily Eagle of Tuesday said: "Last night, at the Universalist church, Mr. Charles Watts closed a course of four lectures in this city, the topics being as heretofore announced in the Daily Eagle. These lectures, from one of the most eloquent, forcible, and pleasing speakers on the modern platform, were provided through the generosity of D. A. Blodgett, Esq., and were absolutely free to the public. They were a rare treat to the large audiences who heard them, for even those who do not agree with Mr. Watts's Agnostic views and conclusions, who do not accept evolution as a reasonable explanation for man's existence and future prospects, are charmed with the manner of his arguments, with his diction and logic."

Mr. Watts anticipates starting on a lecture tour through the West in October or November, when we expect him here again to lecture. Our Western friends will make a note of this, and secure his services and dates by writing to Mr. Watts as early as possible.

Dr. York in Denver.

DEAR EUGENE: Permit me to say for the eye of the Los Angeles and San Bernardino people—lest they might feel that I had forgotten their kindly assistance during nine weeks of labor among them—that this is the first time since my connection with THE TRUTH SEEKER began that any mail or money has miscarried. You may be assured that I was much annoyed at the mishap, on account of the Los Angeles people, as also on account of Brother Putnam, for whom I had deferred the letter, which contained favorable and well deserved mention of him and his valuable service to our cause in California, and also post-office order for $10—$5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $5 for Watson Heston, whom all admire for his handiwork. But such is life.

Your readers will note by this that I am still on the wing Eastward. After leaving our friends at Salt Lake in the best of spirits, we came over the Rio Grande, feasting our eyes on the most grand and beautiful scenery to be found on our continent, to Canon City, nestled down like a gem at the mouth of the great cañon through which the road passes. Here I gave two lectures to large audiences—for this little city. Our cause here is on the gain, although the dry rot of churchism shows itself on every hand—and quite recently displayed its virus by turning two of Brother Locke's children out of school for reciting Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon" and a Freethought poem. And yet these trustees thought it just to impose upon the children of Freethinkers Bible reading and other religious exercises. What an unmitigated cheek some people hav!

From Canon City our way to Denver led through Pueblo and Colorado Springs, two fine towns; and the country in this springtime is picturesque and beautiful. And of Denver it may truly be said, but few other cities in the far West present on every hand such marked evidence of rapid growth and general prosperity. It is built mostly of bright, clean brick, and with lavish display of well-kept lawns and magnificent buildings, and one is everywhere impressed with bright prospects and great things for the future of Denver.

Our cause here is promising, and in good hands, and we were made welcome by the brethren of Freethought in a most cordial manner. The Secular Union, of which Thos. J. Truss is president, and John G. Jenkins is secretary, commands the respect of the people of Denver, as is shown by the large audiences and the tone of the press.

Our meetings are being held in the mammoth rink, and the opening lecture on "Evolution and Creation" was attended by not less than a thousand people, with the promis of a much larger number next Sunday.

On next Sunday I giv my closing lecture here on "Individuality—What It Costs," and a glimpse of the unburied dead, and possibly I may giv my farewell on next Tuesday evening on "Revelation or Inspiration—Which?—and How May We Know the Human from the Divine?"

I hav been called to speak at Greeley, but must defer it until my return, when I hope to stir them up with a course of red-hot lectures.

I am glad to acknowledge the receipt of a goodly number of warm-hearted letters from the official brethren at Ottumwa, Chicago, Grand Rapids, Kent, Akron, Alliance, Pittsburgh, and Philadelphia, where we shall be in due time, as noted in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Boston Investigator, and will be glad to visit Columbus, Ohio, while passing through on our way to Philadelphia. Will some of the official brethren respond?

My address during July will be at Ionia, Mich.

Yours for all truth, J. L. YORK.

"Our Beautiful English."

I wish to say a few words to A. G. Ellsworth, who seems to rather misunderstand my position regarding the use of old, obsolete, sex words. I no more advocate the public use of those words than I do running nude upon the streets. I do not believe in shocking anyone's sensibilities needlessly. I hav no belief in saying mass or making prayers to a fetich, but if I am with those who hav, I should deprecate the doing of these things by an unbeliever in a spirit of bravado or ridicule in the presence of those who think them holy. If our friend has read C. L. James in the same paper in which his letter appears, he will see that "our beautiful English" has no words we can substitute for the tabooed ones.

Yet I agree with him that so long as the public demands their disuse, it is well to use others, even though more roundabout, and from a foreign tongue. He must remember that I used the words entirely in private, and under sacred letter seal, to those who preferred them as being shorter and more explicit. I presume my critic sometimes takes an air bath or water bath in nudity, but not in the public streets. Do friends see the point? If Ellsworth will select one word from my public writings that is immodest or obscene, I will be glad to know of it, so that I may henceforth avoid its use.

At the hearing at Lynchburg court-house, the private documents were publicly read before a roomfull of not only gray-headed old men but young men and boys. If this was done in the true interest of "suppressing vice," why are any of us doing wrong in sending out the truths in private, sealed letters to those who understand them as pure science and not as subjects for ribaldry and jokes? Now will come the public trial, where men and women will be compelled by law to hear what the law expounders may denounce as obscenity. I asked a lady here, a well-educated woman and a doctor's wife, if she would go with me to testify as to my private character here in Snowville. Her reply was, "I should die if I had to hear the trial." Now, I should despise myself if I said a word or did a single thing that would bring a blush to the cheek of man or woman. Yet the law compels and enforces people to hear what will kill a modest woman.

I stand by my record, public and private. I ask no judgment that does not take it all in, but I desire to be understood; hence this brief explanation, to which I append the following, which appeared in the Kansas Blade:

To-day you see me under bonds to appear at the bar of judgment to answer to the charge of mailing obscenity—a charge more damning in the eyes of the community than rape, seduction, robbery, arson, or even murder. But I hav never mailed a single line save in the interests of a morality so full and high that ninety-nine-hundredths of you would say it is impossible to liv up to it, though many of you claim when you cast off the mortal for the immortal you will then be just what I wish you to be here and now—pure in love and pure in life. I say what is good in heaven is good on earth, and because I hav worked for this end I am called a fanatic, and far worse. Even the workers for a clean heredity and a pure morality accuse me of going too far, though they own I hav commenced a greatly needed work, and that the world "will probably vindicate me five hundred years from now," thus tacitly admitting the value of it all.

It is hard to see friends and neighbors "pass by on the other side," and I often feel indignant as I see some of them doing this, when I so well know the true inwardness of their underground lives, and realize that beside them, as actors in the great drama of life, I stand as white as snow in comparison with deeds they hav committed against sexual purity and real cleanliness of heart. I hav inherited from a line of Quaker ancestry a natural, ineradicable habit of pure thought, that will not and cannot condone impurity or dishonesty in any form or shape. It is my honest indignation at the covered up nastiness of the would-be-believed-to-be pure and chaste that has brought me where I am. I am what I am through the inheritance of all the past. As Ewald Henry puts it in the Open Court: "Every organized being of our present time is the product of the unconscious memory of organized matter constantly increasing and dividing; constantly assimilating new and excreting waste matter; constantly recording new experiences in their memory in order to reproduce it over and over again, it was shaped richer and more perfect the longer it lived."

Thus you will see it is not I who am responsible for all the work of my brain and hands, but it is the harvest of the brain "made fertil with the deposition of my ancestors"—of blood made rich by truths planted by the centuries.

I am finding a far greater support in this "touch-me-not" work than I hoped for, even from Liberals. My life work of earnest advocacy for the true, the good, and beautiful is blooming out into blossoms of encouragement and true sympathy from thousands, which is balm and consolation to my heart. Full of a love for humanity, craving approbation as my sweetest food—save a clean conscience—I feel every cruel stab of tongue or pen, or even glance, as few can feel them. Yet never once, even though my nearest and dearest home friends and relativs are against my works, hav I faltered or wished to turn back. I see myself fined and imprisoned, and the little savings of a lifetime poured out as a libation to a vile law, and all I love most in tears of shame, despair, and horror, yet "my soul goes marching on."

They may kill me in my days of old age and physical weakness by worry and annoyance, but the seed is sown, and humanity will reap the harvest. In the words of Whitman:

Not a grave of the murdered for freedom but grows seed for freedom—
In its turn to bear seed which the winds carry afar and resow,
And the rains and the snows nourish.
Liberty, let others despair of you;
I never despair of you.

Nature's Economy.

Nature's economy is paradoxical. The vast domain of the universe is a laboratory of elements in motion. There is no resting-place for atoms or planets, and motion and life are the results. Motion and electricity may account for all the phenomena we observe. Electricity is dual; its operations are controled by affinities and repulsions.

In the midst of the drama of life we are in the midst of the work of death. Death is only another form of elements produced by motion or change of atoms. With the origin of life begins the unerring work of decay. The ceaseless work of nature goes on regardless of the pleasure or the pain resulting therefrom. The same power which adorns the curly-haired babe with the dimpled cheek of joy, and the maiden with the charms and grace of loveliness, also arms the lion and tiger with claws, teeth, and a fierce disposition to rend and tear either, as well as the defenseless hare or lamb which comes in their way. The economy of nature requires, or at least allows. the strong to devour the weak. The big fishes eat the little ones. Neither is this rendition of the maxim that "might makes right" confined to life in the waters. The chicken eats the grasshopper, and man eats the chicken. The cow devours the grass, and man devours the cow; man will even rob the cow's calf of its sustenance.

Nature requires decay and death out of which to elaborate joy and life, and these apparent contradictory conditions seem to be nearly equally divided. Neither the shrieks of pain nor the smiles of pleasure deter or encourage nature in her work. While the famishing traveler, on the dusty plain, quaffs the crystal draught with delight, the cries of the drowning crew and passengers go up from the ship sinking in the same pearly liquid. The convulsions and death of a former age prepared the coal which warms us to-day. As the mellow rays of the summer sun play over the mountain-top, dancing through the cracks of the cabin, they rest on the sweet face of a babe dying with burning fever. While the children are tripping over the lawn, full of life, childish glee, and happiness, grandpa is passing through the agonies of death and dissolution in the bed-chamber.

The splendor and luxury of wealth are neighbors to squalid poverty and want. There is no design in nature, or if there is, it is only to sap man's happiness and thwart his pleasure. Design is the result only of man's genius. A city nestles at the foot of a slumbering volcano, when suddenly, and without warning, an eruption ensues, destroying the city and its people without mercy. Again, a town in a western plain resembles a beehive of industry, when in a few hours the fearful cyclone passes that way and leaves it a mass of ruins.

The elements of nature, acting and reacting on themselvs and on each other, produce life and death; her laboratory is a hive of affinities and repulsions, building up and pulling down, beautifying the lily and rendering the gorilla hideous; erecting the mountain masses and engulfing islands and continents. And these paradoxical processes go on with equal diligence, showing no preference one way or the other.

The writer lied who said that "every prospect pleases and only man is vile." There is as much that is repulsiv and noxious in nature as pleasant and enjoyable. The reign of law is supreme. Call it the power of God, or what you will, its changes ring on now as ever, despite your prayers or your curses. There exists as much, if not more, pain than pleasure, as much darkness as light, as much shadow as sunshine, as much vice as virtue, and as much cold as heat.

For aught we know the valleys are as deep as the mountains are high; there may be as many liquid substances as solids. The philosophy of the ancients discussed the properties of only four elements, earth, air, fire, and water; now there are known to be about seventy simple substances. Of these fifty-eight are metals, five are gases; the remaining seven are chiefly solids. The various combinations of the solids and liquids, the metals and the gases, resemble the combination of letters into words, and the formation of words into language. Their name is legion.

Electricity, one of the most subtle powers with which we are acquainted, appears to pervade everything, and may yet be found to be the source of life as well as the cause of death.

The air we breathe, forcing the crimson tide of health and strength through our veins, if impregnated with too much oxygen, increases the impetus of the vital powers, wears the machinery too fast, and death results. An increased proportion of nitrogen, which comprises twenty-one parts in one hundred of the atmosphere, would produce an opposit result, which would also end in death. While the inhabitants of the torrid zone are scorched with tropical heat those of the polar regions are freezing with cold.

Some fruits, vegetables, and berries are palatable and nutritious, while others are poisonous and produce death. All animals are fierce and vicious in their natural or wild state; their association with man is alone what makes them tame and gentle. Man himself is an animal of varying passions, sometimes kind and loving to his fellows, at other times he exhibits a deadly hatred toward his kind. At times he sympathizes with the woes of the suffering, offering food and drink to the famishing; again he invents murderous implements with which in war he deluges the earth with human blood. And, in fact, when man is in an uncivilized state he will devour his enemy at breakfast. The burning sands of the desert are scorched with drouth, yet the freshet of waters in other places carries terror and destruction before it.

In accordance with the general policy of nature, the church and its priesthood picture before us a God of infinit love and mercy, or of implacable hatred and tyrannical cruelty and vindictivness—it is difficult to tell which—and as a finishing touch portray the devil as a monster of equal or greater power. This priesthood also portrays the elysian fields of a heavenly Eden, as well as the dismal regions of an antipodal hades. It is a relief, however, to know that these are only ideal creations, existing only as myths and superstitions of the past. They are purely man-made gods, devils, heavens, and hells. The Christian worships while the Infidel scoffs, the saint prays while the sinner curses. The Christian pays his devotions to Jesus; the Mohammedan bows to the east at sunrise, invoking the blessing of Mohammed; and the Eastern worshiper kneels at the shrine of Confucius or Buddha. And while this religious jargon is going on, the sun continues to shine, the winds to blow, the rains to fall, and the planets to whirl, with total indifference to man, his whims, his superstitions, his gods, or his devils. Again, while flowers exhale delightful perfumes, decaying animal matter givs off offensiv odors—dead human beings the most offensiv of all.

Nature by mysterious processes produces sour as well as sweet fruits from the same orchard planted in the same soil. The honey-bee extracts golden nectar from excrement and dead carcasses as well as from the petals of flowers. Sons and daughters of the same parentage often exhibit great and opposit diversity of temperament, complexion, and disposition.

Change is indelibly written on every atom of matter. A volume would not suffice to contain the history of a pebble; its history would be part of the planet. A million of years would not measure its chronology. The chalk cliffs of Europe are but the remains of countless myriads of minute animals.

The stupendous masses of limestone that soar upward in the mountain peaks were once living beings. The coral islands which dot the oceans were begun centuries, yes, thousands of centuries, ago, by small insects. Fossil remains of their work are found in our own lovely East Tennessee valleys.

The writer has seen bushels of water-worn pebbles on top of Cumberland mountain, near Jacksboro, at least 1,500 feet above sea level.

The mind is lost in wonderment when contemplating the mighty upheavals which gave birth to continents and mountains, forcing the waters to their present borders. The great Mississippi valley at no very remote date was an inland sea; to-day it is teeming with life and wealth. The brilliant, sparkling diamond, so highly prized in the lady's breast-pin, in another form is pure carbon, and black as the ace of spades. The particles comprising the writer's body may hav once been component parts of the huge ichthyosaurus, or may hav winged the air in the monstrous pterodactyl, with its twenty-seven feet spread of wings.

Most of nature's processes are slow and gradual; her operations are generally marked by periods; however, earthquakes, eruptions of volcanoes, and tornadoes come suddenly and without warning.

The epochs of geology are distinctly marked periods; the convulsions of earthquakes are sudden and awful interruptions of the usual work of nature. The earthquake of 1755 extended its influence over one-twelfth of the surface of the globe. The city of Lisbon was destroyed with its sixty thousand inhabitants. The earthquake of Calabria, Italy, 1783, lasted two minutes, but destroyed one hundred thousand people. We fail to see any benevolent design in such wholesale slaughter of unsuspecting victims.

The mistake of the church consists in supposing death to be accidental instead of being the result of law. The violation of moral law does not nor cannot entail physical death on posterity only in so much as it affects the physiological idiosyncrasies of the race.

The work of "creation" is going on now as much as it was in the fabled "beginning" of Mosaical cosmogony. The human mind cannot conceive of either the "beginning" or annihilation of matter. Miracles did not, do not, and cannot occur. The supernatural exists only in language and in the brain of enthusiasts and dreamers. While the land on shore and coast lines is gradually emerging from the water of the oceans in some places, it is as gradually subsiding in other localities. There is a constant fluctuation as regards level.

The igneous rocks of to-day may hav been the aqueous and chemical formations of a previous epoch or age. The precious metals of to-day may hav been the grosser particles of a former age purified and refined by the igneous action of later times. This gradual elevation and subsidence which is going on all the time, and the sudden upheavals and depressions caused by earthquakes, volcanoes, or similar convulsions, account for all the diversities of the landscape; the sublime grandeur of the mountain peak as well as the quiet loveliness of the dell. Large tracts of land, which in the days of the Pharoahs were very fertil, containing magnificent cities and temples, are now buried by sand from the Lybian desert. The winds transformed the garden of one period into the desert of another and later one.

The action of frost and fire are alike destructiv as well as perpetuating to human happiness and hopes. Nature, so to speak, "blows hot and cold" on our labors and most earnest efforts.

By the time a man gets ready to liv he has to get ready to die. It is a struggle for existence; life is "a mixed pickle." We know not why the ice glacier moves onward, no more than we know why the lava is thrown upward from the volcano. The force exhibited in both of these manifestations of nature's handiwork is beyond human comprehension. To add to the mysterious phenomena of glaciers it is only necessary to remember that they are not confined to the frigid zones; moreover, volcanic action is, and has been, manifested nearly all over the face of the earth. Traces of the work of glaciers are found in the northern part of the United States.

While icebergs float into warmer latitudes, melt, and deposit their imbedded freight of rocks and earth, forming submarine mountains, plains, and valleys, composed of material different from all else in the vicinity, the volcano is changing the appearance of the landscape equally as much, and in an entirely different manner.

In a general way nature works in epochs, ages, or periods. This view has led to the nebular theory of the origin of matter, and its consolidation into globular, planetary shape. We hav the periods of orbitual planetary revolution, the succession of the seasons, day and night, gestation, and the tides. In like manner the geological formations of the earth's crust seem to hav been arranged in layers corresponding to important changes on the surface. Thus there is supposed to hav been a time when there was no life, known as Azoic; then came life in its lowest forms, termed Paleozoic, or ancient life; then, as more favorable conditions appeared, the ponderous animals of the Mesozoic had their sway; and all along the periods of the past the tendency has been towards "cephalization," as Dana calls it, or to the development of brain-power, which finds its climax in man.

The zenith of the animal kingdom has passed. In support of this assertion we need only to refer to an article in a recent issue of the Tacoma (W. T.) Daily Ledger, which givs a description of mammoth remains found in Spokane county, W. T. One of the horns was ten feet and one inch long, and twenty-four inches in circumference, weighing one hundred and forty-five pounds. A tusk measured twelve feet nine inches in length, and weighed two hundred and ninety-five pounds. The molar teeth weighed eighteen pounds each; some of the ribs were eight feet long. The pelvic arch was six feet in diameter, or large enough to admit a man. This huge monster was eighteen feet and six inches high, and its weight estimated at twenty tons, or the capacity of an ordinary railroad freight car. Yet, perhaps, its enjoyment of life was no keener or sweeter than that of the ant, bug, or mouse which it mercilessly crushed beneath its ponderous tread.

The ocean is salt, and often presents the paradoxical spectacle of human beings famishing with thirst when wrecked on its vast, billowy bosom. It does not acquire its saltness from saline beds at its bottom, but from soluble mineral washings from the land. Inland seas are more strongly impregnated with salt than the ocean, and, strange to say, the salt quality disappears when an artificial outlet is provided. Of the conditions of time and power necessary to produce all these wonderful changes and phenomena, the mind can form no adequate conception.

Were an opinion a personal possession of no value except to the owner; if to be obstructed in the enjoyment of it were simply a private injury, it would make some difference whether the injury was inflicted only on a few persons or on many. But the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth; if wrong, they lose what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth produced by its collision with error.—Mill.

The Growth of Religion.

No one animated by the spirit of truth—that is, who has desired to know the truth about the origin and history of religion, and has honestly given his attention to the inquiry—can fail to see that what we call Christianity, in the shape we hav it, has been a growth. Through the centuries, wherever it has been believed and taught, its zealous devotees hav in their enthusiasm drawn largely on their imaginations and marvelousness in order to represent its wonderful excellence and its claims to the supernatural. They hav magnified and exaggerated its power over our human nature in such extravagant and unnatural terms that the common vocabulary could not supply the words to express their admiration. The language of common life was barren of suitable epithets to extol its marvelous and superhuman qualities.

The earlier writers, the fathers of the church, were Greek scholars, but they were not of the philosophical class, for but few of the philosophers gave the new faith any attention, nor had they much confidence in those who espoused it. The fathers were learned, but they were more credulous, and most of them were victims of, or in sympathy with, the popular superstitions of their times. Hence in their ardor for the new sect, and in their desire to win converts to it, they did not scruple to ransack legend and myth for adjectivs and titles with which to popularize and immortalize it. Ecclesiastical history and church literature are made up of this mythological and idolatrous style of composition.

Some of these earlier writers of the Alexandrine school were particular to state that the language they used was simply allegory, and must not be taken or understood in any literal sense; that, while they used the popular style, they were aiming to convey to the minds of the people the great principles and truths in nature which were fundamental and eternal.

But the more vulgar demand was for mythology, for the marvelous and supernatural; so the people took the allegories and fables of the philosophers for facts and history, and condemned all who refused to do so as heretics and Infidels. This accounts for the anomaly in our day of all religious literature and popular faith retaining these Greek allegories as literal. The later fathers so taught and left to us their records, creeds, and beliefs.

Religious teachers of all sects and of no sect, claiming to be Christians, hav had no alternativ but to take these ancient writings as literal, and not as the figures and allegories for which they were written and intended. The modern religious enthusiasts are like their prototypes; they will use these fables as facts, and insist on all believing them as such if they wish to be considered religious. They claim they must use them, they must believe them, for there is no such a thing as religious belief without them. Religion, they say, cannot be taught or believed, nor can the mind contemplate it, without these idolatrous terms.

Everyone now who sees religion in the original, as the few earlier intelligent writers understood it, and intended to teach it through their allegories, must be impressed with the magnitude of the fraud so long imposed upon the people. In the earlier ages, among the barbarous and illiterate, there may be found some excuse for it. It was to them the substitution of one form of idolatry for another. If it had not all the visible idols to reverently adore, it had all the imagery and picturesque descriptions and titles, the glowing achievements and conquests of the Christian divinities and canonized saints. It was substituting a superstition that appealed to the imagination, to the ideal and supernatural, for one that was addressed to the senses.

Christianity can never be generally accepted, nor can it hav any influence for good over the minds of those who say they believe it, while it is taught with its present corruptions and obscurities. As now received, it cannot impress the mind of the intelligent truth seeker as in any sense true. The masses of the intelligent are becoming alienated from it. They know it is not what it should be to command the respect of honest people. It is not understood; it is therefore looked upon by them as something foreign to human needs or interests. The thoughtful either oppose it or let it and its deluded advocates and adherents alone, claiming what they willingly award to others, the right to private judgment and liberty of conscience in religious belief.

The ages of the Christian fathers, in which Christian literature originated, constituted a period when abstract thought or scientific reasoning was comparativly unknown. There were then learned men who were engaged in speculativ philosophy. They were captivated with what was plausible and apparent, more than inspired with a desire to know the absolute truth. Testimony, instead of positiv demonstration, was taken for authority. Science as explained and understood now was then the unfathomed mysteries of nature. As everything was taught in parables, pictures, allegories, and fables, that style has been preserved and has come down to us. If we do not know this, and if when we read religious literature we fail to read and interpret it in this light, we cannot comprehend it; we may say we believe it, but we do not understand it. This error has been indulged in to the extent that it is by some considered a credit, and an evidence of Christian excellence, for us to avow that we believe what we do not understand. Doing this has transformed ignorance and error into the virtue of piety. They would think it heresy, if not blasphemy, for us to read the fathers as they themselvs said they wanted us to read them, and use terms and names as they used them—as figures and personifications, and not in any sense as literal facts or personages. So long as we use any of the figures, titles, qualities, and virtues of Greek divinities, the terms Holy Ghost, Holy Spirit, Blessed Spirit, Our Lord, Our Savior, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, Holy Angels, Messiah, the Anointed One, the Lamb of God, the Divine Light, the Word, as in any sense representing an image, a personality, a form or thing, having any attributes, properties, or endowments as individual existences, then we are in our conceptions yet under the delusions of the idolatry of our superstitious ancestors.

There are, it must be admitted, a small number of sincere believers in what is called the Christian religion who are living and will die with a fervent faith in the reality of all these myths as supernatural entities; and who think this belief makes and keeps them good, and that without it they would not nor could not be religious; that they would be wicked Infidels, aliens and sinners, and without God and without hope in the world; that they would be miserable, lost wretches, unworthy of salvation and of heaven. They think this heathen faith is the source of their greatest earthly comfort, and of their assurance of God's love and mercy, and of all they hav in this life worth living or dying for. Once charmed and fastened under the dominion of this faith, their minds are so subjugated and enslaved by it that no light nor reasoning, nor even self-evident truth, can be appreciated by them, nor in any measure release them from the degrading spiritual bondage.

A faith in these ghostly phantoms affects the mind and moral sense not unlike the gradual introduction of an insidious narcotic poison into the body. At first it produces a stimulating, exhilarating sensation, adding another enjoyment to, and thus increasing by its novelty, the pleasures of existence. The unsuspecting victim, judging from his feelings, is assured that he has found a new solace and comfort to increase the value of life. The drug being an enemy to the healthy bodily organs, it gradually poisons and perverts them from their normal action into the abnormal one of conforming to and assimilating with an enemy. Thus insidiously the integrity of the organism is destroyed, the physical strength and activity paralyzed; yet the unconscious victim remains confident of the great virtue of the drug, and ascribes his infirmities and failures to some other cause, or to the decrees of providence, who, for some good end, in his inscrutable wisdom, has seen fit to visit them upon him. It is just so with those whose minds hav become perverted by this ancient heathen faith in demons and ghosts, under the varied names and titles already enumerated. They do not care to inquire or to know the origin and history of their belief. They hav gradually taken into their minds the heathen idea they call God, and with it all the other personifications who, as ghosts or spirits of some degree in the divine hierarchy, execute the purposes and functions of the different offices allotted to each of them in the creation and salvation of man.

Our brethren and sisters who are reveling in this faith, who are so happy, so safe, and so secure in the folds of the father's love, and hav such assurance of their salvation and of his care and presence in the eternal future, do not know that they derive all this fictitious and unwholesome exhilaration from the narcotic poison of error, of positiv, flagrant falsehood, operating on the mind and feelings, perverting and destroying all healthy, normal mental integrity, and producing this morbid sense of religious enthusiasm cherished as divine and direct from God. The evils of this faith are ruinous to the whole character. When the mind is enslaved by them there is very litttle hope of any progress or usefulness of the individual. Bigotry, uncharitableness, impatience, and intolerance are the outgrowth of these corrupting falsehoods, as the history of the church furnishes abundance of evidence in its wholesale persecutions and slaughter for nearly a thousand years. And nothing but light and intelligence has banished most of this religious cruelty, and protects us from its inflictions to-day. Now the poison of this wretched faith is working out a milder form of cruelty, through vituperation and epithets of "Infidel" and "heretic," with a view of destroying character, standing, and influence.

This is an advance from barbarism. It is progress, and in it there is great hope for the future. As light becomes diffused, the world will be redeemed; superstition supplanted by science, error by truth; and bigotry and intolerance will yield to sentiments of love and charity, and the feelings of a universal brotherhood.

The Liberty of Thought and Discussion.

JOHN STUART MILL "ON LIBERTY."

If all mankind minus one were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would be no more justified in silencing that one person than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind.

There is the greatest difference between presuming an opinion to be true because, with every opportunity for contesting it, it has not been refuted, and assuming its truth for the purpose of not permitting its refutation. Complete liberty of contradicting and disproving our opinion is the very condition which justifies us in assuming its truth for purposes of action; and on no other terms can a being with human faculties hav any rational assurance of being right.

Wrong opinions and practices gradually yield to fact and argument; but facts and arguments, to produce any effect on the mind, must be brought before it. Very few facts are able to tell their own story without comments to bring out their meaning. The whole strength and value, then, of human judgment depending on the one property that it can be set right when it is wrong, reliance can be placed on it only when the means of setting it right are kept constantly at hand.

The man [Christ] who left on the memory of those who witnessed his life and conversation such an impression of his moral grandeur that eighteen subsequent centuries hav done homage to him as the Almighty in person, was ignominiously put to death as what? As a blasphemer. Men did not merely mistake their benefactor; they mistook him for the exact contrary of what he was, and treated him as that prodigy of impiety which they themselvs are now held to be for their treatment of him.

The high priest who rent his garments when the words were pronounced which, according to all the ideas of his country, constituted the blackest guilt, was in all probability quite as sincere in his horror and indignation as the generality of respectable and pious men now are in the religious and moral sentiments they profess; and most of those who now shudder at his conduct, if they had lived in his time and been born Jews, would hav acted precisely as he did. Orthodox Christians who are tempted to think that those who stoned to death the first martyrs must hav been worse men than they themselvs are, ought to remember that one of those persecutors was St. Paul.

No Christian more firmly believes that Atheism is false, and tends to the dissolution of society, than Marcus Aurelius believed the same things of Christianity; he who, of all men then living, might hav been thought the most capable of appreciating it. Unless anyone who approves of punishment for the promulgation of opinions flatters himself that he is a wiser and better man than Marcus Aurelius—more deeply versed in the wisdom of his time, more elevated in his intellect above it—more earnest in his search for truth, or more single-minded in his devotion to it when found—let him abstain from that assumption of the joint infallibility of himself and the multitude which the great Antoninus made with so unfortunate a result.

The beliefs which we hav most warrant for hav no safeguard to rest on but a standing invitation to the whole world to prove them unfounded. If the challenge is not accepted, or is accepted and the attempt fails, we are far enough from certainty still; but we hav done the best that the existing state of human reason admits of; we hav neglected nothing that could giv the truth a chance of reaching us; if the lists are kept open, we may hope that, if there be a better truth, it will be found when the human mind is capable of receiving it; and in the mean time we may rely on having attained such approach to truth as is possible in our own day. This is the amount of certainty obtainable by a fallible being, and this the sole way of attaining it.

No wise man ever acquired his wisdom in any mode but by keeping his mind open to criticism of his opinions and conduct; nor is it in the nature of human intellect to become wise in any other manner. The steady habit of correcting and completing his own opinion by collating it with those of others, so far from causing doubt and hesitation in carrying it into practice, is the only staple foundation for a just reliance on it; for, being cognizant of all that can, at least obviously, be said against him, and having taken up his position against all gainsayers—knowing that he has sought for objections and difficulties, instead of avoiding them, and has shut out no light which can be thrown upon the subject from any quarter—he has a right to think his judgment better than that of any person, or any multitude, who hav not gone through a similar process.

The Queer People Across the North River.

New Jersey is a state mighty hard to please, and what suits the people of one town will not be tolerated in another.

When C. B. Reynolds set up his canvas tabernacle in Boonton, to preach the gospel of Freethought, he was stoned, his tent ropes cut, he was threatened with a ducking in the canal, arrested, and finally tried, convicted, and fined twenty-five dollars and costs, which Col. Robert G. Ingersoll paid for him. All this was taken as an indication that the Jerseyites did not love Freethinkers, and wanted nothing but Christianity preached to them.

Some time ago, the Rev. Mr. Switzer and the Rev. Mr. Mnason went down to Park Ridge, N. J., and set up a tent, in which to hold revival services, to the end that the devil might be overthrown and the people of that township rescued from his clutches. Messrs. Switzer and Mnason continuously prayed, sang, and preached, beseeching the people to turn from their sins and seek salvation. Their exhortations were of a general and particular nature, and various people of the place were pointed out as hindering the Lord and helping his adversary. This has been going on for some time, but, strange to say, it did not please the inhabitants of Park Ridge. They therefore warned the reverend gentlemen to cease accusing them of being sinners, just as the Boonton Christians warned Mr. Reynolds to withhold his information that the Boonton people were not sinners. They went even further in paralleling the action of the Boonton Christians. Mr. Reynolds was stoned; so were Messrs. Mnason and Switzer. Mr. Reynolds was reviled; so were the revivalists. The Boonton Christians threatened to throw Mr. Reynolds into a canal; the Park Ridgers threatened to tar and feather Messrs. Mnason and Switzer, there being no canal handy, and tar plenty and feathers being cheap. Finally, the end came to the revivalists' services just as it did to the lectures of Mr. Reynolds. At daylight of the morning of the 6th instant the tent lay flat upon the ground, the guy ropes cut, covering a miscellaneous assortment of overturned benches, broken lamps, prostrate platform, and other débris. Around it slowly gathered the revivalists, with shouts of "Glory to God!" and "Hallelujah!" and "Praise God from whom all blessings flow." The actions of the revivalists, however, differ somewhat from the conduct of Mr. Reynolds. Instead of singing, "Praise God!" he swore out a warrant for the arrest of the guilty parties. The religionists laid the destruction of the tent at the door of the devil. Mr. Reynolds rightfully placed it upon the shoulders of the Christians. The revivalists hav made no effort to repair the tent, saying they are in God's hands; Mr. Reynolds went to work, repaired his tent, and made himself useful out in Pennsylvania.

It only remains now for the Christians of Park Ridge to arrest the revivalists for blasphemy—and we assure them that the stuff preached by revivalists is more blasphemous than the lectures of Mr. Reynolds—and fine them twenty-five dollars and costs. The reputation of New Jersey cannot suffer since the conviction of Mr. Reynolds, and if her Christian inhabitants continue to exhibit their real natures, the Andover board may be induced to giv the heathen a rest and send their missionaries across the North river. The good old hell-fire and brimstone preaching will do for New Jersey, for the second probation doctrin would pass the comprehension of her people.

A String of Whens.

When good old Socrates sought to reform the current superstitions of his day, he was charged with designing to corrupt the youth of Athens, and was given his choice to drink a fatal dose of poison or to slay himself with a dagger. He took the poison.

When Jesus Christ offered the Jews a religion which he argued was superior to the one with which they were then afflicted, he was crucified as a blasphemer.

When Giordano Bruno ventured to point out that the earth was neither flat nor the center of the solar system, he was put to death as a heretic by order of the pope.

When Galileo had the temerity to suggest that, after all, Copernicus may hav had some reasonable grounds on which to base his astronomical theories, the Roman Inquisition imprisoned him and kindly allowed him to choose whether he should recant or be cremated. Under the circumstances, he chose to recant.

When Michael Servetus expressed the belief that a son could not naturally be as old as his father, he was put to death by John Calvin without the shedding of blood, i.e., he was burnt at the stake.

When, a few centuries later, Abner Kneeland defined his conception of the deity as different from that of certain Christians, he was lodged in jail for the offense.

When, in England, Messrs. Foote, Ramsey, and Kemp illustrated their paper with religious subjects, they met the same fate as the preceding.

When D. M. Bennett mailed a book advocating a morality which the author conceived to be superior to that practiced by Christian clergymen, a year in prison and a heavy fine were required to solace the offended brethren of the cloth.

When Dr. E. B. Foote sought to teach the world an economy at variance with that of Christian sociologists, it cost him five thousand dollars for his experiment.

When an ex-preacher told a New Jersey congregation that, in his judgment, the creator of the universe had not worn diapers within the historic period, he was mobbed and violently assaulted, and his tabernacle was wrecked; he was arrested as a blasphemer, tried, convicted, and fined according to the statute in such case made and provided.

Whenever any reformer has tried to change the opinion of his fellow-men, it has cost him his reputation.

When Garrison advocated the abolition of African slavery, he was asked if he would like to see his daughter marry a nigger.

When a Catholic priest named McGlynn, of contemporary fame, denied the right of an Italian Bourbon to say what political opinions an American citizen should hold, a certain labor party, in convention assembled, passed a resolution characterizing him as an Atheist.

When somebody opposed the Comstock law as unconstitutional, he was denounced as one who desired to open the floodgates of immorality, and corrupt the youth of our land with obscene literature.

When another person said that he did not believe one man had a right to determin what another man should take as a beverage, he was charged with advocating intemperance in the use of alcoholic liquors.

When a well-meaning editor noted that a conviction, found after trial in a case in which the judge admitted that the accused were not guilty as charged in the indictment, was not a sound one, he was told to go his ways for an Anarchist.

From all of which it will be seen that the penalty for free discussion has gradually become lighter; and from which also may be gathered the conclusion that the time will come when a citizen of the world may express his belief upon any and all subjects without risking his life, his liberty, his fortune, or his sacred honor.

A Horrible Result of Sectarianism.

One of the most shocking effects of too earnest Christianity occurred in Pittsburgh, Pa., on Tuesday, June 6th. Frederick Herman, a steel worker, lived at Mt. Washington with his wife and three children. Herman was of a morose disposition, and, notwithstanding his piety, frequently quarreled with his wife, a patient little woman, and occasionally beat her. One of the most fruitful causes of these quarrels was the difference in religious views, Herman being a Lutheran, and his wife a Catholic, and they could never agree about the sect in which the children should be trained. By superior physical force Herman had the children baptized into the Lutheran church, and the wife seemingly acquiesced.

About four weeks ago, however, Mrs. Herman concluded to hav the youngest, a daughter, baptized in the Catholic church, and did so, concealing the fact from the father. By some means, on the 6th instant, Herman learned of the circumstance, and at once stopped work and went home. Pleasantly calling his wife to him he took her upon his knee, and said, as the account states: "I heard to-day that you had Elizabeth baptized again. Is it true?" Mrs. Herman did not answer, so he clutched her fiercely, repeating his query. Mrs. Herman became terrified, and broke away from him, jumping through a window. Herman leaped after her, and chased her down the sparsely-settled street. In front of a Mrs. Wolfgang's house Herman caught his wife and threw her down in the gutter. Standing with a foot on each side of the prostrate woman, Herman pounded her in demoniac fury with bricks and cobble stones, until she lay perfectly still, with blood flowing from numberless wounds. When he supposed she was dead he left her, and ran rapidly back to his own house. After lying in the gutter for a few minutes Mrs. Herman arose and staggered across the road, falling every few feet, as though she were dazed. She moaned terribly. She went on down the lane, falling and rolling over, and getting up again, and falling again. Meanwhile Herman returned to his home, and went upstairs to where the little babe, Elizabeth, about which all the trouble had been, lay quietly sleeping in its cradle. He lifted it out and with a razor cut its throat. Then going to one of the windows, he looked out, and drew the razor across his own throat.

In the basement of the house lived another family, named Kissner. Happening to go to the door, Mrs. Kissner looked up and discovered Herman. She called to her husband, and he rushed to Herman's door, where he was met by the fiend, who gasped, "Lord, forgiv me for what I hav done." Mrs. Herman was placed upon a bed down-stairs, and her injuries attended to. The babe was dead. Herman was past aid, and his death but a matter of minutes. He was put upon a bed, and at once asked for the pastor of his church. When the Lutheran preacher arrived, Herman made signs for paper and pencil, and when given them, wrote:

"I hav struggled as long as possible. She promised to be true. She has broken this promis, and has not told me, and I found out that she lied until the elder son was born. Rev. Brant knows all. Had she told me that she had the child rebaptized, we could hav consulted together. The Lord hav mercy on me. Lord bless the Evangelical church; long may she prosper. God bless my children and giv them peace. Greetings to my friends and brethren. A man named Feucht shall adopt my children. Let them remain Evangelical Lutheran. The reverend father shall interest himself in their welfare. I will willingly die. My child is with me. Adieu."

At short intervals he penned these messages:

"The Evangelical Lutheran Orphan Asylum. God bless them. I desire that my two boys go to that institution."

"My child that I took with me shall be with me in my grave, not in the Catholic burying-ground. That is my last wish."

"Adieu. I hav reached my end. I must die. Adieu. My wife shall be forgiven, she is responsible as much as the others. She will not always liv Catholic; that is my last wish."

"My wife is not at all good enough to train the children. Place them in the Evangelical Orphans' Home. Adieu."

When too weak to write he asked for a German hymn-book, and turning the familiar pages with bloody fingers, he stopped at the hymn he wanted, which the minister read. Then he slowly sank into death. His wife may recover.

This tragedy is the plain result of religion. The man was not insane; he was religious, and but followed the teachings of the churches in placing his religion above all else in the world. He was an honest sectarian, believing that there is but one road to heaven, and that one through his church. For this belief the church was responsible, for Herman was ignorant, and followed blindly his spiritual leaders. Had he been taught that kindness and love to his family, a happy home and merry children, were of infinitly more importance than any belief about God and a future world, the tragedy would never hav been. The Christian religion is directly responsible for the lives of this man and his babe, and for the fiendish attack upon the mother. Any religion which puts heaven above the earth would hav the same effect upon such a nature as that possessed by Herman, and therein lies the iniquity of all intense religions. Better a thousand times that men should never hav heard of religion than that such infernal deeds should be committed as a consequence of possessing it.

The Work of Christians.

It's a fine state of affairs that prevails in a portion of this country now!

Down in Washington a druggist has been tried for doing business on Sunday, and the District Commissioners are gravely considering whether ice and milk can be legally sold in the national capital on Sunday! One law resurrected is a Maryland statute of 1723!

Up in Connecticut local trains are stopped on Sunday, and a Puritan quiet prevails!

Here in New York men are arrested and held to bail for running a sewing-machine on the first day of the week! No one can purchase any useful article on Sunday afternoon, and hotel-keepers are arrested for selling wine to their guests! Meanwhile New Yorkers who will hav their liquor are going in thousands to New Jersey—where they fine Infidels twenty-five dollars and costs—and getting drunk as lords!

Prohibition Barebones are shouting, "Praise God!" and the rest of the church folks are howling in glee! They think they hav got the country in their tyrannical grip.

These Sunday laws are infamous infringements of personal liberty. Their enforcement is tyranny of the smallest and meanest kind. But we hope the Christian legislativ hypocrits will turn the thumbscrews down till the blood flows, when the people may get angry enough to demand the repeal of religious laws.

Running Down.

The American Tract Society, located in this city, acknowledges that its business has fallen off one-half within the past fifteen years. The officers of the society explain this decline by saying that denominations hav gone into the tract business on their own account, and no longer purchase supplies at headquarters. The Sun of this city, however, has a more plausible theory, and one that we are inclined to accept as the real cause. The Sun's theory is based upon several facts, to wit:

1. The tracts of the society, while as good as ever, are practically worthless, being the fag-ends of old sermons and other religious nonsense which the great public regard with aversion.

2. The tract pedler is an obnoxious individual, the butt of ridicule, a bore, and a fool.

3. The denominations are tired of paying for literature which does not teach their peculiar isms. That is to say, they care more for their sectarian views than for Christianity in the abstract.

4. The doctrin of hell is now considered by all intelligent people as the wild imaginings of lunacy. The society's publications speak of hell as an actual place, and the purpose of most of them is to warn the sinner to flee from the wrath to come. Protestantism now very generally admits that the wrath spoken of is a myth, and hence the documents hav lost their point.

5. The books and papers issued are so exceedingly dull that no one can be induced to read them—even pious old maids and sanctimonious deacons rejecting them in favor of more piquant matter. This stupidity and the ancient flavor emanating from them are sufficient reasons why an ungodly public will not be converted to evangelical Christianity by them.

If our contemporary had put its conclusions, which we hav briefly summarized, into a few words, it would hav said that the American world had outgrown the religion manufactured in Nassau street. When Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," Baxter's "Saint's Rest," and the Bible constituted the library of the evangelical Christian, the publications of the Tract Society might hav been considered exhilarating and nutritious literature. That was a hundred years ago at least. Now, the average Christian reads daily papers, books, and magazines, and the slush published by religious societies has little charm for him.

Another point that should not be overlooked is that with its outgrowing of religious literature, the public is fast outgrowing evangelical Christianity itself.

Meanness.

Here are two more newspaper expressions evoked by the recent trial of C. B. Reynolds for blasphemy. The first is from a secular journal which reflects the opinions of the people of a city filled with churches—the Brooklyn Eagle:

"Without offering any suggestions to people who may think that the right to be profane is worth having, we submit that our limited experience with the English language and the American public has taught us two strong facts. First, we hav found that vigor of thought and intensity of expression is not enhanced by the frequent interjection of words bearing the relation to speech that is sustained by sores to the body; and secondly, that the majority of people hav inherent respect for religion, however denominated, and regard a blasphemer with the feelings that are inspired by the sight of a dime museum monstrosity."

That paragraph is rhetorical rot. Freethinkers do not care how much respect the Christian entertains for his pet superstition; they only ask to be allowed the freedom to express their own views upon superstition in general, and the Christian superstition in particular. This has been denied Mr. Reynolds in New Jersey, though millions of people are constantly "blaspheming" in other parts of the country. And there is at least one man in the land who believes that the greatest museum monstrosity of the day is the jury that convicted Mr. Reynolds. Mr. Lamar, of Chicago, holds that the average common-sense citizen would look upon such a collection of human images with feelings akin to awe at the enormous chasm between their time and the present.

The second expression is from a religious paper, the Christian at Work:

"A New Jersey blasphemer paid into court $25 for the pleasure of blaspheming his maker the other day. Mr. Ingersoll defended him. It must hav proved an expensiv luxury to the blasphemer; there was the cost of counsel, the fine imposed by the court, and the damage to his character—that is, supposing it could be damaged. Mr. Ingersoll does better. He defends a man for blaspheming, at a profit, but is careful not to offend the law himself, while he hires a hall to denounce God in at a charge of fifty cents a head—double what it costs to see a country circus."

This paragraph is of interest as showing the total depravity and innate cussedness of religious editors. The Christian at Work obtained its information of the result of this trial from the daily papers. Now, every paper stated plainly that Colonel Ingersoll paid Mr. Reynolds's fine out of his own pocket. The Christian at Work also receives THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we hav repeatedly stated that Colonel Ingersoll did not charge a cent for his services in this case. We hav also printed Mr. Reynolds's acknowledgment of a gift of twenty-five dollars from Colonel Ingersoll, making $100 in cash, besides his expenses, and two days' time—worth about $2,000 to him—which Colonel Ingersoll gave freely to defend freedom of speech in the barbaric state of New Jersey.

His reward is mendacious abuse and mean insinuations from the little-souled Judases who edit Christian papers. "Can you wonder that we hate your doctrins—that we despise your creeds?"

Editorial Notes.

ATTENTION is again called to the work of Mr. Reynolds with his canvass tabernacle. He has two engagements booked in Ohio, and desires others east or west of that state that the freight charges and his own expenses may not cost more than the sum total he receives. Address him at North Parma, N. Y.

MAYOR HEWITT has found that the Young Men's Christian Association of this city is a law-breaker in maintaining huge bulletin-boards on the sidewalks in front of its building. But we are willing to wager considerable that Mayor Hewitt is not powerful enough to force this tax-dodging religious institution to remove the obstructions.

GOVERNOR HILL has signed a bill amending the present Sunday law of this state so as to inflict severer penalties for second offenses. The penalty has been a fine of $1 to $10, or imprisonment not exceeding five days. The amendment fines the Sabbath-breaker $10 to $20, or imprisonment not less than five nor more than twenty days. Governor Hill has done a very contemptible act in signing such a bill.

THE Bible tells us that "it is appointed unto men once to die." God makes the appointment.—Independent.

Does this apply to those fellows who get into heaven through an appointment with the sheriff made by the judge?

A COLUMN has been erected at Monte Pincio, in Rome, to the memory of Galileo's imprisonment in the neighboring palace of the Medicis. It bears the following epigraph: "The neighboring palace, once the property of the Medicis, was the prison of Galileo Galilei, guilty of having seen the earth revolve round the sun.—S.P.Q.R., LDCCCLXXXVII."

WE publish in this issue a few extracts from John Stuart Mill's essay "On Liberty," and they will be followed by more from the same source. Just at the present time, in these days of blasphemy trials, Comstock prosecutions, and Sunday laws, it is well to remind people that there are a few fundamental principles of liberty from which it is not safe to depart. Mr. Mill has set these forth in unmistakable terms. It was one of the late Stephen Pearl Andrews's wisest sayings that the people of each succeeding generation need to be indoctrinated with the spirit of rebellion to tyranny; otherwise that spirit is lost, and we are given the opportunity to justify our tyranny toward those in our power by that which is exercised over ourselvs. It appears to hav been left to a few Freethinkers of to-day to call back our generation to the great principles of individual liberty with which John Stuart Mill sought to indoctrinate his.

AT a meeting of the Henry George people in this city lately, an attempt was made to get Mr. O'Brien, the Irish agitator, to address the crowd. Mr. O'Brien refused. Shortly after, the Union Labor party held a meeting, and adopted this resolution:

"WHEREAS, An attempt has been made by the Socialists of this city to force themselvs and their theories upon the Hon. Wm. O'Brien and the Irish Land League, regardless of the injury that would result to the cause advocated by the League:

"Resolved, That we, the Union Labor party, representing the American law-abiding people, repudiate this attempt to drag Communism and Atheism into American politics. We regret that good and honest men should be misled by such men into a movement that attacks all religions, all laws, and all the habits, customs, and institutions of our people."

We extend to Mr. George our sincere sympathy. No man has said meaner things of the Socialists than he; no man more vehemently denies being a Communist; no man is more bitter against Atheists, nor more energetic in using religious prejudices and "working the religious racket" than the late candidate for the mayoralty of this city. And to be called a Socialist, a Communist, an Atheist; to be accused of attacking all religion, all laws, all the habits, customs, and institutions of our people, must be very disgusting to him, and should entitle him to the interference of Anthony Comstock. It has nothing to do with the case that his land scheme is thoroughly Communistic; that the government ownership and control of the earth is Socialistic doctrin; that his defense of Dr. McGlynn and attack upon the church places him without the pale of the most important Christian sect in the world; that the legal adoption of his theories would overturn our laws, our habits, our institutions—he must feel keenly this resolve of the Union Labor party, and all the more keenly because he has tried so hard to be conservativ and respectable while carrying on a most revolutionary crusade. He has said Good Lord, Good Devil, with great impartiality; snubbed the Socialists, abused the Communists, and turned up his nose at the Atheists all to no purpose. He is accused now of being all three in one. And the joke is no less enjoyable from the fact that most people believe it true.

THE enthusiastic Mr. Hamilton, of Ukiah, Cal., who threw a lamp at the secretary of the American Secular Union while the latter was enlightening the townsfolk in the machinations of Catholicism, is likely to pay dear for his burning zeal. The day after his furious outbreak Mr. Hamilton had a warrant served on him by Constable F. C. Albertson, and was taken before Justice S. C. Poage, charged, as the complaint read, that he "on the 13th day of May, 1887, at and in the county of Mendocino, state of California, did without authority of law, wilfully disturb and break up an assembly and meeting, called 'Liberty meeting,' not unlawful in its character, at the Court House, in the town of Ukiah City, in the county and state aforesaid, then and there being held by a sect or denomination calling themselvs 'Infidels,' under the management and control of one S. P. Putnam, as affiant is informed and believes, and so states the facts to be;" whereupon he pleaded guilty to the charge and was fined $100, but a stay of fifteen days was granted. Mr. S. J. Chalfrant, of Ukiah, has also sworn out a complain charging Mr. Hamilton with having made an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to do great bodily harm. This charge, says the Dispatch and Democrat, will go to the Supreme Court for trial. We do not imagin, however, that Mr. Hamilton will get his deserts on this complaint. The papers of the place make excuses of all sorts for him, and it is very easy to see that the Christians are secretly sorry that he did not kill Mr. Putnam. The murderous assault is described as an "unfortunate incident," and his frenzied hurling of the lamp was done in a "moment of unguarded impulse." One paper almost counts him a hero for carrying the second lamp he seized to the street and throwing it upon the ground. The truth is, he intended to follow up his assault upon Mr. Putnam, but was prevented by men in the audience. He then ran from the hall, holding the lamp above his head, scattering burning oil as he went. Mr. Hamilton had murder in his heart, though he was prevented from completing his intention, and should be punished. He jeopardized the lives of hundreds of people by the panic his insane conduct caused, and many of the ladies in the audience were ill for several days after. It will be a disgrace to the courts of Mendocino county if such infuriate brutality is not properly condemned, and will virtually be a guarantee to the Christian element that it may do as it pleases with Infidels.

Letters from Friends.

OTTAWA, O., May 28, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is simply grand, and Watson Heston is one of the immense factors of its grandeur. Its value to the Liberals has been doubled the last year, and many of the orthodox get lessons before they are aware of the source which set them thinking. C. E. BEARDSLEY.

BOSTON, MASS., June 5, 287.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to Brother Koezly's question in last TRUTH SEEKER, I desire to say that neither the age of man upon the earth, nor even the age of science upon this planet, was ever intended to be represented by the new dating. The idea I put into the figures when first started was the one so grandly suggested in Brother Wakeman's original call for this progressiv movement, viz., that in the early part of 1600 "A.D.," our glorious science became a standard to be upheld to the death against the murderous "followers of the lamb." And as 287 years added to 1,600 "A.D." makes 1,887 years, as all can see, therefore no just cause of complaint can be found with the figures of this ever-glorious, anti-superstition calendar, called year of science, as a standard manner of dating. Yours cordially, GEORGE N. HILL.

GOLDEN, N. M., June 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Since the 29th ult., we hav had in one Catholic family the highest exercise of Romanism for the redemption of an orthodox soul. A boy of Mexican parentage died just previous to that date. His mother, who has one legal husband and a second one from choice, called the priest here to hav numerous masses said for the repose of the soul of the departed boy; and to promote more efficacious repose, she desired to bury the boy within the church. To obtain the coveted favor, the mother pays the priest the sum of one hundred and twenty-five dollars. That sum would be an enormous price for the church building entire, but for the repose of a Mexican's soul, and the purification of the mother, perhaps it is not too much. The woman pulls the wool over the eyes of the French priest, always accommodating when a good fee can be earned by extra sounding of the holy bell and adding a headstone within the sacred walls to admonish others that it is a good investment to pay handsomely for future rewards. H. L. MCILVAIN.

BLACK HAWK, COL., May 24, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for eight months, and "The Secrets of the East," by Felix L. Oswald, for which you will find inclosed $3.

I am a great admirer of your paper, and would not be without it for double its subscription price. Although I do not indorse everything you publish, yet I believe yours is the only course for a Freethought journal like THE TRUTH SEEKER to take.

I think the cartoons by Heston are doing a good work. I believe that every one of them strikes a blow at superstition that could be done in no other way. Long liv Watson Heston to continue the good work. There has been a good deal said in your paper by its correspondents both for and against the Chicago Anarchists. As for me, I hav no sympathy with Anarchism. I am a Freethinker, but I believe there is a limit to free speech. I was in Chicago in the spring of 1875, during the strike in the McCormic reaping works, and overheard a part of a speech made to the strikers on the corner of Twenty-third street and Blue Island avenue. The speaker referred to McCormic as "the man with silk stockings." He said: "The time is past when the laboring man need fear capitalists. With thirty-five cents' worth of dynamite in your pocket you can do better execution than a thousand soldiers with muskets." Are these the kind of principles to advocate in a free country? What incentiv is there for a man to accumulate wealth, to make a home for his family, if he is not to be protected by the law—if he is to be at the mercy of Anarchists and dynamiters?

No, Mr. Editor, I can't agree with you on the Chicago Anarchist question, but nevertheless I think THE TRUTH SEEKER the best Liberal paper published, and think that no one but a narrow-minded bigot would stop his support of it because the editor differed with him in opinion.

CHAS. E. SMITH.

TOLEDO, May 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken up my abode in this place, and hav not yet been able to meet with any of our persuasion, and I notice by your paper you hav no agency here. Why is this thus? Is there any Freethought society in Toledo? and if not, why not?

There is a combination in the churches here just now in order to revive the cause. They hav a professional gospel-thrasher who is trying to make converts and saddle them with a cross. He would be a good speaker if his articulation were better and the matter of his talk had a little bit of common sense mixed in. But I noticed there were buckets of tears shed by the women folks when he pictured the separation of families—all imaginary, of course—when the husband and father was turned into the goat pen, where he would gnash his teeth to all eternity, while his dear wife would go to the right among the imported Cotswolds, Southdowns, etc., and enjoy herself. I forgot to state that the preacher is Rev. Dr. Munhall. He makes an effort to be funny at times. How easy it is to make people laugh in church! I was ushered into a pew and sat beside a young woman who appeared to be under conviction, and stood up for prayers. As I am an old man, I thought it would be no harm to speak to her without being introduced, and told her if she desired to go forward to the mercy seat and get nearer to God I would let her pass, as I might sit in the seat of the ungodly; but I never would stand in the way of sinners. Well, he talked for about an hour, and told what a terrible thing it was to be without God in the world; how bad it was to go to the theater, or dance, or ride on the street-cars on Sunday—didn't say anything about stealing a horse on Monday, or visiting a happy home to giv spiritual consolation when the husband is away to business and making a hell of that home. This may be the means which results in the new birth.

The women to-day are the pillars of the church, and if they could be converted and shown the broken reed upon which they rely for support, then, and not till then, will the occupation of a priest be gone. CHARLES FRANKLIN.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., June 4, 287.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of May the 14th, under the title of "Mrs. Slenker's Arrest" you alternately excuse and condemn one of nature's noble women. You say that "the English language is rich enough to convey every shade of meaning without borrowing from the vocabulary of the abandoned class." Now, I venture to say that the editor's knowledge of the ignorance that prevails is not as complete as his knowledge of the meaning of words. It was Mrs. Slenker intent to reach the "abandoned" class of people, and only the plainest language (vulgar, if you wish) could reach their understanding. I believe Aunt Elmina speaks the truth when she says that much of her work has been repulsiv to her. She holds the same relation to the moral world that hospital doctors and nurses hold to the physical. Their work is to probe the festering ulcer, cure the most loathsome diseases, of which they keep a record and description of cases. No matter how disgusting the details, they are printed in medical books and sent through the mails; and if "the intent of the book" does "not affect its character," under the postal statutes, then every medical work, every Bible publisher, is amendable to the law. Thousands of refined people would not enter a hospital as doctor or nurse because the work is both dirty and disgusting to them, yet they are willing to acknowledge the necessity of such work; and who is there that has any knowledge of society and the moral status of to-day who will not say there are diseases in the moral world that require men and women who are willing to engage in a work that is, in one word, disgusting, in order that they may probe the moral ulcer and remove the gangrene from society, and lift humanity from the cess-pool of immorality and place them on a higher intellectual plane from which shall evolve future generations possessing moral purity? Now let these Christian prosecutors compare Elmina's captured leaflets with the inspired nastiness in Genesis xxxviii, the book of Deuteronomy, and the book of Ruth, and then giv their honest opinion whether the Bible should be sent through the mails or suppressed as obscene literature.

I hav not seen that for which my benefactor is indicted or held responsible, but feel safe to say that she never penned one word that she did not intend should benefit the receiver. All true men and women of the Liberal ranks should see that she receives the generous support her work merits.

MRS. FLORA A. ABBOTT.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., June 4, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I will relate two little incidents recently happening in this city. A fellow named Mack, clerking in one of our stores, has been a Freethinker for many years. A fellow-clerk, named Gibson, was an ardent Methodist, who delighted in believing all the hard stories contained in the Bible, and was sorry that there were not still harder stories in that book, so that he could show how good he was by believing them all. He was sorry as well as amazed to think that Mack should run the awful risk of losing his soul by not believing these stories. He held up before him the torments of hell, and solemnly assured him that his soul would burn in an awful lake of fire forever and ever and ever if he did not repent and believe the Bible. Oh, there was such peace in believing! To be assured that your name was written in the lamb's book of life, and that you would escape hell and be happy in heaven simply by believing the Bible and obeying the commandments! Oh, it was awful to think of the danger to which Mack was exposed. A little incident occurred which varied the line of argument and led Mack to think he had the advantage. A pesky little mouse had got into the store and was playing havoc with some of their valuables. Gibson procured a trap and the mouse was caught alive. He suggested that Mack had better drown it, but as water was scarce and the weather was cold, and a big coal fire was blazing in the stove, Mack thought he might be saved a trip to the pump by throwing the mouse into the stove, and he succeeded in doing so just as Gibson came upon the scene. He was too pious to swear, but there can be no doubt that he thought all sorts of cuss words. He charged Mack with being the personification of cruelty. He had no heart. How could he, oh, how could he throw that mouse into that red-hot stove? Then came Mack's turn to talk. Said he: "That mouse was a sinner. He stole a portion of your dinner a day or two ago, and has been committing divers depredations about here for more than a week. You said kill him. He is dead, but his sufferings are over. If that mouse now was but a human being, you would say it served him right. You tell me that if I die in my sins, as that mouse did, God will burn me, not merely for one instant, but for all time; and yet you worship God, you praise him, you call him kind, and loving, and just; but me, because I threw a wicked mouse into the stove to suffer for but an instant, you characterize my conduct as cruel, infamous, and outrageous. I think your creed needs a little mending before you assail me for cruelty." Gibson looked serious the balance of the day.

A religious crank struck this city a week or two ago, and commenced pedling a small circular relating some of his marvelous religious experiences. He is an especial favorit of God, for that mysterious being frequently visits him in trances and in dreams, and has told him that the Bible is true, and that Ingersoll will be damned. A day or two since this crank brought up in a crowd in which was Bill Custer, the biggest wag in town. He had sized up the crank by reading his crazy productions, and also had some previous knowledge of him, and so Bill assumed to be a first-class vision-seer himself, had trances often, and as for dreams, nobody could cope with him. The crank was mighty well pleased to find a brother trance operator, and it was found their experiences ran parallel in many instances, and so he began to establish the genuinness of his remarkable visions by the peculiar experiences of his new-found brother. For a little while the cause of these two prophets of the Lord was in the ascendancy. No scoffing Infidel could hav held his own against them. At length Bill gained the information that the name of his comrade was Ferguson. Then Bill pretended to refer to some notes that he had made, and he began to question him. You were in Colorado such a time; you hav a brother in St. Louis? To all of which the crank responded affirmativly. "Then," said Bill, "you are the man. I hav had three visions lately, and was told each time by God that you was coming along and would soon be here. He wanted me to say to you that he wanted you to giv up the trance business and go to work. He says if you will be industrious he will prosper you. My last vision was less than half an hour ago, so you may rely upon it as being fresh from God." The poor crank was all broken up. If he had been possessed of any reason, it would certainly hav given way. He disappeared. JAMES K. MAGIE.

AMSTERDAM, N. Y., May 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Christianity has robbed woman of her womanhood. It has damned her for being a woman. It has cursed her nature as the origin of sin.

The Bible reeks with its cruelties to woman. The church perverts her impulse of love, by telling her to love God, not man. If she innocently makes the mistake and loves the godly man—well, we all know the result. The pastor becomes popular, if not great, but the woman is ever after known as a "poor, weak creature." It seems almost impossible that a woman so weak could be capable of consummating parson-worship. Bah! what a disgrace to man, that woman, his creator, can but receive such loathsome taunts from him!

Infidelity as yet is no better. It struggles hard to shake off Christian morality, and giv to woman the opportunity to be a woman, but it can't. In "Tales Told Out of School" the Infidel, when speaking of her, is as stupid as the Christian, and only knows to echo him—"Weak woman!"

Like Mrs. Slenker, I am interested in obtaining facts to know to just what extent man is sincere iu granting to woman individual liberty, which he clamors for so vehemently for himself. To my entire satisfaction, I hav gathered sufficient knowledge to establish without doubt that it matters but little whether it be Infidel, Jew, or Christian, woman need but expect the same from each; that is, "Stay where you are."

Mrs. Slenker has been gathering facts against man's system of sexual slavery, which so shamefully degrades her sex, and for fear she would tell the truth about the male brutes, as the Pall Mall Gazette did, the scavengers of filth cage her to silence her; but she talks right on. They placed her in a dirty dungeon, but she told the world all about it.

In her case, the average Infidel no doubt believes that she should be satisfied to hav his aid in freeing her from church superstition, without being so bold as to call men to account for their sex-inquisition, which is but the heartless tormentor of her sex.

Whether every man who thinks himself a Liberal fights for Mrs. Slenker's right to oppose man's abuse of her sex, or not, will matter but little in arresting the great tide that has set in to right sex wrongs. The great tidal wave of heredity is arising throughout the land, and when it rushes forward to the central point, many are the curses that will be swept away with it.

Now, if you believe that a woman should be a woman; if you believe that she has a right to use all her endowments of nature; if you believe that her love nature did not find its origin in total depravity, then do what you can to free Mrs. Slenker from Christian persecution. RAY D. CHAPMAN.

PIPPIN LAKE FARM, May 22, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: At last the Watts-Leeming debate has passed into history. And what a tremendous castigation the poor priest received at the hands of that great Secularist, Charles Watts, done May 17th, 18th, and 19th, at Kent, Ohio! Subjects: First night: "Is Christian Theism More Reasonable than Agnosticism?" second night, "Is Christianity of Divine Origin, and Adequate to the Wants of Mankind?" third night, "Is Secularism Superior to Christianity?" Father Leeming opened the debate. He said, affirming the first proposition, that two and two make four, and man having intelligence to discover the fact, therefore there must be a personal God; that Plato, Cicero, and Socrates were Deists, consequently Christian Theism is more reasonable than Agnosticism.

Platitudes like these, brushed aside in a moment by the logician Watts, enabled his fine audiences to hear two twenty-minute lectures each night after he had disposed of the priest's pueril tactics. At the close of the first night's joint discussion, Leeming, in his efforts to extricate himself from the dilemma his own reckless bombast had placed him in, only confirmed the impression that he was selling his reputation for an interest in the admission fees (one-half the proceeds).

The second night, under the scathing arraignment of the arrogant pretensions of priestcraft, the priest lost his temper, and calling to his aid sophistry, vituperation, and invectiv, threw away his claim to the title of gentleman; but to no purpose, save to substitute disgust for pity in the minds of his hearers.

Beaten at every point, and smarting under Watts's awful indictment of his church, cornered in argument, yet forgetting that personalities are out of place in debate, the crafty priest, true to his religion, attacked character, abused his opponent, and vented his spleen in slandering the dead.

From his lofty standpoint, Mr. Watts could not descend to such a level, but proved, by his brilliant presentation of the claims of Secularism and by his manly bearing, the superiority of it and its fruits.

Alas! the poor priest's dilemma grew desperate! Something must be done, or his followers would lose faith in his ability, and so, posing as an advocate of principle, he ignored argument; denouncing slander, he used it to smirch the good name of prominent Secularists; promising to avoid personalities, yet so conducting himself as to be repeatedly called to order by the able and impartial moderator, Prof. R. B. Marsh; claiming to know history, yet distorting its facts—such were some of the methods used by this Christian advocate.

It is much to be regretted that Mr. Watts did not hav an opponent able to distinguish between assertion and proof, between argument and preaching, or knowing something of the rules governing debate.

Still, good results must come from these meetings, since the dullest could scarcely fail to observe the striking contrast between the manners of the disputants as an illustration of the effect of Christianity and Secularism upon their lives and conduct.

MARIUS HEIGHTON.

PLUM CREEK, NEB., May 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: There are many Freethinkers in this vicinity, but, as in most places, they keep mum.

We are suffering from fearful drouth, owing to the accursed ignorance of the fools who hav been firing the prairies in this "prairie fire empire"—that is, Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota. Of all the disgraceful rubbish called laws against prairie fires, I believe ours are the most worthless and useless. They can not and will not be enforced. If we had simply a law forbidding the making of prairie fires, under the penalty of at least $50 fine, the same to go into the local school fund, and compelling the road supervisors to make fire-breaks around each section of land of non-residents, and charge the same to those non-resident land-owners, and compelling all residing land-owners to erect fire-breaks around their land, we would hav rain as we had formerly; but since cattle-men, who took some care of pasturage, left, we hav been filled with ignorant, uneducated, priest-ridden American peasantry, who hav for two years kept a continuous fire, so that, though clouds hover over us for days, there being no attraction in our burnt and baked ground, we do not get any life-giving rains; consequently, all agriculture, fruit-growing, and dairying are something we do not witness in this "prairie fire empire." And in connection, of course, hundreds of other businesses and industries are either at a stand-still or scarcely making any headway. Our local press, when a little rain drops along a river and timbered belt from two to four miles wide, publish the same as magnificent showers, when thousands of farms in the distance from creeks or rivers are not touched by a single drop of rain. This local one-horse press is the biggest stumbling-block to progress and prosperity. The editors will publish how the Sunday-schools are prospering, how the railroads are robbing people, but these demagogs never try to enlighten people politically and show them that the ignorant, priest-ridden American peasants are the foundation of all corrupt and bad government. They don't show the people how these same farmers hav changed and prostituted about fifty out of nearly seventy school-houses into gospel-shops for Sunday-schools and prayer-meetings, and annually during winter steal from tax-payers, on an average, two tons of coal at each school-house, at $7 per ton, making $1,400 per year in this county—and many things in like manner. At one place, several weeks' revival meetings were held in a school-house, right by a church, because in the church they would hav had to pay for coal. And not a single peasant was to be found to protest, because some of these same mentally blighted peasants, called farmers generally, are candidates for office. Would you believe it—one official told me, at a little Bible argument, that he believed the sun is going around because the Bible said so. Shades of Moses!

In 1883 and 1884 we had splendid crops, but the climate is simply destroyed for the present. The only good thing we derive from this climate-destroying process is that these praying classes fall in debt so rapidly that poverty compels them to sell out soon, and then they are forced to go somewhere else, to some newer region, and curse it with their ignorant, priest-ridden practices. The past results of drouth in Texas, Kansas, and other places are so well known by the public that they need not be reiterated. Montana last year, through these continuous fires, paid dearly for it—i. e., they drew the climate a thousand miles farther north southward among them. Results, bankrupt banks and money institutions, bankrupt capitalists and cattle and sheep men. But it is very hard to teach an American peasant any science—impossible. He is told, every Fourth of July, that he is the smartest Aleck in the world, and that settles it with the farmer. And he is told from the cradle up and continuously preached to about fire, fire and brimstone, and more fire again, so that it is part of our ignorant peasant's nature to fire forests in Wisconsin, Michigan, etc., and bring drouth in Illinois and other states; fire the cedar swamp in New Jersey, and cause drouth right in sight of the ocean; fire prairies from the Rio Grande to British America, and establish the largest "prairie fire empire" ever known. The political demagogs had better attend to the mentally blighted, destructiv American peasantry, and make less of a scarecrow out of a few blatherskites called Anarchists, representing all nationalities. If this is denied, I will show three American Anarchist editors and publishers to one foreigner. There is no use lying any longer. These farmers tell us society would go to destruction without prayer-meetings, but they never tell us that right among these Sunday-school-blighted people are the worst ignoramuses, hypocrits, adulterers, right in this Davidson county of Nebraska, that has for years suffered from the blight of Prohibition and Sunday laws. Now, see the results. Hastings and scores of younger places outgrow us in size, population, business, industry, progress, and prosperity, while we here at Plum Creek are dragging along in the same old ruts of Puritanism. But it serves us right. It is only a short time since we ignorant farmers were a mere set of henpecked servils. When our water-brained women ordered Sunday-school, we held it, even breaking school-house doors to get in. When our water-brained women said the gospel needed warming, we stole tax-payers' coal and warmed the humbug up. When the same ignorant women ordered us to vote for a county school superintendent who advocated the reading of the Bible in school and praying, we did so, though the Nebraska constitution forbids any school appropriations for sectarian purposes. We are Republicans; and who ever saw a Republican respect any constitution? When our water-brained women ordered us to vote for St. John the Kansanite, we did so, because the Prohibition platform said, Article Third, "We want Jesus Christ recognized as the ruler of the country." Though the Constitution of Uncle Sammy forbids any foreigner to become president, we voted Jesus Christ in all we could. We are Republicans, and care not for constitutions. We shake with the czar.

HAVANA, CUBA, May 10, 1887.

FELLOW TRUTH SEEKERS: For a long time I hav desired to lay before you, and especially before our heroic champions, Dr. Juliet H. Severance and Mr. J. G. Malcolm, a conception, invention or discovery, which circumstances and investigation presented to my mind some years ago, and which, if adopted and established by our government, must, in my humble opinion, redound more to the welfare of humanity than hav all the inventions of all past ages.

From what we hav had the pleasure of reading from the able pens of our above-named champions, and from others of their kind, it seems to me that we must infer that they are aware of the fact that cents, dimes, dollars, and eagles, like apples, pears, peaches, and plumbs, are cheap when abundant, and dear when scarce. In his splendid article in our great standard, THE TRUTH SEEKER, of December 25, 1886, Mr. Malcolm said that our United States Supreme Court had decided that money is not a measure, but a representativ of values. Well, that court might just as well hav said that a yard-stick is not a measure, but a representativ of distance. The hight of a tree cannot be 50 pounds nor 50 bushels, while it may be 50 feet. The weight of a pig may not be 50 feet nor $50, while it may be 50 pounds. The price of a cow may not be 50 feet nor 50 bushels, while it may be $50; because the hight of the tree is measured by and expressed in feet, the weight of the pig is measured by and expressed in pounds, while the value of the cow is measured by and expressed in dollars.

Since the measure of distance must be of some fixed distance or length, and the measure (comparison) of ponderousness, or gravitation, must be of a fixed weight, I think I clearly perceive that the measure of values must be of a fixed value. We might as well try to measure distance without any fixed unit of linear measure as to try to measure values without a fixed unit of value measure that possesses a veritable fixed value. In some countries distance is often expressed in hours or days of travel, but that is like a unit of value measure (the dollar) made of or based upon anything that may fluctuate in supply and demand, as is the case with the precious, and all other, metals. It depends upon the rapidity with which one travels, or upon the supply and demand of the metals.

The dollar based upon or made of gold or silver, or of anything of a nature so fluctuating, is like a yard-string made of india-rubber, and it is the very thing that has enabled the fraudulent class to rob the honest, wealth-producing gawkies of the world of the hard-earned proceeds of their daily labor. They greatly inflate the volume of money, which makes dollars cheap, and then, having secured evidences of debt against the gawkies, they greatly contract the volume of money, which causes the dollars, because of scarcity, to increase in value, or, in wealth-measuring capacity, like a stretched india-rubber yard-string, and then they compel the gawkies to pay off those evidences of debt while the wealth-measuring capacity of the dollar is thus increased. Please don't be offended because I use the term gawkies. I am aware that I am one of them, and I call a spade a spade.

The amount of money per capita in circulation, were it the same throughout the world, would not be important, if it could only be kept at a fixed wealth-measuring capacity; the people would soon learn the value of it.

I hav traveled in a good many countries, viz., United States, Mexico, West Indies, South America, England, Spain, France, Switzerland, Germany, and Belgium, and I hav observed that whatever number of dollars per capita there may be in circulation in any country, that will be about the number of dollars that the average laboring man will get for a month's wages, including board, washing, and lodging, which always equal about one-half as much more.

When the English had succeeded in their conquest of the East Indies, the very first thing they did was to, by taxation, traffic, and spoliation, robbery, drain nearly all the money out of that country, and into their own coffers, until they had reduced the volume of money in India to about sixty cents per capita. Hence a month's wages of an average laborer in that country is about sixty cents, including board, washing, and lodging, or about ninety cents net. See New York Herald, June 4, 1886, page 4, third column.

Since the East Indian farmer can obtain labor for about one-thirtieth of the amount that the American farmer must pay for it, he can produce wheat or any other product of the farm for less than ten per cent of the amount that it costs the American farmer to grow it, and still realize a good profit; but the English, by and through taxation and trickery, so manage the Indian that they get nearly all the proceeds of his labor, or the products of his farm, or the proceeds therefrom, for a mere trifle, and thus intelligence gulls the gawkies in every country.

We might make greenback paper dollars without basing them upon gold or upon any other article of value, and by making them a legal tender we could repudiate debts by paying them off with such stuff, but we could not compel anybody to exchange wealth for it. We might just as well take a pound weight, and having stamped it with the words, "This is one yard," try to measure distance with it.

Seven hundred years ago gold and silver were so scarce and precious that money made thereof would buy more than a hundred times as much labor converted into any kind of wealth than money made now of the same quantity of those metals will buy; and gold is being consumed in the arts throughout the world to such a great extent more than the mines of the world are yielding it up, that the amount of gold that now exists in the world—about $3,000,000,000—is decreasing at the rate of about $50,000,000 a year. From which we may reasonably conclude that within about sixty years the people of all those nations against which capitalists hold national bonds payable in gold must be in the same condition that the fifth chapter of Nehemiah, in the Bible, says that the people were in about 2,400 years ago. The great capitalists of the world are aware that such a condition of affairs is rapidly approaching, and hence the "hard times" that are gradually swooping down upon the people throughout the entire world. All national bonds are payable in gold coin. Were the people, the government, of the United States to construct and equip two competing lines of railway, one extending from Boston, Mass., via New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Denver to San Francisco, Cal., and another from Charleston, S. C., via Atlanta, Memphis, Little Rock, and El Paso to Los Angeles, Cal., with an appropriate number of branches extending north and south from the main trunk lines, at a total cost of about 2,000,000,000 greenback paper dollars, made a full legal tender for all dues, debts, and demands anywhere under our flag, and then by our United States Constitution make each dollar of that greenback, railroad, car-ticket paper money (absolute money) at any and all times receivable for a first-class ride for the distance of about a hundred miles, more or less, to be determined by Congress, on any of the government railroads, and were our United States Constitution to permit Congress to increase the distance of ride to be given for a dollar, in proportion to the increase of facilities for performing the labor, but never to diminish it, because such facilities can never retrograde, while they may increase, a dollar of this greenback, railroad, car-ticket, paper and absolute money would always be equal to just so much labor converted into any kind of wealth, because a given amount of labor is requisit to carry first-class a passenger, or a given amount of freight, or a second-class passenger, a hundred miles on a railway.

Having our railways and this money, to the extent of about $40 per capita, established, with no other kind of legal tender under our flag, our United States Constitution should provide that in proportion to the increase of our population the amount of our legal tender money shall, by the secretary of our treasury, be increased, that so we may perpetually hav $40 per capita in circulation, to the end that the dollar of liquidation may always equal in wealth-measuring capacity the dollar of obligation, and so that any obligation, such as a life-insurance policy, though it run for a hundred or a thousand years, may be liquidated in dollars of the same wealth-measuring capacity as were the dollars that existed at the time when the obligation was entered into.

Our post-offices might then be distinguished by three classes—those of the first class, and in large cities, might emit bills of exchange or post-office money orders to the amount of $100,000; those in smaller cities, and of the second class, might emit such bills to the amount of $10,000; and those of the third class, in villages, to the amount of $1,000. They might also loan money according to Mr. Malcolm's plan, and thus greatly facilitate the progress of our industries, and then our government would be much more "by the people, of the people, and for the people," than by capitalists, of capitalists, and for capitalists, as is the case with it now.

Since it is obligatory upon Congress to establish a uniform system of weights and measures, a uniform measure of values as well as of anything else, when once they see how it may be done, I don't perceive how they can conscientiously neglect to do so after their attention may hav been called to this plan.

By having these great railway lines established, the people, the government, could hold in check the great swindling, extorting railway monopolies. The government railways, together with our money, thus established, would redound more to the welfare of the people than hav all other inventions combined. Our Congress has already given away to rich, swindling railroad companies much more than a sufficient quantity of land, had it been sold at a fair price, to amount to the entire cost of these railways. Had we such railways and such money as I hav herein described, all our farmers could liv well and grow richer every year, and all frugal laboring people could acquire comfortable homes and a competency for old age. If I am wrong, please set me right.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Wild Flower.

Alas! little flower, I know not your name,
The weeds that surround you enfeeble your fame,
For judging of others by those that surround
Extends to the weeds that inhabit the ground.

Come, raise up your head, little bright, drooping flower,
And fall not so low in your loveliest hour;
Your petals are shapely, your colors are fair,
And sweetest of fragrance is felt on the air.

You're fairer by far than the proud buttercup,
Which ever is holding its haughty head up;
Your beauty surpasses the sunflower tree,
Which holds up its face for the sun-god to see.

Alas! that your face should be shut from the glare
Of morning's bright ray, when it bursts on the air,
Far off in this corner, where all is repose
Save zephyrs too gentle to shatter a rose.

Oh! had you not bloomed in this valley obscure
You might hav been sought were your colors less pure;
But do not feel slighted—'tis rich, it is rare,
The blossom that brightens the desert's despair.

You've blossomed in beauty, but never hear praise,
The stranger that passes bestows not a gaze,
But richer is yours—it is wrong, it is wrong
To trample a blossom so worthy a song.

Come, part from the stem, for I know you will share
This loneliness leaning so close to despair;
Away from the stem, sweet graces impart,
Come now, let me place you right over my heart

How to Write a Letter.

There is an art in letter-writing as in everything else; and there is that about a letter that, to a shrewd observer, determins the character of the writer.

A neat person is never slovenly with his letter, nor careless about his expressions. To write easily, gracefully, and entertainingly may be very much the exercise of a gift possessed by few, but there are certain rules regarding letter-writing which may be acquired by every one.

A business letter should be concise and particular, expressing no more, no less, than is required to be made known. The first business letter of a young college graduate consisted of four and a half long pages full of minute details. His employer bade him shorten it. He rewrote it and condensed it one-half. Again was he told to shorten it. Four times he re-wrote the letter, condensing every time, until he had expressed all that was necessary in the spacc of half a sheet! A business letter should commence thus:

Mr. James Brown,
Dear Sir:

And should close with:

Yours respectfully; or, Yours truly.

A letter of friendship, or of any personal interest, may begin in this way:

Dear Friend; or, My Dear Miss, Mrs., or Mr. ——:

And should close in friendly letters with:

Yours sincerely; or, Yours affectionately.

In a friendly letter formality may be put aside, and its composition should be easy and natural, as one would talk. In letters for publication great care should be exercised that nothing unpleasant or offensiv to the general reader should be printed. In letters for the Children's Corner, as well as elsewhere, a stilted manner should be avoided; also a copying from other letters, as, "I saw so many others writing I thought I would write," etc.

In what you write be original, and different from others. Be brief, and express much in few words. Formerly, it was the proper thing to begin letters half way down the page; now it is in good taste to begin at the top of the page.

If a letter, or note, is to be delivered on the day it is written to some one in town, the date may be placed at the bottom of the page, left hand corner; otherwise it should be always at the top of the page, right hand corner.

An informal note of invitation may be written in the first person, and answered in the same way.

All letter-writing should be simple, natural, and free from slang or impure phrases. Words should be spelled correctly and written plainly. With these few hints borne in mind, there is no reason why a child may not write an interesting and intelligent letter.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—CHARADE.

One hundred thousand pounds we find;
A sack or purse to suit our mind;
At last our idle dream must go—
'Tis naught—to it we little owe.
Like those adventurous Spaniards bold,
Mistaking pyrites for gold,
Misled by its metallic cast,
Our total for blacklead has passed;
And strange it is that none hav said
There go the crew with their fool's lead—
An epithet deserved, I hold,
As well as ever was "fool's gold."
Then let us bow before our fate
Our total wealth as graphite state;
And for myself, if truth be told,
All I possess two pencils hold.

Irwin, Iowa. J. K. P. BAKER.

2.—REBUS.

A sad event.

ANSWERS TO PUZZLES IN CHILDREN'S CORNER JUNE 4, 1887.

1.–Versatility.

2.–Gnomon; behead and take away the middle, it is noon, and if always noon, the "sun must stand still;" yet it runs back as well as forward, for noon is a palindrome. You can't solve the Bible story so, though some commentators try it.

3.–Cape Cod.

Liberal Lesson Leaves.

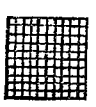
PHYSICAL SERIES, NO. IV.—THE METRIC SYSTEM.

24. Length.—The standard of length is the meter (or metre). It is approximately the .0000001 (one ten-millionth) of the distance from the equator to the pole along the surface of the sea. The polar circumference of the earth is therefore about 40,000,000 meters. The meter is equal to 39.37 inches.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 10 millimeters (mm.) | equal | 1 centimeter (cm.) |
| 10 centimeters | " | 1 decimeter (dm.) |
| 10 decimeters | " | 1 meter (m.) |
| 10 meters | " | 1 dekameter (Dm.) |
| 10 dekameters | " | 1 hectometer (Hm.) |
| 10 hectometers | " | 1 kilometer (km.) |
| 10 kilometers | " | 1 myriameter (Mm.) |

The important units are the cm., m., and km. The cm. equals .3937 inches; the m., 39.37 inches., the km., .6214 miles.



100 millimeters=10 centimeters=1 decimeter=3.937 inches

The above sketch will aid in forming an idea of the values of the measures of length. The small lines are one mm. apart, the larger ones one cm., and the total length is one dm., or .1 m.

25. Surface.—

100 square millimeters (sq. mm.) equal 1 sq. centimeter (sq. cm.).
100 square centimeters equal 1 square decimeter (sq. dm.).
100 square decimeters equal 1 sq. meter,

The sq. cm. is most used. It is equal to .155 square inches. The annexed cut is one sq. cm. It is divided into sq. mm.

1 sq. cm. = 100 sq. mm.

26. Volume.—

1,000 cubic millimeters (cu. mm.) equal 1 cubic centimeter (cu. cm.).
1,000 cubic centimeters equal 1 cubic decimeter (cu. dm.).
1,000 cubic decimeters equal 1 cubic meter (cu. m.).

The important ones are the cu. cm. and the cu. m. The cu. cm. equals .061 cubic inches, the cu. m. equals 35.31 cubic feet.

27. Capacity.—Capacity may be measured in cu. cm., but it is frequently measured in liters (or litres). One liter is equal to one cubic dm. = 1,000 cu. cm.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 10 milliliters (ml.) | equal | 1 centiliter (cl.). |
| 10 centiliters | " | 1 deciliter (dl.). |
| 10 deciliters | " | 1 liter (l.). |
| 10 liters | " | 1 dekaliter (Dl.). |
| 10 dekaliters | " | 1 hectoliter (Hl.). |
| 10 hectoliters | " | 1 kiloliter (kl.). |

The only one extensivly used in physics is the liter (pronounced leeter). It is equal to 61.02 cubic inches, or 1.05 quarts (wine measure).

28. Weight.—The standard of weight is the gram (or gramme). It is the weight of one cubic cm. of pure water at its temperature of greatest density, that is, 4° Centigrade.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 10 milligrams (mg.) | equal | 1 centigram (cg.). |
| 10 centigrams | " | 1 decigram (dg.). |
| 10 decigrams | " | 1 gram (g.). |
| 10 grams | " | 1 dekagram (Dg.). |
| 10 dekagrams | " | 1 hectogram (Hg.). |
| 10 hektograms | " | 1 kilogram (kg.). |
| 10 kilograms | " | 1 myriagram (Mg.). |

The most important weights are the gram and kilogram. The g. is equal to 15.432 gr., and the kg. is equal to 2.2046 lbs.

A five-cent nickel, one of those with a shield on, weighs about 5 g., and is about 2 cm. in diameter.

29. Temperature.—Temperature is measured by the centigrade thermometer. This thermometer is graduated so that water freezes at 0°, and boils at 100°. The interval between freezing and boiling is graduated into 100 equal parts. When temperatures are being given, C. stands for Centigrade, and F. for Fahrenheit.

30. C. G. S. System.—The three most important units of measurement in physics are the cm., g., and the second. The student should become familiar with all of these, as they are extensivly used, and many other units are derived from them. This system of units derived from the cm., g., and s. is called the C. G. S. System, and the units derived are called C. G. S. units. They will be explained as required.

31. Remarks.—It is necessary for all to become familiar with the Centimeter, Gram, and second. We are all familiar with the interval of time called the second. The sketches given will serve to make us familiar with the centimeter, and if we remember that a cu. cm. of water weighs a gram, we will hav a moderately good idea how much a gram is, or we can estimate a gram when we remember that a five-cent nickel weighs five grams. Try and become familiar with the following units also: the meter, which is a litle more than a yard; the kilometer, which is a little more than half a mile; the kilogram, which is a little more than two pounds; and the liter, which is a little more than a quart (wine measure).

G. G. GROWER.

QUESTIONS.

1. What is the weight of a cu. cm. of water? Ans., 1 g.
2. What is the weight of a liter of water? Ans., 1 kg.
3. Lead is 11.35 times as heavy as water, how much does a cu. cm. of it weigh? Ans., 11.35 g.
4. Iron is 7.2 times as heavy as water, how much would a cu. m. of it weigh? Ans., 7,200 kg.
5. How many m. in 10 km.? Ans., 10,000.
6. How many sq. cm. in a square m.? Ans., 10,000.
7. The average weight of a man is 140.4 pounds, how many kg. does he weigh? Ans., 63.7.
8. The average weight of a woman is 55.2 kg., how many pounds does she weigh? Ans., 121.7.
9. The average hight of a man is 66.3 inches how many cm.? Ans., 168.4.
10. The average hight of a woman is 157.9 cm., how many inches? Ans., 62.16.
11. At birth the average weight of a girl is 6.415 pounds, how many kg.? Ans., 2.91.
12. At birth the average weight of a boy is 3.2 kg., how many pounds? Ans., 7.055.
13. The average hight of a girl, at birth, is 19.02 inches. how many cm? Ans., 48.3.
14. The average hight of a boy at birth is 49.6 cm., how many inches? Ans., 19.53.

NOTE.—The above figures in regard to the human body are given by Quetelet. The measurements were made upon Belgians.

Story of an Oyster.

Why, then, the world's mine oyster,
Which I with sword will open.
—Merry Wives of Windsor.

And as we are picking the world to pieces to see what it is made of, and how it is made, of course we must dissect whatever comes in our way.

Now, this oyster—your little fingers could never pick it open, it is shut so tightly.

There are two very hard shells, you see, like valves, an upper and an under one. Hence oysters, clams, scallops, and mussels are called—what? Can't you guess? Bivalves!—that's right. And now one of our bright boys has, with a knife, forced the hard, firmly closed shells apart, and there is the little soft, pulpy fish. Is it a fish?

Why, yes; certainly it is, and a very delicious one too. He does not appear to hav any head, however. What a funny fish, sure enough! And what a pretty house inside is that he livs in! How smooth and glossy! What bright and changing colors it shows in the light!

This lining of the oyster shell is called "mother of pearl," and buttons, brooches, studs, and many useful and ornamental articles are manufactured from it. The shells are used to harden roads, and for other purposes. The oyster livs in a bed with a great many relativs of his, with the salt water for a blanket. Oysters attach themselvs in babyhood to a shell or rock in clusters, and there they stay till some one comes with a rake, made on purpose to take them, and gathers them in by the bushel. The clam is buried in the sand; the mussel can swim along near the shore, so can the scallop, and when picked up, click, click, he snaps his shells together as if angry at being disturbed, but the oyster never opens his mouth, nor does he ever of his own accord move an inch, but lies in bed all the time. When the tide ebbs off we can see him and his mates lying there just as still as mice.

His family is very, very old. He belongs to the tribe called Mollusks, and they are first found away back in what is called the Silurian Age. Mollusks are animals whose skeletons are on the outside of their bodies.

Silurian is named from a tribe of Britons, or Silures, who formerly lived in Wales, where the formations of this age are very plenty.

Sometimes the oyster gets sick, and a lot of shelly caps form around some foreign substance that has somehow got in between the animal and its shell, and after a while they are hardened into what are termed pearls. These are much sought for, and are very costly and valuable.

The oyster is one of six classes, all of which come under the family of mollusks.

You hav seen snails on the land with four horns, and little eyes on the ends of two of them, havn't you? The shell of the snail is like a spiral tube, into which he tucks himself, or stretches out at his leisure. And the slug, too—can you describe his appearance? Head, horns, a fat little foot, and a soft little body. These are relations of the oyster, only they liv on the land instead of under water; we do not use them for food, and they are known as gasteropods. The oyster comes under the head of Acephala, and that means that it has no head.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What animals are called bivalves? Why so called? What is the lining of the oyster shell called? What is its use? How does the oyster liv? Describe the habits of other shell-fish. To what tribe does he belong? Define mollusk. Silurian. What is the result if the oyster becomes sick? Into how many classes are mollusks divided? Describe the snail and slug. What is the difference between them and the oyster? To what class do they belong? Under what head is the oyster classed?

Correspondence.

DEL MAR, CAL., May 24, 287.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I wrote to you. I am eleven years old. Everything remains as it always did, only the Christians are growing weaker in their knees. This year is kind of an off year. It didn't start in to rain until the last of February, and it is trying to rain now. It hardly ever rains later than April.

Papa and mamma went to hear Mr. Putnam lecture in San Diego. They thought his lecture was very good. They brought home some very good Infidel books. I suppose that our Christian friends hav erected a monument for Noah. We hav a nice house and a cistern that holds three hundred barrels of water. Your friend, LUTHER SHAUG.

OVERTON, GA., May 28, 287 E.M.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As it has been several months since I wrote to you, and nobody seems to miss me, I thought I would write again. I know you hav not space to publish anything from a poor writer often, so I will only write occasionally. The Corner is improving all the time, and I am particularly pleased with the Science Column. Educate the children in science and you will see them grow up into good Freethinkers; for Christianity's worst enemy is science. It always has been, and ever will be. I wish I could liv to see the day when every church is converted into an institute for learning science. You are doing a splendid work in educating the children in the course of Freethought. Every Liberal paper ought to hav a department for the children; the mind is more easily bent while young. I wish I could hear you speak. I am very much pleased with the interest Mr. G. N. Hill takes in your work. I agree with him in thinking that Freethinkers ought to date from the death of the noble martyr Bruno. If Jesus Christ ever lived, no doubt he was a good man, and a martyr, but we cannot hav as much respect for him, because the Christians hav slandered him so much by saying that he wants people to be washed in his blood and that he made a failure in his attempt to save sinners. It looks strange to me that God did not crown his only son's effort with success when it was in his power to do so.

I hav written some verses for the Corner, and hope they will prove worthy of publication. Yours for truth, DARLINA BELL.

[We thank our friend for her kind appreciation of our efforts. We hav the best and kindest friends in the world, and their approval of our work is very gratifying.—ED. C. C.]

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "Tribute to His Brother," "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," and the recent address over "Little Harry Miller's Grave," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the four will be forwarded to any address, for 50cts, or either one for 15cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

Content.

One seeks in vain
A fairer country than this broad domain—
Where freedom dwells on coteau, hill, and plain—
And fertil prairies, rich with growing grain,
Invite the men of courage, brawn, and brain.

Hither on breezy wing
Far from the pampered East a-wandering,
All gilded customs to the winds I fling;
Why should my heart to city pleasures cling?
My shack's a castle! and I reign its king.

Then come what may,
Here in this cabin rude content I'll stay;
Here at my cabin door I'll whiff away
The cares and troubles of a yesterday;
Why should I change my lot? Why further stray?

—Sam T. Clover in Dakota Bell.

Religious News from Boston.

The Brick Lane church was last evening filled by a large and fashionable audience gathered to welcome the Rev. Mr. Stellalite, who comes to this city with the most flattering testimonials of the pulpit and press of the West, where he has filled long engagements in nearly all the large cities with unqualified success. His welcome last evening was a complete ovation, and his efforts from first to last were rewarded with the most unmistakable approval of his delighted listeners. Mr. Stellalite's engagement covers the current week only, and all who wish to hear him (and who does not?) should go early. Every evening, with matinees on Wednesday, Saturday, and Sunday.

A movement is on foot at the Swell Street church to hav the choir and pulpit change places. It is high time that this improvement were effected. The worshipers at this church hav too long been subjected to great inconvenience in having to turn their heads to see the singers. It was at one time proposed to remove the pews and substitute swivel chairs, but the suggestion being made that this would be an unnecessary expense, as nobody, of course, cared to face the pulpit at any time during the service, it was determined to meet the difficulty by the change we hav already mentioned. Strange that this was not thought of before. The other churches will undoubtedly follow the example of this enterprising congregation.

We are requested to say that none but those coming in carriages will hereafter be admitted to the services at the Nazarene church. The practice of admitting pedestrians has resulted in the attendance of scores of persons of the lower classes almost every Sunday, until the annoyance became quite unbearable. The Nazarene church has made a move in the right direction.

We are pleased to be able to inform our readers that the Buckminster Avenue church has just been furnished with a new range and all the necessary utensils for cooking. We shall expect to hear of reawakening of interest among the worshipers at this elegant tabernacle in consequence of this new convenience. Indeed, as we pen these lines, we are informed that the formation of a new amateur theatrical club is on the tapis, and that it will include in its membership many of our best citizens. We are requested to say that parties hereafter hiring the chapel for balls and like entertainments can hav the use of the range and cooking utensils at small additional expense.—Transcript.

Stray Scraps.

It is a sure fact that if it had not been for the Christian mothers this world would hav gone to smash and to the devil long ago.—Evangelist L. W. Munhall.

Here is a consideration for the advocates of suffrage for these "Christian mothers" not to be ignored. When these Christian mothers hav their ballots (which will be as soon as it is seen that there is no other way to save this world from going to smash and to the devil), they will vote God into the Constitution at the bidding of the priests, and all the Christians will say, "Amen!"

The Rev. Justin D. Fulton pitched into the Catholic church again yesterday in the Masonic Temple. One thing he said was: "I believe the Catholic church has got all the power it is going to get in this country. Somehow or other God is going to hav his way in America. I believe that it was God who by those fatal words, 'Rum, Romanism, and rebellion,' called a halt to the man, James G. Blaine, who was groveling in the dust before the Roman Catholic element in this country for the sake of their votes."

This is equal to an eminent Boston divine, during the last presidential campaign, saying that if Cleveland was elected, he should know that God had no further use for the Republican party.

What a mighty man God is in politics occasionally in the estimation of some of the gentlemen of the cloth! If God does hav his way in America, then why complain and mourn when a Guiteau shoots a Garfield?

ELLA E. GIBSON.

Books.

LITTLE LESSONS FOR LITTLE FOLKS. By Aunt Elmina (Mrs. E. D. Slenker). Boards, illuminated cover, price 40 cents.

"Little Lessons" received. They are interesting, and even we, old as we are, get new ideas from them.—A. W. Lake, Garrettsville, O.

After careful examination I can say that "Little Lessons," received for my little daughter, is far superior to the books now in use for young children; in fact, it is the acme of success for young Liberals.—Mrs. Francis Bardmass, Dun Glen, Nev.

We hav all read "Little Lessons for Little Folks," and are delighted, and hav been much enlightened thereby. It is particularly interesting to Georgia, and if I had my way about it, it would be introduced into the schools as a text-book, to take the place of some of the goody-goody hog-wash now taking the lead.—A Friend, Rogers, Ark.

I wish to say a few words of praise in favor of Elmina's "Little Lessons for Little Folks." It is a nice little book, instructiv for old or young. I read every word of it, then sent it as a present to a grand-daughter in Wisconsin. Every family should hav it. Buy it, everybody. It is a neat little book for the children.—Samos Parsons, San José, Cal.

We liked the "Little Lessons" very much. My oldest boy, when he finished reading it, said he had but one objection to Elmina's book—that was, that it was not half big enough. The language in which it is written makes it comprehensiv to the young, and interesting and instructiv to big folks, as well as little ones.—Lottie Griffin, Meloir, Kan.

I hav read Elmina D. Slenker's last book of "Little Lessons." It is well got up, and I consider it well adapted to store the minds of youth (and many of older years) with useful scientific and historical information, far in advance of the stories and catechism I learned in my youth, and which it has taken me years to unlearn.—John Ray, Welland, Canada.

Elmina's "Little Lessons," and Colonel Kelso's argument for "Spiritualism." Both of these books seem well adapted to fill a "long-felt want." Elmina's lessons are short talks about the stars, monkeys, fishes, water, stones, leaves, nerves, frogs, cows, dolls, grass, etc. Concerning these and similar subjects she has succeeded in imparting much knowledge in a form that is likely to hold the interest and deeply impress the minds of children.—Health Monthly.

"Little Lessons for Little Folks" is the most sensible, interesting, and instructiv book for children that it has ever been our pleasant privilege to peruse. Mrs. E. D. Slenker is the author, and in the preface she says that "it is like a school-book, which aims to teach the groundwork of facts." It is compiled from reliable sources, and put in plain, simple language, so that all may understand. This editor dearly loves children, and he wishes that he were able to present one of these nice books to every child in the land, but he isn't, and so through his book agency he furnishes it for only 40 cents.—The Plaindealer.

"John's Way" is strong and masterly in the logic and argument of Freethought. "The Darwins" is superior in force, imagery, and breadth of range; but above all, "The Infidel School-teacher" is the most convincing in its character, being in the highest sense sublimely simply and unostentatious, and he who can read it without acknowledging its beauty, grace, and persuasivness must needs be a bigot of the narrowest order.—Dr. J. J. Stone.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

The Present and the Future Republic of North America,

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Practical Experience with Poultry.

By GEO. M. DAVENPORT. This is a little book—a pamphlet of 32 well-filled pages, costing only "a quarter," but as full of meat as an egg. It is well called "practical," for we find nothing unpractical in it. Hens, ducks, geese, and turkeys, are particularly discussed and their economical breeding and keeping treated of. There are many practical hints about keeping poultry on a large scale, and, all in all, it is a very useful addition to the poultry literature of the day.

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS A BETTER GUIDE THAN FEAR.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW. AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

News of the Week.

THE Academy of Music was crowded, as usual, last Sunday evening by the George-McGlynn Anti-Poverty Society.

THE Coney Island excursion season opened last Sunday. The weather was rather too cool for thorough enjoyment.

SUNDAY in this city is not so dry as it was.

Two bloodthirsty Paris journalists, M. Clemenceau and Mr. Foucher, hav fought a duel with pistols. Neither was hit, and both were satisfied.

LAST Sunday a man drowned himself in the reservoir at Central Park from which many people get their drinking water. The body was recovered.

MR. LACOMBE, corporation counsel, holds that any guest at a hotel may use wine, liquors, or beer on Sunday at table, provided he did not purchase them on Sunday.

POPE LEO has written an autograph letter to Queen Victoria, congratulating her on her jubilee and thanking her for the government protection she has extended to the Catholic hierarchy in India.

HERR MOST the Anarchist and his friends had a picnic at Oak Cliff Park, at Union, N. J., last Sunday. It is reported that there was a collision between the Anarchists and others, in which a constable was shot in the hand.

A BIG parade to encourage Dr. McGlynn in his rebellion against the pope is expected to take place in this city Saturday night, the 18th.

GOVERNOR TORRES, of the state of Sonora, has issued a proclamation offering a reward of $500 for the head of every hostil Apache Indian.

GERMANY'S crown prince is said to hav cancer of the throat. Emperor William is better. The czar of Russia has not been shot at for a few days past.

THE constitutional prohibition amendment was defeated in the Massachusetts House of Representativs on the 7th, lacking three votes of a two-thirds majority.

MASTER WORKMAN POWDERLY addressed a large audience at Lynn, Mass., last Sunday. Among other things he said that if manufacturers lock out the Knights of Labor Anarchy will come in.

HAVEMEYER'S great sugar factories in Brooklyn were burnt last week. Over a million dollars' worth of property was destroyed, and it is feared that a number of workmen lost their lives.

A TRAMP went into St. Peter's church, this city, the other day, and knelt down to pray. His devotions were marked with great earnestness, but he shortly rolled under the pew and went to sleep. He now worships in jail.

THE Rev. C. C. Frost, formerly pastor of the Baptist church of Butte, Mon., and also treasurer of the Hope Mining Company, is accused of being a defaulter to the amount of several thousand dollars. He is also charged with obtaining $2,000 from a bank by false representations.

LAWRENOE DONOVAN, a New York youth who once jumped from the Brooklyn Bridge, attempted a similar feat from the Westminster bridge at London the other day, and was arrested. He pleaded in defense for his act that he wished to help commemorate the queen's jubilee.

THE Rev. Peter Eirich, of Hoboken, N. J., has sued for divorce from his wife on the ground of abandonment. Mrs. Eirich says she left her husband because she was so much his inferior mentally, and could not assist him in his literary work as he wished her to do, which led to unpleasantness. She will not object to her husband's going ahead with the divorce proceedings.

ABRAHAM CATCHETH A RAM.

And Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son.—Gen. xxii, 13.

Odds and Ends.

THERE is one road that apparently doesn't lead to Rome. It is the one that Dr. McGlynn is traveling on.

IT is hard to believe that a man is telling the truth when you know you would lie were you in his place.

"I LOVE everything that's old," sang Goldsmith. How Oliver would hav gloated over the jokes in Harper's Drawer!

TEACHER: "If you were president of a county fair and wanted a gate tender, what would you do?" Pupil: "Boil it."

ORPHEUS was a musician whose music had power to draw rocks, etc., to him. The modern street musician has the same power.

IT is rather hard on the pious man who attends church to find it against the law to thirst after his righteousness on Sunday.

A CHICAGO man has paid one thousand dollars for a copy of the Bible. A swindling Omaha agent told him it was just out.

A SOCIETY journal informs us that "when a gentleman and lady are walking up the street the lady should walk inside the gentleman."

A WOMAN'S will is strong,
Believe it though you don't;
But you'll find out ere long,
It's weaker than her won't.

"WE will sing the three hundred and twenty-ninth hymn," said the minister at the close of a pathetic funeral sermon. "It was a favorit with the remains."

A LADY took her little boy to church for the first time. Upon hearing the organ he was on his feet instanter. "Sit down!" said the mother. "I won't!" he shouted; "I want to see the monkey."

WIFE (who believes in consistency): "If the old Blue laws forbid kissing one's wife and the selling of intoxicating liquors on Sunday, why isn't the former enforced as well as the latter?" Husband: "Because it isn't necessary."

AN absent-minded Pittsburgh preacher remarked in a eulogy from his pulpit that "death loves a mining shark." Thereupon four stock brokers and a man with a brother in Colorado got up and left the sacred building.

HE (after morning service): "What did you think of the sermon this morning, Miss Breezy?" Miss Breezy (of Chicago): "It seemed to me to lack originality. Why, some of the ideas advanced are old enough to hav whiskers!"

As an item of interest it might be stated that a pile of strength that would reach half way to the moon is wasted in this country every year by people holding up hymn-books in church who don't know a B flat note from the howl of a brindle cat.

"WHEN did you die?" asked St. Peter, who was putting some necessary questions to an applicant. "A week ago." "A week ago! and it has taken you all this time to get here?" "Yes, sir. I died in Chicago." "Oh, in Chicago; that explains it. Chicago is a long way from here."

THE Watertown Times says that the spectacle of a horse grazing in a front yard, while a goose kept him from straying by holding the halter, did not attract as much attention as it would if the goose had not been an "exiled tailor's goose," weighing about twenty pounds.

MINISTER (to little boy): "What hav you got there, little boy—your Sunday-school paper?" Little boy: "No, thir; 'count of the baseball game yesterday." Minister: "Don't you know that's no paper for you to read on Sunday?" Little boy: "Yeth, thir." Minister: "Well, giv me the paper."

A POLICEMAN recovered on a steamboat a pocket-book which had been stolen from the good Bishop Griswold. "I did not want any reward," said the policeman, "and I would not hav taken anything, but I did think the bishop might hav said, 'Oh, damn it, Smith, take ten dollars.' If he had just said that I would hav been satisfied."

SHE was tall, dignified, spectacled, and from Boston. Her mind was jammed with metaphysical philosophy, and she couldn't help but show it. "Mr. Chumpley," said she to that modest youth at a little social affair on Prospect street, "hav you read Gall?" He edged away from her in terror. "I—I don't know, ma'am," he feebly murmured; "I—I never saw it. Are they ususlly red?"

I MET a freckled village boy,
Who loitered by the way;
His hat was off, his brickdust curls
With balmy winds did play.

"Oh, whither bound, bareheaded boy,
Beneath this blazing sky?"
"I'm going home—but hav to wait Until my hair is dry."

AN eccentric justice of the peace, before whom a citizen had prosecuted his daughter's lover for ejecting him from his own parlor on the Sunday evening previous, solemnly decided as follows: "It appears that this young feller was courtin' the plaintiff' gal in plaintiff's parlor, and that plaintiff intruded and was put out by defendant. Courtin' is a public necessity, and must not be interrupted. Therefore, the law will hold that a parent has no legal right in a room where courtin' is afoot, and so the defendant is discharged, and plaintiff must pay costs."

THE CLER-GY-MAN.

Oh, children, get onto this poor, Tired-looking gen-tle-man who is ap-proach-ing! Do you Not feel sorry for him? I do. I feel so very sorry that I Would just like to Take his place for the Next three months. If I were per-mit-ted to Do so, what would Happen to me? Why, I should go to Europe at the expense of an ad-mir-ing con-grega-tion, and Stay until Oc-to-ber, and hav Dead Loads of fun. I should Also be in receipt of about Seven hundred dollars per month sal-a-ry. For the Weary-looking gen-tle-man is a pop-u-lar cler-gy-man. Why does he look So tired, and why must he Go to Europe? Because, dear children, his Health is un-der-min-ed. He always is That Way at this season of the Year.

Gems of Thought.

EVERY one's duty is first to provide for himself and his own household, but this being performed faithfully, a love for humanity is the next highest and holiest sentiment he can feel. Humanity is our highest object of reverence.—D. M. Bennett.

TAKEN as a rule, no Christian believers die so peacefully, so confident of salvation, as Catholics; and if enabling us so to die is a fair test of the truth of a religion, their religion is truest and best. But this is not the true test. The right criterion is, "How does religion help a man to liv?" If our faith really is what our critics hav usually conceded, a good religion to liv by, then it is good enough for us and for the world. . . . If we wish to show that we are any better than others, let us do it by deeds, and not by words.—Rev. W. L. Chaffin's Objections to Unitarianism.

OUR business is not to ask whether we are prosperous but whether we are right. It is not popularity we are seeking, but truth. No movement which has lifted the world, reformed society, helped in the progress of man, has ever been very popular. For a long time its supporters hav struggled with opposition; they hav been a feeble people; they hav been taunted with their small numbers and their little influence. But if they had the truth on their side, they cared not, and went forward sure of ultimate triumph. The honest man, the man who loves the truth, does not wait till popularity and success arrive. He is willing to share in the day of small things, knowing, as Emerson says, that when the single man plants himself on his instincts, the great world at last comes round to him.'

"For to side with truth is noble, when we share her meager crust,
Ere her cause brings fame and profit, and 'tis prosperous to be just;
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside
Doubting, in his abject spirit, 'till his Lord is crucified." —James Freeman Clarke.

IT is not because of his toils that I lament the poor man; we must all toil, or steal (howsoever we name our stealing), which is worse; no faithful workman finds his task a pastime. The poor is hungry and a-thirst; but for him also there is food and drink; he is heavy-laden and weary, but for him also the heavens send sleep, and of the deepest; in his smoky crib a clear dewy heaven of rest envelops him, and fitful glitterings of cloud-skirted dreams. But what I do mourn over is, that the lamp of his soul should go out; that no ray of heavenly, or even of earthly, knowledge should visit him; but only in haggard darkness, like two specters, Fear and Indignation, bear him company. Alas! whether the body stands so broad and brawny, must the soul lie blinded, dwarfed, stupefied, almost annihilat d? Alas! was this, too, a breath of God, bestowed in heaven, but on earth never to be unfolded? That there should one man die ignorant, who had capacity for knowledge, this I call a tragedy, were it to happen more than twenty times in the minute, as by some computations it does. The miserable fraction of science which our united mankind, in a wide universe of nescience, has acquired, why is not this, with all diligence, imparted to all?—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

WHERE is your God of power, O Christian, that he permits himself to be thwarted and set at naught by the devil? Where is your God of love that he allows his dear children to be enticed into sin by the devil? Some Christians dislike the devil so much that they try to refine him away, and make him into an allegory. But this cannot be allowed, unless they are willing to make God into an allegory too. The two beings must stand or fall together. If there is no need for a devil to account for the evil in the universe, then there is no need for a God to account for the good in it. If you do not personify the destructiv principle in nature, neither must you personify the preservativ. There is no evidence for the existence of a God that does not also prove the existence of a devil. You must hav both or neither. The gospel of Christianity asserts the existence of both; the gospel of Freethought denies the existence of both. And I affirm that the disproof of the devil is good news to the world.—Mrs. Besant's Christianity and Freethought.

HAD Newton or Descartes lived three or four hundred years ago, and pursued their studies as they did, it is most probable that they would not hav lived to finish them, and had Franklin drawn lightning from the clouds at the same time, it would hav been at the hazard of expiring for it in the flame.—Paine's Age of Reason.

YET are there some to whom a strength is given,
A will, a self-constraining energy,
A faith which feeds upon no earthly hope,
Which never thinks of victory, but content
In its own consummation, combating
Because it ought to combat, . . .
Rejoicing fights, and still rejoicing falls.
—R. W. Milnes.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 14. No. 26. } PUBLISHED WEEKLY. } New York, Saturday, June 25, 1887. } 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 per year.

A NEW COAT OF ARMS SUGGESTED FOR VIRGINIA.

Notes and Clippings.

PROFESSOR PROCTOR, the eminent English scientist, is unable to find the Star of Bethlehem reported by the Kentucky astronomer.

"THE tragic death of the late Lord Jesus Christ" is the way the Marlboro, Mass., Times alludes to an incident in Roman and Jewish history.

AT the recent sale of Lord Crawford's library in London, a Mazarine, otherwise a Gutenberg Bible, the earliest book printed with movable metal types, in the original oak boards, was sold for $13,250.

THE New York World recently employed some chemical experts to analyze the foods, medicins, and liquors sold in New York. Very little adulteration was found, and the worst thing discovered in the liquors was alcohol.

THE scheme for building a Protestant Episcopal cathedral is not exciting the financial interest which was expected. The $400,000 subscribed two weeks ago has not been largely added to. The cost of the cathedral is now placed at $6,000,000.

KING GEORGE, of the Tonga Islands, makes a typical Christian. He is a convert to Methodism, and a while ago he undertook to make all his subjects worship God according to the dictates of his majesty's conscience. His subjects rebelled, and tried to kill the king's prime minister, on the ground that the king and his advisers were several centuries behind the times. Sir Charles Mitchell and a gunboat were sent to Nukualofa to try to make a nineteenth century potentate of King George. In the process of evolution, says the Sun, that monarch has advanced so far that he has agreed to let his subjects think as they please on religious matters, and so peace reigns once more in the Tonga Islands.

A YOUNG Baltimore girl named Emma Vinton dropped dead the other evening as she was about to join her partner in a quadrille. The moral of this visitation is dulled by the following contemporary occurrence: "At the services in the Presbyterian church in Nyack on Sunday night Dr. Clare W. Beams, aged sixty years, the organist, was taken suddenly ill with heart disease, and expired soon afterward."

MRS. HATTIE UPDIKE, wife of a prominent cattle-ranch owner of Topeka, died suddenly at Kansas City recently. The coroner, upon investigation, learned that Mrs. Updyke had suffered from dropsy and that gangrene had set in. She had placed herself under the treatment of Mrs. Emma Behan, a "Christian scientist." Mrs. Behan's treatment consists in trying to convince patients that they are not diseased, but suffering from imagination. The Christian coroner certified that death was due to mortification of the foot!

THE parallactic motion of the stars has been demonstrated by the Rev. Dr. Pritchard, of Oxford, by means of a process for making stars photograph their position, and which has been perfected by himself. Star 61 Cigni has been found to vary its relativ angular distance from the four others around it in a course of six months to the amount of four-tenths of a second of an arc, and hence the distance of this star in the Cygnus from the earth is calculated at fifty billions of miles; yet it is apparently the nearest to us of all bodies in space outside our own planetary system.

THE London Times' correspondent at Rome says that the pope has no sympathy with Mr. Parnell's Irish campaign, but that no official opinion to show how the church regards the movement has yet been given, because the energetic pressure brought to bear by a majority of the Irish bishops holds the normally conservativ tendencies of the Vatican in check.

THE Philadelphia Times says that a resident of Exeter township, Berks county, has been officially declared insane because he wanted to build a monument to Eve. It seems that Christian communities are willing to risk the eternal salvation of their souls upon a story the truth of which they won't risk a penny upon, but which they declare a man insane for believing.

THE Christian Socialist, published in London, is not a very loyal sheet. The June number has this: "This is the jubilee month! We are glad of it, for it means that the wretched exhibition of flunkeyism and snobbery which the British people hav been making of late will end, for the present—in its most offensiv aspect at any rate. We hav no desire to say anything on the subject. Carlyle found the Corn laws too mad for a chapter. We find this royal jubilee too mad for an article. Just look at the stupidity of the affair! A very common-place lady, who would hav been in no way distinguished in ordinary life, except, perhaps, for the possession of a shrewd business head, has been permitted to occupy the throne of this land for fifty years. During that time she has been well rewarded for the not over-hard work she has had to perform; and during that time she has very graciously bestowed in 'charity' a certain portion of the money given to her by the people for this purpose. And simply because this has gone on for fifty years we are all supposed to be delirious with joy, and for it we are all expected to return thanks, in person or by proxy, in Westminster Abbey on a day appointed. Really, it is too absurd."

THE Washington Post says these are Colonel Ingersoll's sentiments on immigration: "All foreigners are not good. The same remark may be made about nativs. Some foreigners are good, and probably the same remark may be safely made about the Americans themselvs. On the whole, the effect of immigration is good. This country is capable of taking care of six hundred million people. A great majority of the foreigners who come, come with the intention of building a home, of purchasing land; come for the purpose of getting an opportunity to work; come for better wages, to better their condition, and a very large majority are willing to work to the extent of their strength. I hav not the slightest sympathy with the people who are endeavoring to prevent the landing of immigrants on our shores. This country certainly would not hav been much without immigration. For my part, I do not see why the emigrants of 1887 hav not just the same right to land on these shores that the emigrants of 1620 had, and some that are coming now are a good deal better than some of those who came then; they are altogether more civilized, hav better ideas as to the rights of others, and hav in a far greater degree the habit of attending to their own business."

Tales Told Out of School.

THE REV. DR. JONES ON SPIRITUALISM.

During my stay in Boston, which is the headquarters of Spiritualism, and being sent out on a voyage of exploration, I availed myself of the opportunity to study that great movement of the human mind in this age which outstrips primitiv Christianity in the rapidity with which it has made converts. The office of the Banner of Light, which is the oldest and most prominent of all the papers devoted to the exposition and advocacy of this cause, is located in this city. I called there on a certain occasion, hoping to meet Mr. Colby, the editor, and to hav some conversation with him on the general subject, but he was not in. However, I found in his place a a very intelligent blond lady of about forty-five, who could, and did, giv me as much information on the topics of inquiry as the editor could hav done.

The Spiritualists, I find, are all Infidels, but the Infidels are not all Spiritualists. Like the former, the latter hav a literature; and it is amazing to see the number and character of the books they hav on sale. The inclosure marked (B) contains the printed catalog. The lady clerk of the establishment, as I took her to be, evidently suspected me for being a clergyman, and as she was well posted, and willing withal to impart information, I made the most of my time in asking questions and listening to her answers. As to the numbers of the Spiritualists, she said that the Catholics, in their official representations, had set down their numbers at ten millions. But as they had no organization, and no way of counting noses accurately, as the churches had, it was impossible to know their exact strength. In estimating the Spiritualists as a force hostil to the church, however, knocking off one-half their number, as given by the Catholics, they compose a host which must be largely taken into account in the campaign which opens before us. Thousands of the membership of both the Catholic and Protestant churches are illiterate, and hav no opinions which they could either state, defend, or respect. If asked why they go to their respectiv churches, they can giv no answer, except that they hav been in the habit of doing so ever since they were born, and that they inherited their creed, as they did their property, from their fathers. But every Spiritualist is, and must be, an intelligent and experienced person, able to giv the reason why he believes as he does, and why he makes battle against the church. The Spiritualists do not proselyte, and their opposition to the church is not for the purpose of stealing her members and strengthening their own ranks, as is too much the case in all the churches, but they feel that the church stands in the way of the world's progress and ought to be removed. Neither do they persecute; for when their cardinal ideas are ridiculed, as they unmercifully are, they smilingly say that if those who ridicule had had their experience, they would believe as they do. At their lectures during the winter, and their camp-meetings during the summer, the speakers expound what they call the philosophy of Spiritualism, and the mediums who are in attendance giv tests, by which is meant the evidence of the senses that Spiritualism is true. On this point they hav no faith; it is knowledge. A friend of mine attended one of these camp-meetings, consisting of about two thousand persons, and three policemen were present to suppress all disorder. As there was no disorder to be suppressed, these uniformed officials attended all the meetings and seemed interested; while at a Methodist camp-meeting of about the same size, and in the same state, it required between twenty and thirty policemen to keep down the rowdyism that was present. This seems to show that the Spiritualists are well-behaved.

After spending some time in looking over the books for sale, I stepped up to the counter, and ventured to remark to the blonde lady clerk what a sorrowful thing it was that, accepting as they did what we all considered one of the fundamental doctrins of Christianity, the immortality of the soul, the Spiritualists did not fall in with the church and impart their zeal, intelligence, and character to the advancement of Christ's kingdom in the world. I remarked that the church had the machinery of her organization complete and well oiled at every point of friction, and if the Spiritualists would join her they could find a home well furnished with every comfort, and the church would gain a valuable accession of numbers "Why, sir," said the lady clerk, "such an idea could never be realized; it is impossible. Christianity is a religion, and the church is its embodiment, and that which you call religion, if we can trust the records of history as written by the church herself, has been in all ages the direst curse that has ever afflicted the human race. You may think it harsh in me to say so, but you know, as a historian, that the church can be tracked down through all the centuries of her existence by the innocent blood she has shed. Either Lecky, or Buckle, I forget which, has declared in his history, what has never been denied, that no organization of men on the face of the whole earth has shed so much blood as that which calls itself the church of God, of which Jesus Christ is the head—all to promote the interests of religion. Religion constructs a God and a creed out of its own fancy, and then requires all to believe it, and join its communion, on pain of death, if it hav the power to execute its will. Every religion in the world, as you must know, has persecuted—pagan, Jewish, Mohammedan, and Christian in its divisions and subdivisions of Catholic and Protestant. A real Christian is naturally and essentially a persecutor; for if a man sincerely accepts a creed, and honestly feels that his neighbor must believe it as he does, or go down after death to eternal hell-fire, the very benevolence of his nature will lead him to persecute, by imprisonment and death, all who reject it; for what is the pain of two or three hours' burning at the stake, when compared to an eternity of such suffering as every unbeliever must endure? It was the benevolence of Calvin's nature which influenced the authorities of Geneva to burn Servetus with slow instead of quick fire, hoping that at the last gasp he would repent, and recant his error; and that his terrible fate would warn other people away from heresy. I say Calvin, and all the rest of his kind, felt that every man must believe their creed, or dwell in eternal flames after death. He never examined the question of persecution in the light of reason, or he would not hav been the bloody-minded man he was. He accepted the popular doctrin, taught and illustrated in all church history, and got from the Bible itself, that a person was as responsible for his belief as he was for his actions; whereas, we know that, in view of the evidence before his mind, a man has no more control over his belief than he has over the stature of his body. He was blinded, and converted into a monster of cruelty, by that hateful thing called religion, the original offspring of ignorance and fear, which, during the countless ages of the infancy of the human race, had become an inherited instinct, and continues so to be, except among those who, like the Buddhists of China and Hindostan, reject all religion entirely. Buddhism has a following which outnumbers Christianity. You may criticise the notions of its adherents, and joke about their deity; but if they do not smile, neither do they resent it; because their opinions are not religious convictions, but mere speculations. But let anyone in England or America joke about the persons in the godhead, as defined in the Christian creed, or the immaculate conception of Jesus Christ, and he is charged with the crime of blasphemy, and perhaps sent to prison."

"What," said I, "do you not claim Spiritualism to be a religion?" "No, sir," said she. "Spiritualism is not a religion; and that is the reason why it neither proselytes nor persecutes. It is a system of natural and moral philosophy. Not one of its phenomena is miraculous, or supernatural, but all are as natural as the rain-fall in summer and the snow-fall in winter. We hold that it is as natural to liv after death as it was to liv before birth; and as progress, unfoldment, is the law of the universe, we expect that the personal identity of the man which began with his ante-natal life will not be affected by the event of death, any more than it was by birth. Matter is eternal in its origin and duration; and the survival of a person's individuality when he is called a spirit, is only one of its infinit possibilities. The theory is perfect, and beautiful, and rational. All we need is its verification; and this you may hav by the phenomena which occur at our seances, and which cannot be explained in any other way than that a man when he dies carries his personality with him. An Atheist may be a Spiritualist, for theological notions hav nothing to do with this subject; and if refusing to believe in the Jehovah of the Jewish and Christian scriptures makes one an Atheist, then all Spiritualists are Atheists; or, what is a more proper and modest term to use, Agnostics." "Then you think," interrupted I, "that the substance of the soul is material?" "Most assuredly I do," was her reply. "Whatever in the universe is not matter, in some of its infinit forms, is nothing at all. The chemist shows you that matter in its crudest form—a mass of iron, or gold, for instance—can be reduced by heat to a liquid, then to a gas, and then to a condition of invisible ether; and by the application of cold can be brought back again, step by step, to its former condition. So with the soul, that part of a man's body which performs the function of thought. If, in a calm state of mind, you put your finger on your pulse, you will feel the beats to be regular, until you think of some absent friend, or affecting incident; then you will notice that the beats are more frequent, and your face is flushed. This proves that thought, the act of the soul, or intellect, influences the body as any other material substance would. The soul is not an entity, living in the body and distinct from it, as a tenant is who livs in a house by virtue of a lease which he holds from his landlord, and can be turned out of possession at the expiration of its time. If you had eyes adapted to the sight, you could see, when a friend dies, the beautiful process of his personal identity eliminated from his brain, which was the organ of thought, and assuming the shape and substance by which he can be recognized hereafter, as he was recognized during his life here.

"You spoke a while ago of the church believing in the doctrin of the immortality of soul. Well, if Christians believe it they cannot find it in the Old Testament at all, and in a very indefinit form in the New Testament. The heaven, or future state, which Jesus promised his followers was to reign with him on the earth, after he should return in the clouds of heaven to set up his visible kingdom in Judea. The time for this return was expressly designated to be in the lifetime of that generation. Paul believed so firmly in this second coming that he did not expect to die at all, but to meet the Lord in the air, when the trumpet should sound announcing his approach; assist him in the grand assize of the judgment, and in the final setting up of his throne at Jerusalem; the pious dead being resurrected from their graves to meet the pious living, and all together, to reign with him in the new heavens and the new earth that would follow the conflagration of the world. This was the idea of heaven and the future life taught by Jesus and Paul, and believed in by the primitiv church. The New Testament is permeated with it from beginning to end. It was only when the lapse of time proved that Jesus, Paul, and all the rest of the apostles and disciples were entirely mistaken, that the church made the best of her disappointment, and fell back on the oriental imagery of the 'Revelation of John,' and believed that the New Jerusalem, which was an equivalent term for heaven and the future state, was a big city that was to be let down from the skies; of unnumbered houses; surrounded with walls of jasper; having streets of gold, on which, as I once heard a preacher say amid the rapturous and devout hallelujahs of his electrified flock, the saints would walk in silver slippers. If a Christian becomes ashamed of, and givs up, such childish, yet scriptural, notions, and asks himself if he has any clear and connected ideas of the future state, he would be compelled to confess that he had not, but that all was dark and confused.

"But the Spiritualist, being a student in the school of Newton, has clear conceptions. Death is to him only the ringing of the bell which announces the lifting of the curtain to another act, with its scenes, in the great drama of individual existence, just as birth into the world was the first act. The law of evolution which brought him into the world, and escorted him across the stage as an actor on the theater of life, accompanies him from the place of exit to the green room, where he changes his dress, and prepares for the next act. These are natural and reasonable expectations, when we see the capabilities of the human soul, as hinted at in a Newton or a Shakspere. Harps of gold, singing psalms of praise to God, as if he were a vain man who could be tickled with flattery; or, as Mr. Spurgeon, the great Baptist minister of London, expects to put in his time, contemplating for a thousand years each the different wounds in the body of Christ, made by the nails and spear of the executioners—all these seem peuril and contemptible to us Spiritualists.

"As it is the environments of a man which, in this world, advance or retard the development of his character, and make him what he is, so our environments in the next stage of existence, vastly improved as they will be by the due process of evolution, will repair the damage sustained here, and help us to go on in the ascending scale of progress."

Here I asked what the Spiritualists' idea of hell was, or whether in their system there was any hell at all, or how they would control men in this world without the certainty of punishment for their misdeeds hereafter? To this she replied: "We agree with our Infidel brethren, that a transgressor of moral law suffers the penalty as soon as he commits the offense, in remorse of conscience. But at death the divergence of our views begins, because they consider death the extinction of existence, whereas we, believing that the play of life covers more than the two acts of birth and death, hav no doubt that naturally, not judicially, a man does suffer on the threshold of the future state, both for his misfortunes and his criminal doings here consciously committed. If he hav deliberately wronged anyone, as Booth wronged Lincoln, for instance, he will suffer the hell of remorse until he makes the only atonement possible, by asking forgivness. Then the wronged man, impressed by the noble act of owning his fault, performs the equally noble act of forgivness, and the two, understanding that all the events of time are mysteriously concatenated by the relation of cause and effect, become reconciled, and henceforth aid each other in their careers of progress.

"The doctrin on the subject of future punishment, as held by the evangelical churches, is that 'while some sins in themselvs, and by reason of several aggravations, are more heinous in the sight of God than others, every sin deserveth God's wrath and curse, both in this life and that which is to come.' That is to say, that, unlike human ideas of justice which graduate the amount of suffering to the heinousness of the sin committed, every person who goes to hell at all for any offense, small or great, remains there eternally in point of time, and suffers to the full measure of his capacity for suffering. The cruelty and absurdity of this scheme are seen in the contrast between it, on the one hand, and the law and penalty of natural morality on the other. The great poet of nature, in his inimitable manner, incidentally, or in the way of obiter dictum, teaches in one of the plays which I was reading a few days ago, that if A wrongs B, in either soul, body, or estate, it is his duty and interest, if he wishes to be delivered from the hell of a guilty conscience, to acknowledge the offense, and repair, if possible, the injury he has inflicted. Until he does so, B, while he ought not to revenge himself or cherish secret hate, is under no obligation to forgiv the injurer, and should hav no intercourse with him. But if A repents of his misconduct, and offers to do, and does, all in his power to repair the damage, then B, if he wish to preserve his self-respect and peace of conscience, will cordially forgiv the injury. Hence the poet makes Proteus, the offender, say:

> My shame and desperate guilt at once confound me.
> Forgiv me, Valentine. If hearty sorrow
> Be a sufficient ransom for offense,
> I tender it here: I do as truly suffer,
> As e'er I did commit.
> Val.: Then I am paid;
> And once again I do receive thee honest.
> Who by repentance is not satisfied
> Is not of heaven or earth; for these are pleased:
> By penitence the Eternal's wrath's appeased.

"God, as was the common notion in the times when he wrote, must be pacified in his wrath; but the poet is careful to avoid impressing his reader with the idea that this was to be done by the suffering of an innocent person. The offender himself is the one to make the atonement, and the method is the rational one of repentance and, as far as possible, restitution."

What Makes the Rate of Wages?

I see that my friend, Mr. Denslow, is wrestling with this knotty problem. I recognize his ability to deal with this as with other complex questions. But, after reading his first chapter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 4th, I must say that he is either a good way off on this subject or I am. He says: "The rate of wages is arrived at by a division, generally nearly equal, between the aggregate capital employed and the aggregate labor employed in an enterprise or process, of the difference between the cost of the raw material and the cost of the finished product of that enterprise or process." By following Mr. Denslow further on in his chapter, I get some idea of what he means in the sentence quoted, and yet it seems to me that he fails utterly to correctly answer his own question.

We might inquire, in the first place, What is wages? I answer, It is the pay or the product that we receive for our labor. When the question is asked, "What makes the rate of wages?" there are involved many factors which must all be considered in arriving at a correct answer. And we must take care that we don't take effects for causes, and causes for effects. In the present juncture of public affairs there is probably no greater question in our national politics than the correct solution of this very question. Thousands are giving it their earnest study. Edward Atkinson has had a tussle with it, and I think the question mastered him. Atkinson is a ready and a pleasant writer, but his mode of reaching conclusions is very peculiar. It is said of him that he would oppose the reduction of street-car fare from six to five cents as a positiv injury to the workingman, for before the reduction he would save six cents by walking, whereas after the reduction he would save but five. We must take care in dealing with the subject that we don't get some of Atkinson's rulings mixed up in our conclusions. I think I can discover in Denslow's reasonings some inverted laws where he deals wholly with effects, whereas it becomes us to keep closer to the causes which produce effects.

Wages, then, being the product of our labor, the inquiry is, By what law or rule is determined the amount of product we shall receive for a day's labor? In other words, it is the same old question, What makes the rate of wages? Possibly we might reach a solution of the question a little easier by using a simple illustration. Suppose five men are thrown upon a desolate island. They are without food, shelter, or the means of procuring clothing, except such as may be developed upon the island. In the first place, they set about to get something to eat. It is discovered, after an experiment of a few days, that with all their diligence each must hunt or fish five hours each day in order to procure subsistence. Here, then, we get a basis to build upon. It takes the product of twenty-five hours' labor each day to subsist five. For the time being I will leave out the other factors of shelter and clothing, and will pursue our first lesson on the line as thus laid down. Now, we will suppose that after a few days one of these five breaks a leg, and is unable to hunt or fish. He needs, however, as much food as before. It is readily seen that if the other four perform their duty to their comrade each must now work six and a quarter hours for the same reward, or, in other words, the same wages that he before received for five hours. We might pursue the illustration with another broken leg, and thus increase the obligation to eight hours and one-third of an hour, and again to twelve hours and one-half. We are now down to the starvation line. For the sake of illustration we disabled these men with a broken leg. Suppose we now disable them by other means, and let us see whether precisely the same results do not ensue. Suppose, instead of a broken leg, number one discovers that his father held title to the island, and that the same now descends to him, and that it is but good law and common justice that he should receive rent, and he fixes it at just the amount that will support him. The other four are precisely where they were, so far as their wages are concerned, when number one was laid up with a broken leg. Now, we will suppose that number two invents or contrives a net whereby he can catch as much fish in one hour as he formerly could in five hours. If the advantages of this net are distributed equally among the four workers, it is found that their obligation to labor is reduced to one hour and a quarter each day; for whereas they were obliged to work an hour and a quarter each day to pay their rent, by the use of the net this obligation is reduced to a quarter of an hour each day, and their own subsistence is secured with one hour's labor. But suppose number two is not willing that his comrades shall hav the benefit of his invention without compensation, and he proceeds, after the usual manner, to drive a sharp bargain with them. The result will be found in number two having bought a half interest in the island. Number one will hav discovered that his island has enhanced in value since there came a demand for a portion of it from number two, and he now proceeds to quadruple the rent, or to double on his half. Number two follows suit, and now it is discovered that the three workmen remaining, with the use of the net, must work, in the gross, seven hours, or two hours and one-third of an hour each, to subsist themselvs and pay rent. Still they are benefited, for whereas their subsistence in the first place cost five hours' labor each day, now it costs but two hours and a third. Now it is discovered that the two landlords hav increased their capacity for consumption, for they now consume two shares where before they consumed but one. Man is an imitativ animal, and the result is, the three workers begin to consume the same amount, and now it is found they hav increased their obligation to labor one hour each per day, making three hours and a third each. Still, they hav an advantage over their advent upon the island. But now comes a religious edict to work only six days of the week. This increases their obligation to labor a little more than four hours per day. But, seeing their landlords idle, this suggests to them an idle day now and then, and the result is that they are now about where they started when they made their advent upon the island, working five hours for mere subsistence.

I hav employed as few factors as possible in making this illustration, but I think I hav sufficiently illustrated the fact that in determining "what makes the rate of wages" we must go to the basic structure of society and keep constantly in view the proposition that the reward of labor is the product of labor. We must divest ourselvs, for the time being, of all knowledge of dollars and cents, for these factors hav more to do in misleading the mind than any other factors involved. The rate of wages can never exceed the product—no more than a stream can rise higher than its source; but in a primitiv state of society the rate of wages can always be made equivalent to the product, as illustrated by the pioneers upon the island when each worked five hours per day. I confined my illustrations to the procuring of food, but I could hav used five more hours and carried the same illustration into the production of shelter and clothing with precisely the same results. But in time comes government taxes, pauperism, children, the old, the disabled, and a hundred other factors, all to be considered in determining "what makes the rate of wages."

Mr. Atkinson, in discussing this very subject, furnishes me with an important statistical table. He says that by careful computation it is discovered that the labor of one man, working three hundred days, can produce upon the plains of Dakota 5,600 bushels of wheat. Out of this product can be made 1,000 barrels of flour, with enough left for seed and to replace or recompense for every contingent energy exercised in its production. The labor of one more man, working three hundred days, will carry this wheat to Minneapolis, make 1,000 barrels, grind the wheat, and put the flour into the barrels loaded upon the cars. The labor of two more men, working three hundred days each, will carry this flour to New York and place it upon the docks. A barrel of flour is a ration for one person for a year, and it is thus seen that the labor of four persons, working ten hours per day the working days of a year, will provide one thousand persons with all the flour they need. The labor of four more men will provide a thousand persons with their meat for a year. The labor of six more men will provide a thousand persons with all the other substantials or delicacies known to the American table. This estimate includes every ingredient of wear and tear, or, in other words, all the energies of man needed in the production of the food for one thousand persons. The labor of ten more persons will cook the provisions and place them upon the table ready for consumption. Thus, twenty-four men detailed from a thousand persons, using the ingenious labor-saving contrivances now known and in use, can produce all the food, cook it, and supply all the waste of machinery needed to feed one thousand people. The labor of five more persons can produce all the cotton and wool needed for one thousand persons, and the labor of five more can weave it into cloth, and the labor of ten more can make it up into the garments, coarse and fine, usually worn by an aggregate of one thousand persons.

And thus we might go on detailing from the one thousand persons, and before we should reach the one-hundredth man we should hav applied all the useful energies of man in supplying every need, and every luxury, now enjoyed by the American people. In this illustration I simply present the per cent of energy required in the production of all our creature comforts, and I hold that all may be produced with less than ten per cent of the energy of the entire population. A part of this estimate is drawn from the tables of Mr. Atkinson, and, although he usually argues in behalf of the capitalists, I don't believe he will dispute these estimates.

If, then, our needs, our pleasures, our amusements, our education, and even our luxuries, may be supplied by a draft of less than ten per cent upon the energies of the whole people, how comes it that so many of this number are required to expend the full one hundred per cent of their energies to obtain only a moderate share of the needs, pleasures, and education of this day and age? The answer to this is not hidden. It is found in the artificial systems created by man whereby incomes ensue with no corresponding production. These incomes are traced to three sources, viz., rents, usury, and dividends. In the ratio which these systems bear to production will be found the gage whereby we determin the rate of wages. Under present systems, created wealth possesses a power to command the energies of man without diminution of its own power, and it is easy to see that herein is involved a principle which in time would absorb the wealth of the world. Let any man take his pencil and figure what would hav been the result had Columbus when he set sail for America borrowed a dollar, to be paid four hundred years after date, at six per cent interest, compounded. A friend of mine has figured that it would hav taken the labor of more than twenty-five million men from August, 1492, to August, 1892, to dig the gold to pay this debt, working three hundred days in the year, at $2 per day. We here see the subtle power in this principle of "cent per cent," and every attempt to solve the riddle of "What makes the rate of wages?" that does not take into consideration this principle and these factors of rents, interest, and dividends, will be unprofitable or useless. I use the word "dividends" where some people use the word "profits," because the latter term is scarcely distinguishable from wages, and in its general application may be justified, while dividends as a result of shareholding in a corporation is akin to rent and interest. If I buy peanuts at three cents per quart and sell them for five cents per quart, my profit is said to be two cents, but I say this two cents is my wages for the convenience which I hav rendered to the purchaser.

Mr. Denslow seems to ignore the important factors which I hav here suggested, and which enter into the proposition of what makes the rate of wages? He may say he is dealing with facts as they are, and not with facts which some might suppose ought to be. We are established upon the systems of rents, usury, and dividends. This being all true, nevertheless I maintain that under these systems the natural law of wages will be found just above the starvation line. It cannot go below. It cannot be maintained very far above. Otherwise we might all become possessed of wealth, and liv upon the income which attaches to wealth. Hence there is a law which levels wages to a point a little above the starvation line. We may by invention increase facilities for production, but this only has the tendency to increase wealth, and throw out of the ranks of production the fortunate possessors of that wealth, and they consume with no corresponding production, thus leaving the laborer near to the starvation line as before. Thus I hold that all schemes designed to elevate the working classes by increasing their wages, or shortening the hours of labor, which do not involve the destruction or diminution of income without labor, will be fruitless. Mr. Denslow is a protectionist, and I understand his ideas of protection to be predicated upon the fact that the rate of wages is higher in the United States than in European countries, and he expects to maintain that higher rate in this country by erecting a barrier in the shape of a tariff between this and the older countries. But I must be permitted to inquire why it is that wages are higher in this country, or lower in European countries, and unless this question can be correctly answered I submit that the question of whether protection will protect is not yet solved. I hold that the reason wages are higher in this country is because the ratio of producers to consumers is greater here. In the old countries their systems hav gone to seed, and they hav produced just as many landlords, aristocrats, government favorits, and non-producers as the laboring population can support. Their wages hav struck the minimum. Transient causes may produce transient results in the matter of wages, but, in general, European wages are at the minimum. In this country we are creating a similar class of landlords, millionaires, and non-producers, and the time is coming, and indeed is near at hand, when it is discovered that the same pauper labor of which we complain in the old countries is developed in this country. Some think this pauper labor is imported. Not so. It is cultivated here as it has been cultivated in the old world, and it is but the natural product of the systems which prevail, and which establish the fact that poverty is the child of progress. ### News and Notes.

Oregon is an entirely different country from California. The landscapes are more verdant, the rainfalls being greater. The mountain sceneries are intricate and changeable in outline, wonderfully beautiful, like the splendid New England views where the numberless peaks toss away into the blue horizon with endless variety. In California the skies are soft Italian, or covered with heavy mist or deep pall of cloud. Here the skies are filled with mountainous masses, pile on pile, like rolling Alps in the infinit azure. They assume all dazzling shapes, glittering in gigantic array over the bright valley and along the lofty summits. The sunset is like a land of gold with jeweled gateways, that reach to the zenith itself, and shine with every lustrous hue. There is no lovelier spot in the world than Rogue River Valley for soil, climate, and beauty of surroundings. There are a good and Liberal people here also, and my week's work amid these delightful scenes is one of the happiest of my journey. California is a golden memory; Oregon now dawns upon me with invigorating summer's wealth.

A glorious ride I had about Mt. Shasta. Beautiful mountain, sweeping clearly from the plain with its white draperies glistening fifteen thousand feet high! There are scarcely any foot-hills, and one can look upon it in all its giant glory as it towers straight before from the vast plain. For hours we speed along the winding track amid the huge forests four thousand feet above the sea, while still that mighty mountain appears close at hand, and yet it is from thirty to sixty miles off. On we go over the Klamath river and the rocky gulfs, where the train seems to dangle in air upon the enormous trestle-works. At Coles we take the lumbering coaches and climb the Siskiyou range, and at the end of two hours begin our descent into Rogue River Valley. In the afternoon sun, amid the wide groves and undulating fields, we behold Ashland, our first camping-ground in Oregon. We lecture here on Sunday afternoon, June 5th, and are greeted by a large audience, and on Monday evening again to increased numbers. Our bold pioneer friend, Dr. York, has done noble service in this valley. Liberalism is almost the prevailing influence, but it needs, however, a more thorough organization in order that its power may be felt.

The name, Rogue river, they say, was derived from the fact that the Indians of this valley were arrant rogues, and the worst of their class to deal with. This valley has indeed been the scene of the fiercest combats and massacres, and it was a "dark and bloody ground" where now all is smiling peace. There are some "old campaigners" here, and as a general thing I find them enrolled in the Liberal ranks.

Lindsey Applegate came to this country in 1843. He was one of the originators of the Oregon Emigration Company which left Missouri with two hundred and fifty men capable of bearing arms, with their families, teams, and household goods, and after six months' travel over the plains and mountains reached the coast. They came to a land of adventure and peril, and the early history of Oregon is replete with romance. Lindsey Applegate has been a prominent figure in these eventful transactions, and simply on account of his straightforward Infidelity he has not always received the credit he deserves. The church, as usual, claims the glory of it all. Applegate for many years was Indian commissioner. He was thoroughly conversant with Indian language, character, etc., and knew how to manage these wild sons of the soil and keep them peaceable and industrious. His administration of these difficult affairs was a success. When the ridiculous policy was adopted by the government of putting the Indian department in charge of the churches, Lindsey Applegate was removed for the reason that he was an Infidel, and, of course, unfit to represent ecclesiastical rule. This policy is entirely wrong, and a fundamental violation of Secular principles in the affairs of state, and has proved a disastrous failure. Clergymen may know how to pray and draw big salaries, but they don't know how to govern even a savage tribe. Political wisdom is not their forte. Their blunders are worse than a crime, and hav cost the government millions of dollars with war and devastation. I was glad to meet so stanch a Freethinker as Applegate, who has had to combat so much of priestly authority, and has always put his colors to the front.

General Applegate, his son, presided at my meetings, and made an eloquent address in behalf of the principles of the Secular Union, of which all his life he has been the outspoken advocate. From a boy he has been in the midst of strife and adventure, and he has battled both for liberty and Union.

Father John Beeson is also a well-known advocate of justice. For many years, on the platform and in the press, he has been the defender of the rights of the Indian, which hav been violated at times by the national government. Father Beeson is a Spiritualist, but he is in no hurry to pass over. He likes this world. He is eighty-four years of age, and still looks ahead to work for humanity's sake with enthusiasm.

Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Tozer, Mr. and Mrs. Fountain, Mr. and Mrs. Hutchins, Mr. and Mrs. Cordell, Mr. and Mrs. Coolidge, Captain McCall, and others, representativ men and women of the place, constitute a noble guard for liberty in this enterprising and flourishing city.

Talent is a rural community. The church and post-office constitute the village. But it is a lively place. They hav lots of fun here. Extremes meet. Bigoted orthodoxy and advanced Liberalism are face to face, and the battle waxes furiously at times, and the Liberals enjoy it to their hearts' content, while the Christians feel rather sad. The minister only gets a hundred dollars a year, and I guess mighty little of that is cash. I expect that yellow-legged chickens are for him like angel visits—few and far between. If his faith is equal to his bigotry, however, he will no doubt survive. Our Liberal friends used to hold meetings in the schoolhouse, where all other meetings were held. The orthodox minister, in order to checkmate the Liberals, induced the district to pass a vote that there should be nothing in the schoolhouse except the school sessions. The Christians by this strategy thought they had effectually out-maneuvered the Liberals. But the Liberal forces out-flanked them most decisivly. It only took a couple of days to raise funds to build the Universal Mental Liberty Hall. The Christians were simply astonished, and could scarcely believe their eyes as they beheld the structure rising day by day. Our friends had a grand time at its dedication to freedom and humanity. Crowds were present from all over the county. The Christians got up a revival, but it was no use. The tide went the other way. The Liberals were on top. They hav had Sunday meetings ever since, with the widest discussions of every question. Besides this, they hav a Secular Sunday-school, which is exerting a most potent influence. So I find Talent full of life. It is a central point of enthusiasm, and the whole valley feels the fire of its free and progressiv spirits.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. H. Breese, whose hospitality I now enjoy, are whole-hearted Liberals and reformers. They keep the music going. It is an inspiration indeed to be among those who are so thoroughly imbued with the spirit of advancement, and who hav such grand convictions and splendid devotion to the truth. A few years ago they were members of the Congregational church, but not a remnant of the old faith and conformity is left. They are soldiers indeed of humanity, and enlisted for the war. Miss Rosetta Waters, the sister of Mrs. Breese, who teaches the village school, keeps superstition out of it with unflinching courage. Some of the parents want a little God and Bible in the school, but this "Infidel School-marm" allows nothing of the sort. I had the pleasure of attending her school picnic yesterday, and the boys and girls evidently enjoyed nature and humanity. Religion and theology were set aside, and poetry and music of this world made bright and happy the occasion. This is a model Secular school, and shows by its genial atmosphere how naturally children take to common sense and the beautiful teachings of science.

I hav also quite enjoyed a sojourn with W. J. Dean and his wife. They liv nearly at the base of the mountains where Wagner Butte lifts its tall head to the skies and greets with snowy crest the summer's sun. Here was tranquility and golden sunshine, and bright, running waters whose music was peace. It was beautiful all around, with the wide-spreading valley and purple hills. Mr. Dean is a philosopher. He has studied deeply into Freethought, its ideas and facts. He is an excellent lecturer, and has done good service for our cause by his frank and manly defense of Liberalism on many a platform. He has had a hard fight with the orthodox here. They don't like him. They hav tried to get rid of him, and to ostracize him. But he has come to stay, and I find him a vigorous, bold, and well-armed defender of our cause.

Messrs. Beeson, Ammerman, Anderson, Terrell, Mr. Klum, the postmaster, Herman Stock, Mr. Purvis, Mr. Goddard, Mr. Holton, and others, with their families, are stalwart Liberals, and Talent, with its Freethought Hall, is bound to be a center of great influence.

I lectured at Central Point on Wednesday evening. This is a new place, and my lecture was the first of the kind ever delivered there, but the hall was crowded to its utmost capacity, and "The New Heaven and Earth" was cordially received. Prof. I. N. Hall, Mr. Lever, and others are our good workers at this place, and I was glad to meet with so many friends who are generous in the support of our cause. I was glad to meet here with Mr. C. W. Coker, the author of "Science vs. Theology," a very plain and forcible statement of the fact that theology arises out of ignorance of the laws of nature, and with the advance of knowledge must vanish away. Mr. Coker is a veteran Infidel, and has suffered much for opinion's sake. His book has had quite a circulation on the coast.

I lectured on Thursday evening at Medford. The Christians hav endeavored to capture this place by a series of revivals. They appointed a special prayer-meeting for the night of my lecture. But it seemed to be of no avail, for I spoke to a full house. Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Andrews, Mrs. Barnum, Mr. Riddle, Mr. Rosenthal, and others are the good and true Liberals here who face the music.

Mr. Naler, of Jacksonville, arranged the meeting at Medford. He is one of the old guard in the valley, and can always be depended upon to do his share of the work. I passed through Jacksonville and met a few of our friends. I am in hopes when I next visit this valley to giv lectures at this point.

I lectured at Talent last evening. I was gratified to hav a company of little children sing for the occasion. It was a bright promis of what will be, for the beauty of childhood givs its luster to our advancing thought.

I lecture at Talent this evening, and to-morrow, Sunday, morning, and at Ashland Sunday afternoon. I hav been encouraged greatly by my work here. It has been a splendid opening for the Oregon campaign. Next week I am in Coos county, off the railroad, among the mountains and forests, where you hav to look twice to see the top of the trees, and where the roads go down into the bottomless abyss, and you hav to travel on horseback, for a wagon would go to the "demnition bow-wows," it is such a hard road to travel. I think, however, I shall enjoy it, with all its ups and downs.

They are to hav a grand rally at Silverton, June 22d, 23d, and 24th. I shall be at Salem, June 26th; at Molalla, June 28th, 29th, and 30th; at Portland, July 3d; at McMinnville, July 5th, 6th, and 7th; and at Corvallis, July 10th. I expect to be at Forest Grove, Seattle, Port Angeles, Port Townsend, Newcastle, Black Diamond, Franklin, Colfax, Pendleton, Baker City, etc., but the dates are not yet fixed.

In the Sunny San Luis Park.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Here we are, in this delightful region of pure, mountain air, bright sunshine, warm days, cool evenings and mornings, lofty hights—east, in the far south, west, north. Some of the peaks are one hundred and fifty miles away, yet they are in plain sight from where we stand in this broad prairie-like valley, seventy-miles wide, and nearly twice seventy long.

Here is our new home, 7,500 feet above sea level, and forty miles to the east of us the dazzling snow-capped Sangre de Cristo range of mountains, and the monarch of the great chain, Sierra Blanca, nearly 7,000 feet higher than our cottage home. Happy? How could we help it amid such surroundings? The little wife, who has journeyed with me thirty years, is as joyous as a meadow lark, and looks as young and girlish as she did twenty years ago. Why? I hav promised to remain at home all summer, and take her with me in my winter lecture tours. Secondly, we own a home, our own "vine and fig-tree," so to speak. As we are not George converts, we also own a mile long and half a mile wide of Uncle Sam's soil.

Permit me to return my hearty thanks to Denver Liberals, Nebraska Liberals, Longmont Liberals, for a busy winter's lecture work that made it possible for me to secure a permanent abiding-place, and to treat myself to a "ministerial" vacation the livlong summer through. Gardening, cultivating fruits and flowers and vegetables, will keep up physical tone, and next winter the "farmer-preacher" will be glad to respond to the calls of his Liberal friends to sow the seed broadcast in every orthodox community.

In an especial manner I wish to thank Brother Ross, Osceola, Neb., the purchaser of my Minnesota farm, who so kindly stepped forward and paid two other Liberals nearly $400, besides the amount paid me.

And last, though not least, the Dunckel brothers, Butte City, in far-off Montana, proved themselvs true, stanch friends to their old "pastor."

Monte Vista, Col. W. F. JAMIESON.

Mr. Chavannes for Mrs. Slenker.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am informed by letters received from Mrs. Slenker that the moral support and financial help which she hoped to receive from her Liberal friends are not coming as freely and abundantly as she expected. Will you please allow me the use of your columns to present some reasons why generous help should be tendered to her?

I will address this appeal to three distinct classes of persons.

First, to those who, like myself, believe Mrs. Slenker was right in carrying on the work for which she has been arrested, while we may now realize that she carried it on with more zeal than discretion. I claim that those of us who believe that sex matters ought to be investigated for the benefit of humanity ought to take advantage of Mrs. Slenker's arrest to giv to such investigation the stamp of respectability. Respectability is largely a matter of moral worth and of numbers, and no person is more capable to stamp any of her actions with the mark of moral worth than Mrs. Slenker. Her character is above reproach. The number of persons among the Liberals who really sympathize with her work is much larger than is supposed. Just as the Christian church is honeycombed with doubts about the doctrin of the sanctity of the Bible, so is the Liberal public honeycombed with doubts about the sacredness of sex, and doubts more and more the advisability of keeping what relates to it covered by the dark veil of ignorance. A little more boldness, and a little less deference to the received opinions, would disclose sufficient strength and numbers to compel respect for those who hav sufficient moral courage to investigate wherever truth leads and in whatever manner offers the best prospect of success.

Second, I would appeal to those who care little or nothing for the line of investigation followed by Mrs. Slenker, but who believe that the freedom of the mails ought to be maintained. Remember that it is not for writing obscene matter that Mrs. Slenker is threatened, but for sending it through the mails. An addition of the word "blasphemous" to the law as it now stands, and no Freethinker would be safe to correspond on the subjects which occupy his innermost thoughts. Freedom is not the birthright of men; it is the hard-won right of those who not only dare to defend themselvs, but who know how to unite in defense of those who are assailed.

Third, I would appeal to the many friends of Mrs. Slenker, who love her for her character, and for the noble work she has done on Liberal battle-ground, but who disapprove of her last work, and on that account now stand aloof in her hour of trouble. Do not let such reasons keep you back. Remember that a friend in need is a friend indeed. The friendship which claims the right to pass judgment on the acts of others before tendering a helping hand is the friendship of the master for the slave, and not the friendship of man for man.

I believe I fully realize the importance of the step which is presented to the Liberals in asking them to giv moral support and financial aid to a person who has been arrested for carrying on what is called obscene correspondence, but I believe it to be a step in the right direction, and one which sooner or later will hav to be taken. The overthrow of the belief in the divine origin of the Bible and the holiness of God is but a barren process unless it enables us to seek for new knowledge which can be made useful to humanity. Freethought has only value because it destroys the fetters which prevent men from the intelligent pursuit of happiness. And whoever has given serious thought, as Mrs. Slenker has, to the best mode of diminishing the amount of human suffering, must realize how much of it is due to defects in character, and how much character is dependent on inherited tendencies; and thus being led to the study of the laws of heredity, we are forcibly led to the study of the relation of the sexes and to seek remedies for the frightful abuses and misconduct now so prevalent; and who shall say among Freethinkers and free inquirers that having thus been led to the very entrance of a new and better life, we shall stop because, forsooth, sex is too holy to be discussed, or for the more contemptible reason that it is not respectable to think, write, or talk about what relates to it?

I feel very sorry for the unpleasant position in which Mrs. Slenker now finds herself, but I feel proud of her, and instead of seeking to excuse her, I wish the number of women who possess her courage and her zeal should be increased one thousand fold.

Subscriptions hav been opened in her behalf. I hope these few words of mine will induce many persons to send their contributions and their words of good cheer. ALBERT CHAVANNES.

Mrs. Colman's Reminiscences.

The services at the funeral were performed by Mr. Frederick Douglass. I did not wish for a minister, but a Universalist minister, a friend of the family, being present, made a short speech. I was almost crazed with my grief. I had now no object in life. To be sure, my father and mother were with me, and needed care, but I could put that care upon my sisters, and giv myself up to sorrow. Very soon there came a call from Washington for a woman without prejudice to take charge of the National Orphan Asylum for colored children. This institution was founded by Mrs. Pomeroy, wife of Senator Pomeroy, of Kansas.

There were a great many homeless colored children in and about Washington—children from babies of a few months old to ten years of age. No one knew where or who the mothers were; but the different shades of color were all represented in them, showing that the slaveholders of the South were destitute of prejudice as regarded the mothers of their children. What man cares for the welfare of an illegitimate child? The Bible shuts out the "bastard" (I don't like the look or the sound of that word, but as it is one of the refined words of the holy scriptures, perhaps Mr. Comstock will not object to its presence in the mail) from heaven, and for aught the father cares, it may be shut out from all the comforts of earth. There were also in this asylum several old women from seventy to ninety years of age. The institution had officers in all the Northern states, and the donations from these several states were relied upon to support it; the government, through Secretary Stanton, allowing it the use of a large house and grounds in Georgetown, owned by a rebel who fled to Richmond on the breaking out of the war.

During the year that had passed since the formation of this society, three or four matrons had been successivly and successfully quarreled away by the resident teacher, a woman from Massachusetts, related to and recommended by some of the most pronounced Liberals in and about Boston. I will not say she was the worst woman who ever lived, because I hav not seen all the wicked women of my own time even, but I hav no hesitation in putting her at the head of all I hav known. A woman who will deliberately starve, and in many other ways abuse, little children who hav no one to care for them is a monstrosity that I prefer not to be acquainted with. This teacher bore a name honored and beloved in Massachusetts, and because of her name the Liberals (I mean here by Liberals the Unitarians and Agnostics and Republicans of Governor Andrew's stamp) were determined to defend her under all circumstances; and so, if a matron made any complaint about the teacher, instead of looking into the matter, the matron was summarily dismissed. Had I known the condition of things there, I could not hav been persuaded to take the place, but having taken it, I determined to change its character or break it up entirely. I will not tire the reader with a very minute description of these children, eighty in number, not ten healthy ones, and not one exempt from the third plague that the God of the Hebrews sent upon the Egyptian king, Pharaoh, to cause him to let Moses and the rest of the chosen people return to their own land. The teacher had been matron long enough to allow these children to be covered with these disgusting insects. The disciplin was sustained with and by hunger, the teacher taking the food from any one of the desolate creatures who was disobedient, and there was always disobedience.

One of the farmers whose land joined the asylum complained to me that he had not been able to keep food for his swine, only as he put it behind a lock, as these hungry children would devour the contents of his swill barrel with eagerness. Mrs. Senator Pomeroy had died, and the woman who took her place was evidently afraid of Massachusetts.

My friend who had recommended me to the society thought if she could once get me into that institution, I would find it was not quite time for me to sit down and hug my own grief. Here were attrocities perpetrated daily upon the children of a race whom I had adopted and worked for in the best years of my life—abused under the name of Christian care, and as yet there was no help. I looked about me. I did not pray, but I used my authority as matron. I said, "You will be mistress of these children in the school-room, but out of the school-room you hav no control. Never take away their food again. I will not allow it." She tried it, but found herself circumvented as and where she least expected it. The grounds were covered with trees bearing the most delicious fruit—early apples, apricots, and, in time, peaches in the greatest abundance. This woman forbade these children to help themselvs, though the fruit was wasting upon the ground. I said to them, "You must not climb the trees without permission from me, but eat all you wish from the ground." I sent for one of the army surgeons. His name I do not at this writing recall, but his picture is to be seen at the bed-side of President Lincoln in the engraving of the death scene. At this day, more than twenty years since, my heart goes out in thankfulness to him for his kindness. He always came at my call. He told me how to destroy the parasites that were eating the life out of these children. He said the sickness was from want of food and care, encouraged me to do as seemed right, and with his help and counsel. After being there three months the children were all clean and well, but it was no use, I had to giv it up. But my work did not not cease until that woman was removed. It was a hard fight with great odds against me. The prominent antislavery men in Congress, and the Unitarian minister, then chaplain of that august body, were each and all on the side of the teacher, though not one of them ever took the trouble to visit the institution. Secretary Stanton, his assistant, Major Luddington, and that indefatigable woman, Jane Gray Swisshelm, had taken time to examin into the matter, and they were with me. Governor Andrew even sent his secretary all the way from Boston to defend the charming woman. Even Robert Dale Owen cast his vote for her.

Mrs. Swisshelm finally announced that unless the whole thing was thoroughly looked into she would hav the woman arrested on a criminal charge of manslaughter, and as the charge could be easily sustained, her friends were glad to cease their opposition. The Massachusetts lawyer went back to Boston, and the teacher was removed, but it had taken three months of constant, persevering labor to bring about the removal, and the children had again become filthy and sick; starvation had also aided in the work, and many of them died. The cellar of the spacious building used for the asylum was well filled with wines and liquors of a stronger character. I think the most charitable excuse for that person's conduct that could be made would be to say she was constantly under the influence of alcohol; she was certainly crazed with something. I do not know her whereabouts at present, but I venture to say, if she is living, those persons who were willing she should be paid a good salary for abusing helpless children are careful to keep her out of their homes; they do not want her company. This was only one of the cases where the poor colored people were used to profit some broken-down teacher or minister. Secretary Stanton told me that the trouble he had with the complaints in reference to these contrabands was almost equal to the war. The North had so many superannuated clergymen to care for that it seemed to be a very God-send to find a place to send them where they would be paid a salary for doing something that far better had been left undone.

Lectures and Meetings.

F. H. RAU, secretary of the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists of Hannibal, Mo., writes: "Doubtless many of your readers know something of the Liberal organization called the Society of Moralists, which was organized in this city in 1875. This society was composed of Agnostics and Spiritualists, who worked together harmoniously for nearly twelve years, when it was deemed best to separate the two elements. This was done amicably and by mutual agreement, on the 22d of May, 1887, and on the 29th the Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists was organized. This Brotherhood, with its local societies scattered broadcast, is designed to be to those who do not accept any book as infallible what the church is to those who do, namely, a conservator of all the social and moral influence which they are capable of exerting. Every Agnostic who feels an interest in this movement is requested to send name and address to the undersigned. For a two-cent stamp a copy of the constitution will be mailed to any point."

W. F. JAMIESON closed his lecture labors for 1887 with an address at Longmont on Decoration Day. The following telegram appeared in the Denver Republican: "Memorial Day was duly observed by the McPherson Post No. 6, G. A. R., yesterday afternoon at the City Hall. The floral offerings were numerous and exquisitly beautiful. Post-Commander John Hertha presided, a male quartet furnished appropriate music, charmingly rendered, and Professor Jamieson delivered an eloquent address. Not half the people who desired to participate in the services were able to secure even standing-room in the hall." Mr. and Mrs. Jamieson then proceeded three hundred miles to southern Colorado, in San Luis Park, where they will reside through the summer on their own land (three hundred and twenty acres) in a cottage which they hav just built. Mr. Jamieson wishes no lecture calls until January, 1888. In the mean time he will be glad to hear from all his friends. Address, Monte Vista, Col.

Just Enough of a God to Swear By.

The Post classes Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin as "Freethinkers or Agnostics." Our neighbor will find by examining the lives and writings of both Franklin and Jefferson that while these gentlemen might hav at one time in their lives been Freethinkers, each of them distinctly avowed a belief in God, and this is all that is required in any court to make a competent witness.—Washington Republican.

Rather an anti-climax. Did the Republican desire to intimate that it is satisfied with the minimum of religious avowal which will save a man from being incompetent as to civil rights? If so, it may refer to the pretty retort made by Rufus Choate when he was catechised in court: "Do you believe in a God?" "Yes, sir." "What God do you believe in?" "I believe in the God of the statute!"—Galveston News.

The Revival.

The church was crowded; the heat was stifling. The congregation presented a surface of a thousand fluttering fans. The revival commenced in the latter part of the winter, continued until late in June, and still the great church was crowded daily and nightly. Still the altar was daily and nightly surrounded by weeping, praying penitents. The church books showed an increase of over a thousand members, and the prudent, far-seeing pillars of the society congratulated themselvs as they calculated the sum that would be deducted from the church debt by the liberal donations of the enthusiastic young converts.

Up from the immense concourse, borne hither and thither and turned into swaying streams of sound by the waving fans, rose the revival hymns.

Marching upward to Zion,
The beautiful city of God, sang the gray-haired, dim-eyed mothers who saw just "over there" all the blessings they had missed in life, the charity, the sympathy, the ineffable peace, the friends who had slipped into the unknown so long ago, the babies that had faded out of their arms—all would be restored in that "beautiful city of God."

"Marching upward to Zion," chanted the deep-chested young men, and their eyes flashed with an exultant luster. It brought visions of breaking away from the present—like "going West"—like gliding over the level reaches of prairie where the sky came low like the roof of a long building in perspectiv. It was climbing mountains, and leaving one's banner flying higher than man ever trod before. As fair maidens' voices, clear as bells, rang out, "Marching upward to Zion," eyes met "eyes which spake again;" the story was told, religion and love joined hands, and who could tell which one of the invisibles opened the narrow gate for the young people whose names were written on the church books, and whose silver and gold dropped into the church coffers?

"Marching upward to Zion" rolled in one vast volume of sound out into the summer night, and Dr. Parks, returning from his last visit, halted before the church door, stood irresolute for a minute, then entered. There was a "floating population" in the vestibule, on the stairs, and in the aisles—people who were tired and were going home, and people who had been to other places and were "taking in" the revival as an "afterpiece." Dr. Parks, with his analytical eye, classified the congregation with a glance or two. On the platform, back of the reading desk, occupying the chairs and sofas, sat probably a dozen resident preachers, calm, cool, deservedly expectant of an outpouring of the spirit. In front of these walked the traveling evangelist, who had inaugurated, and still managed, the services. He was small in stature, slight and pale. He moved about rapidly while speaking or singing, throwing his arms up and down, then swaying them in time to the music, or to urge the people to sing with more spirit. Below him, about the altar, knelt a number of penitents.

Back of these were the members of the church. Dr. Parks was sure he could hav told them by the expression of self-approval on their faces. Still back of these and in the galleries were the unconverted. Amongst them were the frightened, the excited, the irresolute, the despairing. Occasionally there was to be seen a face calm, decided, curious, but with a free soul looking from the eyes.

This diagnosis occupied Dr. Parks but a few minutes, and he turned his attention to the evangelist.

He wondered at the power of this little man to thus move multitudes by his skipping about, and his inane little stories. He could not yet exactly classify the Rev. Mr. Melrose. He was a new creation. He watched the lithe figure, always in motion, whether talking, singing, or praying; watched him spring from the platform to the top of the baptismal font, then back to walk around and around the reading desk, kneeling in prayer, then rising and walking about with closed eyes, still praying, then kneeling again—talking, talking, in an off-hand, familiar way to that great and awful will; watched the swaying, restless figure, without solemnity, reverence, or devotion in any of its changing attitudes, and the man of science had a revelation. Unconsciously he spoke aloud: "This is the long-sought missing link."

A hand was laid on his shoulder and a voice said in his ear: "That's the right label, paste it on."

Dr. Parks turned to meet the amused eyes of a brother physician. He said: "I never saw anything like his behavior outside a menagerie."

"No? If you had been with me in the tropics you might hav seen the same thing in the jungles."

The two friends stood awhile in silence. The penitents around the altar were converted, one after another, and rent the air with their rejoicings. Dr. Parks spoke: "I havn't seen anything like this for more than twenty years."

"You forget the night in the Louisiana swamp when we ran across the darkey hoodoos?"

"Ah, no. This is something of the same sort; quite as much sense and reason in the hoodoo pow-wow as there is in this. The African is the more ancient religion, but the old must giv place to the new. Those darkies were very much in earnest, and no doubt considered themselvs persecuted by their masters who build fine churches in which to hold their pow-wows, while Sambo is driven to the swamp. Well, well—"

Dr. Middleton suddenly interrupted his friend by grasping his arm and exclaiming: "Why, in the name of all that's prudent, do you allow that?" and he pointed to a girl leaning over the gallery railing.

Dr. Parks looked in the direction indicated, and the color left his face. The girl, fair, slender, with dark, burning eyes, and flushed cheeks, sat watching the evangelist. She was like one mesmerized. Her head, her hands, her whole body, swayed in unison with the preacher. Swift and agil as Mr. Melrose was, he displayed not the trained agility of the dancer; not the confident poise of the acrobat, but rather the lithe, swinging, uncertain grace of the denizen of the forest and plain.

"How much she looks as Laura did!" Dr. Middleton whispered hoarsely. His friend gave no answer, but started for the gallery. The people made way for him. His principles as well as his history were well known to many there. He soon reached the girl, but not quite soon enough. The evangelist, attracted, no doubt, by her absorbed manner, was talking to her. She had risen from her seat. She stood with clasped hands, regarding Melrose with a look of mingled fright, bewilderment, entreaty. She was trembling from head to foot. She tried to answer the preacher, or draw away from him, but she stood helpless, bereft of speech and volition. Mr. Melrose said: "Come down to the altar—come to Christ," and his hands were grasping hers, but Dr. Parks interposed.

Taking the little man by the shoulders, he pushed him slightly, saying: "Stand aside, sir. Ethel, come with me."

The girl clasped her shaking hands about the doctor's arm, gasping, "Oh, uncle, uncle!" He half carried her out of the gallery, shielding her as much as possible from the curious gazers.

In the vestibule they were met by a young man who had watched the scene in the gallery from his place amongst the converts and penitents. He advanced, hat in hand. "Dr. Parks, shall I take Ethel home? Haven't you something else to do?"

The doctor glared at him.

"Mr. Gastar," he said slowly, "the most important business I hav in the world is to take care of Ethel. For the present, I shall giv it my personal attention. You, knowing what you do, are wholly unpardonable for bringing her to a place like this."

"Dr. Parks, I owe a debt of duty and gratitude to a higher power than any on earth, a power I expect to serve in spite of all opposition. I brought Ethel here that my future wife might learn to walk in the straight and narrow way beside me."

The young man said this with an air of self-approval, and "persecuted for righteousness' sake," impossible to describe.

Dr. Parks's scornful eyes measured him from head to foot. His voice shook as he answered:

"You, John Gastar, a teacher and leader for Ethel! Good-night, sir! Try to cultivate better manners."

Dr. Parks reached home with the excited girl, and he and his wife succeeded, after an hour or two, in quieting her. She slept but fitfully, and arose next morning with a racking headache.

"It is better this than the other," the doctor said to his wife. "With this shock to the nerves we hav time on our side, but in the trouble that took off her father there is no hope."

The office boy came to say there were two gentlemen awaiting the doctor. The two proved to be Mr. Melrose and John Gastar. The latter sat near an open window, wearing an irreproachable morning suit, and his highest, holiest smile.

The preacher walked about softly, swinging his arms, and turning his head from side to side continually. Now that he was not on his familiar rostrum his feet had an uncertain motion, like one walking in the dark. The doctor's manner was barely civil. He felt that these two men taxed him sorely by claiming even such hospitality as his public office afforded. Mr. Melrose entered at once upon the business about which he had called. If his host had not been prepossessed in his favor, seeing him now in the glare of the morning, and in the broader glare of undisguised antagonism, he actually felt a loathing for the man such as he had never felt for any miserable, helpless, idiotic creature with whom his profession had brought him in contact. He asked himself: "What freak of nature is this thing? Of what is he the expression? What feelings, what thoughts, preceded his advent amongst human beings? What was the cause of this ugly effect? this unfinished, seemingly boneless form—this faded, beardless, though not childish, face, with its colorless eyes and hair?"

These interrogatories were the undercurrent as Dr. Parks listened to and answered Mr. Melrose's remonstrances and exhortations concerning his behavior of the night before. He explained as far as he thought necessary his own religious views, his ideas of the duties of life, where the interests of the creature, in the evangelist's mind, conflicted with the homage due the creator.

"Yes, yes," said Mr. Melrose, "this liberal way of thinking may do for yourself, but why dictate to Miss Moore? Let her choose for herself."

"And, pray, sir," the doctor answered, "why should not I, instead of you, influence Miss Moore's choice?"

"I would lead her into the way of peace, which she can never know until she is born again. Oh, I hope she will not, by your advice, grieve the heavenly spirit away forever, sin away her day of grace, commit the unpardonable sin—oh, I hope for her, I agonize for her!"

"Do you consider Miss Moore such an exceedingly wicked girl?" Dr. Parks asked dryly.

"She is unregenerate, and I hear she has never even been baptized. She is not your daughter, not even your niece—no relation whatever. By what authority do you stand between her and her soul's salvation?"

Dr. Parks's face turned ashy white. The hand that lay upon his knee clenched itself. The other hand, outstretched on the table beside him, fondled the glittering surgical instruments that lay in an open case. How easily might he with one slight stroke of one powerful hand crush this gnat that tortured him! When could a swift and silent anesthetic be used to better advantage? Yet his voice had no tremor as he answered,

"True, Ethel has never been baptized. True, she is not bone of my bone, nor flesh of my flesh. Let me tell you something. You won't understand—still, I'll tell you. Thirty-five years ago, I was a homeless, untaught orphan. It is needless to say by what chance I drifted into the family of Dr. Finley. The family consisted of the parents and two little daughters, Ethel and Laura. I fully believe there has never lived a boy who at the age of fifteen has had a more miserable past and a more hopeless future than I had at that age. What Dr. Finley saw in me he told me afterward. He gave me care and kindness, and the means of an education. In a short time I was a son to the parents, a brother to the two little girls. It was my first knowledge of home, of love and kindness, even of humanity in any but its worst phases. There's no need of a long story. Everything prospered with me. I was Dr. Finley's partner. I married, and still lived near my first friends. The eldest daughter married my dearest school and college friend, who died two years after when baby Ethel was less than a year old—died of heart disease. In her bereavement, the young widow clung to my wife and me more than to any others, not even excepting her own parents. I am glad it was so. Very soon she was alone but for us. Dr. Finley and his wife died within a week of each other, stricken by a great calamity, but two months after the death of Ethel's husband. Baby Ethel was taught from her first lisp to call me 'Uncle.' My house was her home. When the young mother, worn out with grief, followed her loved ones to the grave, her last glance was one of trust in me and my wife; her last words, 'I know you will take care of my baby.'

"You say Ethel Moore is not my daughter—no relation to me. I loved her grandparents as I would hav loved my father and mother had I ever known them. No brother and sister could hav been dearer to me than were George Moore and his wife, Ethel Finley. No blood relationship hav I ever known; but I claim Ethel Moore as my niece, my granddaughter, my daughter, what you will, by all the laws of love and gratitude that heaven has made and earth has abused. She has been born to me through the holiest passions of which the human heart is capable."

The doctor paused. The preacher fidgeted. John Gastar had forgotten his high and holy smirk; his face expressed only interest in the story he had heard. Dr. Parks continued:

"Ethel inherits from her father a tendency to heart disease. I hav hoped by constant care to counteract it; and I can scarcely pardon you, Gastar, for what you hav done. I told you something of this when I gave my consent to your engagement with Ethel."

Gastar commenced stammering an excuse; but the restless evangelist cut in and stopped him.

"You say, Dr. Parks, the parents of Miss Moore are dead; but you mentioned another daughter of Dr. Finley—Miss Moore's aunt, of course. Is she living? If she is, she, as nearest relativ, is certainly the proper guardian for her niece."

The little man stopped walking up and down the room and stood before his host. Dr. Parks groaned.

"That, too?" he said. "You must know it all?"

"I wish to know if Miss Moore's aunt is living."

"Yes, she's living."

"Where? Somewhere near?"

"Within a few miles."

"Giv me her exact address; I will visit her."

"Your visit will be useless. Laura Finley sees no one but her physician and her nurse."

"You see her, no doubt?"

"I do. I saw her yesterday. She sat with her knees pressed against the wall. She had torn at the plastering till her fingers were dripping with blood. She was trying to find her way into heaven by a roundabout road since she has committed the unpardonable sin, and the gate is closed against her. That horrible idea took possession of her brain nearly twenty years ago, at just such another revival as you are conducting. Her parents died of grief; and Jack Middleton, as good a man as walks the earth, goes through life alone. Four lives ruined by just such a jumping, shouting, screeching creature as you. Sit down—do! You madden me with your perpetual motion."

The evangelist looked scared for an instant, but he said lightly, as he dropped into a chair: "Well, that's sad, really. I'll pray for you all. But, Dr. Parks, don't you see now, with such unfortunate environments as Miss Moore's, how doubly necessary it is that she be converted? I do. If she has heart disease she is likely to be taken away at any moment. How essential, then, it is that she be fully prepared. I'll pray for her and use every endeavor to reach her that she may be converted before the terrible punishment of her poor aunt falls upon her. No doubt Miss Finley resisted the spirit, was proud and stubborn, and so God took from her the reason that she would not devote to his service. I've known of many such instances."

Dr. Parks had no answer, but how many thoughts went spinning through his brain! What manner of antagonist was this that defied him—that chilled his blood? In the years of his professional life he had almost forgotten the meaning of fear. He had met death in all his horrid or treacherous forms, battled with him hand to hand, and beaten him back inch by inch. He had been stifled by the hot breath of pestilence, and his cheek scarcely paled. He had gone over battle-fields while bullets whistled by him, and his hand never shook. He had no thought but for the torn and mangled humanity about him, and the sorrow for the lonely ones at home.

But now, in the presence of this creature, only so far removed from the four-footed life of the jungle as to walk upright and giv intelligible orders to his tailor, he was helpless as blind and manacled Samson. During the conversation his hand had never ceased to fondle the bright instruments. Now it passed over them lightly; now noiselessly turned them over; now tested their points and edges; all with the physician's delicate precision and sensitiv touch.

He reviewed the situation. He had bared the wounds of the past for the inspection of this stranger. He had shown the weakness of his best beloved, asking compassion of this wanderer. He had striven to make her helplessness her defense, and her danger was turned into a reason for her swift destruction. All this by a creature whom human laws could not touch, and to whom reason and charity in their best sense were unmeaning sounds.

The man of science felt himself driven to the wall, disarmed, excepting in one way. There was but one thing to do. He was calm, deliberate, thoughtful. It was the precise thinker's grasp of the dilemma. He felt no anger, no more than if it had been cholera or yellow fever he dealt with. His hand closed softly about the handle of a probe as he slowly turned his eyes on Mr. Melrose. His thought spoke itself:

"I believe I'd better kill you."

There was no sign of anger or violence, but John Gastar rose hastily and stood before the doetor, completely hiding the evangelist, exclaiming:

"Dr. Parks, do you know what you are saying? Go away, Melrose; go away!"

The preacher waited for no second bidding, but seized his hat and fairly ran, keeping his scared eyes fixed on the probe. Dr. Parks laughed; Gastar prepared to follow his friend.

"John," said the doctor, "let us understand each other. No more of this, or, by the God you dishonor, I'll kill you both. Ethel is under my guardianship. She'll not go again to that Babel."

"Very well, sir; your deeds be upon your head."

"Stop that at once! I've fathered my deeds too long to be preached at by you. Unless you pledge me your word as a man (not a Christian, you're the veriest caricature of Christ) to use no word of persuasion with Ethel, she shall never again go out of my house under your care."

Gastar winced. His handsome face and figure had captivated more than one foolish girl's fancy, but aside from his fine exterior there was nothing in him that Dr. Parks desired in the husband of his ward. This he knew. It was only because of the tender fondness that could deny Ethel nothing that an engagement of indefinit length had been consented to. The expression of Gastar's face was not amiable as he stood hesitating.

"I think this a downright humbug. I expect to marry Ethel."

"Yes; I'm sorry to say I expect it too. As to your opinion on humbugs, I'll hear it some other time."

"Very well, then, I'll promis not to take her to church again till after we're married. But my wife will go where I see fit to take her."

It was Dr. Parks's turn to wince under the implied threat, and the look on Gastar's face supplemented it. Would he be willing to run the risk of harming Ethel to punish her guardian and salve his wounded dignity? He bowed a formal good morning and went away.

Dr. Parks, going about his daily work of healing diseased bodies, wished most fervently that the healers of souls were not such miserable bunglers.

Two or three days passed. Ethel had recovered her usual serenity, and spoke of the evening at the revival and her strange excitement as if it had been a troubled dream. Dr. Parks tried to keep her occupied so as to obliterate, if possible, all impression Melrose had made.

She was going to a lawn-festival at the house of a girl friend. How fair and sweet she looked in her white dress and June roses as the doctor kissed her good-bye. Gastar was her escort, and he seemed to hav forgotten his last interview with Dr. Parks. He was in excellent spirits, and was very proud and tender of pretty Ethel.

Dr. Parks had one exceedingly troublesome, though pecuniarily profitable, patient. She considered her daily duty to herself but half done unless she had spoiled her physician's evening by a visit to herself. This night she went through her stereotyped program. She must see the doctor. He left her at ten o'clock. His homeward way led him past the church where Mr. Melrose's revival was in progress. Long before he reached the building he heard the singing, shouting, and supplication of the crowd gathered there. He sighed as he came near enough to catch the words of the refrain they sang:

Too late, too late, will be the cry,
Jesus of Nazareth has passed by.

"What a slander on a mereiful God these people make music of!" thought the doctor. The thought was scarcely defined when a piercing shriek from within the church startled him. Then there was a cessation of the singing, weeping, praying, shouting; and a confusion of sounds arose that the listener could not understand. The people were pouring out of the church. There were breathless questions and irrelevant replies.

"There's something wrong in there," said the doctor. "I'll go and see what it is." He entered with a flitting thought that this time Ethel would not be in the gallery. But what meant the faces he met? Why these exclamations, and this falling away before him as if he were a "walking case" of fever? Had Melrose poisoned his neighbors and friends against him? Several persons he almost forced to stop, but his questions were evaded. A wide walk up the aisle was given Dr. Parks. He was accustomed to a certain amount of deference, but this was something extreme. There was a group in the chancel that seemed to be the nucleus of the trouble, and he advanced toward this.

As he drew near, he caught glimpses, as the people shifted about, of a woman's white drapery trailing on the floor from a recumbent form.

"Some one fainted?" he asked.

"We think—we hope so," the person answered, then stood aside.

Others fell back now, seeing Dr. Parks, and he stood still, seeing Dr. Middleton kneeling beside a half-disrobed form, his head and shoulders hiding the face of his patient. As Dr. Parks stepped behind him, he raised his head, saying brokenly,

"She is dead—God help us all!"

He turned away, meeting that instant Dr. Parks, who then first saw the face of the dead—Ethel Moore.

Dr. Middleton clasped the arm of his friend, and stood by him silently. He had no words to offer in presence of the calamity that seemed to turn the strong man to stone.

All sounds were hushed. The stricken man gazed at the dead girl, while great beads of perspiration rolled down his ashen face. On the other side of the dead, John Gastar crouched on the floor. The evangelist sat on a chair at a little distance. The other preachers stood about the altar awe-struck and silent. What could be said? What could be done? It was afterward known that John Gastar, influenced by the fanatical arguments of Melrose, had persuaded Ethel to come to the church. She, not knowing her weakness and danger, in her confidence in her lover was easily led to believe that Dr. Parks was prejudiced. The strange manner of worship to one who had been taught all she knew in the utmost calmness, the crowd, the heat, the light, the noise, the intense excitement, in short, the revival, had done its work.

Suddenly the evangelist sprang from his chair. "Let us sing 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow' for the taking home from the paths of sin of this young sister. How blessed to go to heaven from God's own earthly tabnernacle!"

Dr. Middleton seized him by the shoulders, and pushed him into his chair. "You little viper, sit down and hold your tongue!"

"I too! I too!" shrieked John Gastar, and he sprang from the floor, threw his arms above his head, and shouted out peal after peal of maniac laughter. The great church rang with the horrid sound, and the hearts of the listeners stood still.

His splendid young manhood was a ruin. His home, after that night's work, was in the same retreat that held Laura Finley. There he walks up and down, singing the hymns taught him by Melrose.

The evangelist still goes up and down the land, telling his wild stories, selling his photograph and his hymn-books.

Dr. Parks, standing by the graves of his best and dearest, remembering those two darkened ones in the madhouse, sighs in an agony of soul:

"O God! O Christ! O religion! how many evils are committed in your name!

The Liberty of Thought and Discussion.

JOHN STUART MILL "ON LIBERTY."

It is not, in constitutional countries, to be apprehended that the government, whether completely responsible to the people or not, will often attempt to control the expression of opinion, except when in doing so it makes itself the organ of the general intolerance of the public. Let us suppose, therefore, that the government is entirely at one with the people, and never thinks of exerting any power of coercion unless in agreement with what it conceives to be their voice. But I deny the right of the people to exercise such coercion, either by themselvs or by their government. The power itself is illegitimate. The best government has no more title to it than the worst. It is as noxious, or more noxious, when exerted in accordance with public opinion than when in opposition to it.

Strange it is that men should admit the validity of the arguments for free discussion, but object to their being "pushed to an extreme," not seeing that unless the reasons are good for an extreme case, they are not good for any case. Strange that they should imagin that they are not assuming infallibility when they acknowledge that there should be free discussion on all subjects which can posssibly be doubtful, but think that some particular principle or doctrin should be forbidden to be questioned because it is so certain, that is, because they are certain that it is certain. To call any proposition certain while there is anyone who would deny its certainty if permitted, but who is not permitted, is to assume that we ourselvs, and those who agree with us, are the judges of certainty, and judges without hearing the other side.

Mankind can hardly be too often reminded that there was once a man named Socrates, between whom and the legal authorities and public opinion of his time there took place a memorable collision. Born in an age and country abounding in individual greatness, this man has been handed down to us by those who best knew both him and the age as the most virtuous man in it. This acknowledged master of all the eminent thinkers who hav since lived—whose fame, still growing after more than two thousand years, all but outweighs the whole remainder of the names which make his nativ city illustrious—was put to death by his countrymen, after a judicial conviction, for impiety and immorality. Impiety in denying the gods recognized by the state; indeed, his accuser asserted (see the "Apologia") that he believed in no gods at all. Immorality in being by his doctrins and instructions a "corrupter of youth." Of these charges the tribunal, there is every ground for believing, honestly found him guilty, and condemned the man who probably of all then born had deserved best of mankind, to be put to death as a criminal.

The assumption on which this [the refusal to receive an Atheist's oath] is grounded is that the oath is worthless of a person who does not believe in a future state, a proposition which betokens much ignorance of history in those who assent to it (since it is historically true that a large proportion of Infidels in all ages hav been persons of distinguished integrity and honor), and would be maintained by no one who had the smallest conception how many of the persons in greatest repute with the world, both for virtues and for attainments, are well known, at least to their intimates, to be unbelievers. The rule, besides, is suicidal, and cuts away its own foundation. Under pretense that Atheists must be liars, it admits the testimony of all Atheists who are willing to lie, and rejects only those who brave the obloquy of publicly confessing a detested creed rather than affirm a falsehood. A rule thus self-convicted of absurdity so far as regards its professed purpose can be kept in force only as a badge of hatred, a relic of persecution—a persecution, too, having the peculiarity that the qualification for undergoing it is the being clearly proved not to deserve it. The rule, and the theory it implies, are hardly less insulting to believers than to Infidels. For if he who does not believe in a future state necessarily lies, it follows that they who do believe are only prevented from lying, if prevented they are, by the fear of hell. We will not do the authors and abettors of the rule the injury of supposing that the conception which they hav formed of Christian virtue is drawn from their own consciousness.

Virginia.

The coat of arms suggested by our artist for Virginia is very appropriate. It is true that it is not under Virginia law that Mrs. Slenker is being prosecuted, but it is Virginia district-attorneys, commissioners, and grand jurors who hav forced her into the United States court.

A little while ago, down in the southwest part of Virginia, in Mrs. Slenker's town, one of the most intelligent of the farm wives of the vicinity began to churn the accumulated cream from her dairy. She churned all day, but no butter rewarded her efforts, and she upbraided the hired girl, saying that the cream had been bewitched by the girl. The servant was angry at being called a witch, and left her mistress's service. A neighbor came in, and, learning of the trouble, procured a horseshoe, hung it on the churn, and the butter formed in a few moments!

It is the dense ignorance of the community in which she livs that makes Mrs. Slenker's position peculiarly dangerous. The people down there know nothing of what is going on the world, and liv in an atmosphere of intense prejudice against radicalism in any form. A jury drawn from their number is scarcely more fit to judge Mrs. Slenker than a jury of John Calvins would be to judge the late Charles Darwin.

The Infidels of England.

The National Secular Society is a compact and well organized body, under the shrewd leadership of Charles Bradlaugh, and is a political as well as social force of no small power in England. Once a year the society holds a conference corresponding to a congress of the American Secular Union, at which reports are made, suggestions offered, and good speeches listened to. The conference this year was held in Rochdale, May 29th, a report of which has just reached us through the National Reformer. Eighty-three delegates officially represented fifty-one societies, while a score or two more towns were represented by visiting Freethinkers, including one whose home is in South Africa.

The report of the executiv, read by the president, disclosed the following encouraging items: New members enrolled during the year, 505; new societies formed, 6—one of these being at Belfast, Ireland; cash in hand, general fund, £155 17s. 7d; benevolent fund, £39 19s. 7d; propagandist fund, £35 0s. 7d. The benevolent and propagandist funds benefited during the year by a bequest from Mr. Maillaud to the amount of £8 and £101 respectivly. Thirty children of Freethinking parents were withdrawn from religious instruction in the Board schools of the Metropolitan district, under the provisions of the Education act passed in 1870. The executiv urges upon all the members of the societies their duties in this regard, and regrets that so few Freethinkers avail themselvs of the privileges of the act. The Manchester Branch has purchased a hall for £1,645, and the Freethinkers of the city, to the number of one thousand, hav subscribed £1 shares in payment. A legacy of £500 will probably be used to liquidate the balance of the debt. Forty branches showed an aggregate income of over two thousand pounds. Sixty branches failed to report in time. The literature committee, presided over by Mrs. Besant, reported a larger distribution of Freethought and political literature than during any previous year. The students graduating from the science classes maintained by their proficiency the high character of the school, and three branches increased the number of students graduating. A deficiency of £44 1s. was incurred by the school, borne personally by Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant.

From the Parliamentary standpoint, says the report, the year has been of very high importance to the Freethought party. A "bill for the abolition of prosecutions against laymen for the expression of opinion on matters of religion" has been introduced by Mr. Courtney Kenny, and is down for a second reading on July 6th. Mr. Bradlaugh has introduced a bill substituting affirmations for oaths in all cases where oaths are required by law. This bill Mr. Bradlaugh is pushing from day to day, whenever opportunity occurs. On the question of its second reading a handsome majority of one hundred and four was obtained in its favor, and the bill is now treated as a party measure. The government, though not favorable to the success of the bill, has left it an open question for the House to decide. The prospects of the bill are regarded as materially improved, and the Freethinkers of the kingdom are requested to urge their members to vote for it.

The executiv reported to the Conference that the General Council of the International Federation of Freethinkers would hold its annual Congress in London on September 10th, 11th, and 12th. The Freethinkers of India send word that they hav been sufficiently activ during the year to compel the enmity of the missionary press. The inauguration of the monument to Giordano Bruno has been delayed by the refusal of the Roman municipality to grant the necessary site, and it is not probable that this decision will be reversed for at least a year, as at the last election in the city too many Christians obtained office.

Mr. Bradlaugh was reëlected president of the society; Mr. W. H. Reynolds, treasurer, and R. Forder, secretary. In returning thanks for the confidence expressed by his reëlection, Mr. Bradlaugh said:

"As far as my Parliamentary work is concerned, it is purely political. I hav in Parliament no right of advocacy of our views unless they are attacked and need defense; but I hav the duty to the party which trusts me of striving to win for it equal justice before the law, and, if the law be unfair, of striving to modify it so as to make it fair and equal for all. I should like, if it be the pleasure of the Freethought party speaking by its annual Conferences, to remain your president until two matters in Parliament hav been settled. First, the controversy on oaths, until every man who desires to affirm has the right to affirm without challenge. Secondly, until the blasphemy laws hav been abolished. I shall never feel quite happy in my seat in the House while I am the president of a body of men and women who are subject to disabilities imposed on no other party in the country. One good friend bade me beware of the injurious possibility of flattery. I fancy it will seldom come without being accompanied by a good deal of its opposit, and if it should, I hav swallowed, I think, sufficient of the antidote in the past to prevent any of the injurious effects of the poison. You hav given me again for one year your trust. I ask you to remember that without your willing consent and activ help you will hav conferred on me an empty grant, a useless authority. I hav no authority save such as comes from your love, from your sympathy. And I need it all. Remember also that you hav your work to do in the coming year, as I hav mine. The Freethought party is more noticed than it ever was before, and you ought to work vigorously in all political, municipal, and local business. You ought to fight with every fair weapon that you can find, and so win and maintain a good position. I can only help you as you help yourselvs. I hav no force save such as you giv me. But for this coming year I will use the position you hav given me as I judge it can best be used for the good of the party, subject to your verdict on the using when I come to you again."

In regard to the Blasphemy bill which Mr. Courtney Kenny is pressing in Parliament, the Conference requested Mr. Bradlaugh to obtain the omission of the clause which we quoted some weeks ago, and if unable to procure this, or such modification as to render it harmless, then the Freethought party desired him to oppose the bill. The clause is as follows:

"Provided moreover that any person who, with the intention of wounding the religious feelings of any person or persons, shall in any public place utter any word, or make any gesture, or exhibit any object within the hearing or sight of any person or persons whose religious feelings are likely to be thereby wounded, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; and on being convicted thereof, shall be liable to fine or imprisonment, or both, as the court may award, such imprisonment not to exceed the term of one year."

The president agreed to fulfil the wishes of the Conference, and would state in Parliament on July 6th that the National Secular Society opposed the bill if this clause is retained. It was the first time, he said, that a decision given by the Freethought party would be repeated in the House of Commons. He did not think the bill could pass at this session in any event. For the Affirmation bill he had more hope.

The idea gathered from reading of the work of the National Secular Society for the past year is that the Freethinkers of England report to the world, Progress. This society is the practical force of heresy in England, and as a support to Mr. Bradlaugh is invaluable. In him the party concentrates itself, and through him becomes a political power. We congratulate our English brethren upon their leader, and their leader upon possessing such stanch supporters.

But Englishmen should not forget to acknowledge the effectiv labors of W. Stewart Ross, the brilliant editor of the Secular Review, and of G. W. Foote, the martyred editor of the Freethinker. Though not political, their work is no less necessary, and its results not smaller, perhaps, than that of the sturdy champion whose name is oftenest upon men's lips.

Great Cry and Little Wool.

At last the Andover Board of Visitors hav rendered their decision in the heresy cases, and it is adverse to one professor only. The decision is as follows:

"At a meeting of the Visitors of the Theological Institution in Phillips Academy, in Andover, held June 4, 1887, the complaint, as amended, against Egbert C. Smythe, D.D., Brown professor of ecclesiastical history in said institution, the answer thereto, the evidence laid before them, and the arguments in behalf of the complainants and respondent were further considered by the Visitors, and they find that the Egbert C. Smythe, as such professor, maintains and inculcates beliefs inconsistent with and repugnant to the creed of said institution and the statutes of the same and contrary to the true intent of the founders thereof, as expressed in said statutes, in the following particulars, as charged in said amended complaint, to wit:

"That the Bible is not the only perfect rule of faith and practice, but is fallible and untrustworthy even in some of its religious teachings; that no man has power or capacity to repent without knowledge of God in Christ, and that there is and will be probation after death for all men who do not decisivly reject Christ during the earthly life; and thereupon they do adjudge and decree that the said Egbert C. Smythe be and he hereby is removed from the office of Brown professor of ecclesiastical history in said institution, and said office is hereby declared vacant.

"Voted—That the secretary notify the said Egbert C. Smythe, the complainants, and the trustees of Phillips Academy of the foregoing findings and the action thereon by the Visitors."

At the same meeting it was decided that the charges against the following associate professors were not sustained: William J. Tucker, Bartlett professor of sacred rhetoric; John W. Churchill, Jones professor of elocution; George Harris, Abbot professor of Christian theology, and Edward Y. Hincks, Smith professor of biblical theology, severally, in the said institution.

Professor Smythe will carry the case to the supreme court of Massachusetts, and the end is not yet. The question for the court to decide is not whether the views and teachings of the professors are contrary to the historic creeds of the church, nor whether they are contrary to the creeds of the churches in eastern Massachusetts when the seminary was established, but whether they are contrary to the views which the founders embodied in the creed that they prescribed as the test of the doctrinal soundness of all who should occupy chairs of instruction in the seminary. If Mr. Smythe is off color in his views, he ought not to ask the orthodox to pay him money for teaching his heresy. It is true that in this case the difference between him and the Board of Visitors is only the difference between tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum, but to hair-splitting sectarians that difference is something immense, and has before now been the cause of much pious bloodletting.

By their decision the Board of Visitors hav dogmatically affirmed that the Bible is a perfect rule of practice as well as faith, and that the heathen whom God has mercifully kept from possessing a knowledge of Christ will all go to hell. Touching this last, the affirmation is but one remove from idiocy—for who knows anything about the matter at all? Touching the first, we venture to say that the Andover Board of Visitors dare not use the Bible as a rule of practice. They dare not follow the example of any of the Old Testament unworthies, for fear of the state prison, nor would they dare to do as Christ did, because they would be put in some county workhouse as tramps.

The trial and decision simply show what a farce it is to frame a creed in one generation which the next will riddle with ridicule. Endeavoring to split the hairs of the whiskers on the face of the man in the moon with a meat-ax is a common sense pastime compared with the theological hair-splitting of the professors and Board of Visitors of Andover Seminary.

A Great Discovery by a "Great" Journal.

It would be much better, says the World, to repeal obsolete laws than to permit them to remain as dead-letters on the statute book. Our daily contemporary is moved to thus remark because the District of Columbia commissioners, in their effort to revive the Sunday laws, hav found that the penalty for blasphemy in that locality is boring the tongue, branding the forehead, and death.

This is a great discovery for a daily paper to make. In regard to the treatment of heretics by the religious the "great" journals are usually stupendously ignorant, and therefore silent. If they note the punishment of a blasphemer at all, they content themselvs with saying he is a "vulgar blackguard," and pass on to the important question of whether a floor-washer in a government office shall be a mugwump, Democrat, or Republican, or whether the last fish the president caught weighed three pounds, or three pounds and a quarter. We are pleased that one paper has opened its eyes for a moment, though it will probably go to sleep again immediately.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll discovered this ancient statute a good many years ago, and THE TRUTH SEEKER has unearthed others just as unjust, but they are still retained on the statute books and spasmodically enforced without any protest from the great journals whose editors' time is chiefly occupied in assigning reporters to ascertain how many times a day Mr. Cleveland has his boots blacked, or whether his wife's poodle dog kills chickens.

Two of a Kind.

The Western Watchman, a Roman Catholic paper published in St. Louis, says:

"Protestantism.—We would draw and quarter it. We would empale and hang it up for crow's meat. We would tear it with pincers and fire it with hot irons. We would fill it with molten lead and sink it in a hundred fathoms of hell-fire, but would not lay an ungentle hand on a hair in a Protestant's head."

The Protestant journal which brings this gentle sentiment to the notice of the Eastern public adds:

"We would hate to trust ourselvs in many a country in this world in the hands of a man belonging to an infallible church, the church of St. Bartholomew and the auto-da-fé, whose rhetoric would reach so sanguinary a hight as this. We fear that to make sure of drawing and quartering Protestantism, and of impaling and hanging it up for crow's meat, of tearing it with pincers and firing it with hot irons, it would be conceived to be the best way to subject Protestants to all these things."

The inference from this is that Romanism has in the past possessed the monopoly of persecution, and that Protestantism has been the abused and never the abuser. But this same journal chuckled over the conviction of Mr. Reynolds, and pronounced blasphemy laws good. It would, without doubt, mete to blasphemy as severe punishment as the Western Watchman would to Protestantism, and would go further than that sanguinary publication and punish the blasphemer himself when he "outrages the religious sentiment of the Christian community." We would hate to trust ourselvs in many a town in this country controled by the Protestant church—the church of Geneva's flame, of Sonoy's Holland torture chamber, of the Arminian and Anabaptist persecution, of the apologists of religious persecution—Knox, Luther, Calvin, and Beza—of the Quaker-killing Puritans, of the slave-selling and whipping and murdering Methodists—whose zeal for its religion led it to enact blasphemy laws to suppress Infidels. We know from the record that its hatred to blasphemy leads it to fine and imprison and torture Infidels, and we fear that if it possessed the power every Infidel would be served as some hav been.

It is a historical fact that every powerful Christian sect has persecuted and been persecuted in turn, and that they all unite in persecuting the Infidel.

Treason.

The Reformed Presbyterian church synod recently met at Newburgh, N. Y., and among the subjects discussed was the relation of church and state, and the acknowledgment of "God" in the United States Constitution. The conclusion of the synod upon this subject was embodied in the following resolution, which was adopted:

"Resolved, That we will endeavor to teach more forcibly the duty of our nation to God and the Bible view of civil government, and will make our teaching more emphatic against the Infidelity of the civil government, and will maintain our position of political dissent in refusing our electiv franchise to put into office men who are bound by their official oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and we will become responsible for suffrage only when they become responsible to Christ by their official oath."

This is negativ treason, and might easily become positiv should one of these pious fellows be elected to office. No doubt, in such an event, he would use his power to overthrow our supreme law, and substitute therefor the will of his supreme being—said will being interpreted by himself.

The Constitution, in these days, seems to be regarded very little, every two-dollar-a-year official, whether state or federal, setting his opinion up as superior to its written limitations, but nevertheless it is better as it is than as the Presbyterians would make it. We therefore derive great comfort from the fact that the "National Reform Party" is as weak in numbers as it is strong in bigotry, and as powerless in politics as its God is impotent in human affairs.

What Will They Do?

The New York Herald is vexing the Roman Catholic followers of the late Labor mayoralty candidate of this city by propounding a few conundrums. The Herald suggests that as the land theories of Mr. George hav been examined by the church and condemned, though not officially, as unsound, a further holding of them by Roman Catholics will bring on a conflict with the church. What the Catholics ought to do in this case is conundrum number one. The Herald also suggests that whereas Mr. George declares that if the Irish landlords really own their vast estates they hav a perfect right to evict their tenants, his Irish followers must needs giv up their allegiance to Parnell and the cause of Home Rule. Will the Irish sympathizers cease their sympathizing, or avow that the Irish landlords do not really own their land? is conundrum number two.

These are pertinent inquiries, and deserve an explicit answer. If the pope, speaking ex cathedra, and therefore infallibly, condemns the land theory of Mr. George, no Catholic can believe the theory, and remain a Catholic, any more than he could remain a Catholic if he accepted any dogma of Protestantism which the church condemns. And if the Irish landlords do really own their land, then they hav the right to do as they please with it—charge what they like for its occupancy, and let whom they will cultivate it. The land question of Ireland, under such conditions, must become a question of charity on the part of the landlords and not one of right on the part of the tenants.

As we said, the Herald's inquiries are pertinent, and deserve an answer. Dr. McGlynn, as the most intellectual Catholic in the George following, and a vociferous pleader for the Irish tenantry, should giv them consideration and reply.

Editorial Notes.

THE managers of the museums of this city are a smart lot of hypocrits. They hav been quietly at work at Albany and obtained the omission of the clause requiring them to keep open on Sundays from the bill giving them additional annual appropriations, and Governor Hill has signed it. He has also signed a bill giving the Metropolitan museum $312,000 for new buildings. It is to be hoped the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of this city will be less pliable than the governor and the country deacons of the legislature.

MR. W. L. WILLIS, of Kokomo, Indiana, has published a leaflet sounding the alarm against the encroachments of priestcraft upon the liberties of the people, one hundred copies of which he sends for twenty-five cents. The counts in Mr. Willis's indictment of the church are so forcibly drawn that conviction can be secured upon each and every one. They are: Endeavoring to put "God" in the Constitution; the enactment and enforcement of blasphemy laws; the enactment and enforcement of laws observing a pagan Sabbath; the enactment and enforcement of laws restricting personal liberty, and violating the natural rights of the citizens of the country. Mr. Willis is an earnest Freethinker, and is advancing the welfare of humanity in many ways.

THE Connecticut folks are not to be deprived of their Sunday papers, after all. The railroad commissioners hav decided to allow newspaper trains to run through the Nutmeg state early Sabbath mornings, as an act of necessity and mercy! The ungodly Winsted Press thinks this attempt to fool the Lord by making him think that Sunday newspapers are a necessity will fatten the fires of hades, but we disagree with Mr. Pinney. Sunday papers, or anything else that distracts the attention from immediate surroundings, are clearly a mercy to the unfortunate mortals compelled to liv in such a state as Connecticut.

"Is is not just a little singular," asks the New York Star, "that those with whom Dr. McGlynn has become most intimately associated in the course of his new crusade are nearly all pronounced Infidels?" Henry George thinks it is not, because Dr. McGlynn's associates are "the publicans and sinners" of the Christian renaissance." But there are better reasons than this, or rather there are good reasons, for this is no reason at all. The movement which has forced Messrs. George and McGlynn into prominence is no revival of an antique Christianity, but a protest against the iniquities inflicted upon society by that system of religion. The labor movement was here before Mr. George was. The leaders of it wanted something—but how they were to get it they scarcely knew. Mr. George came along and offered his theory, just as the Socialists and Communists and Anarchists offered their theories. The agitation going on in behalf of the rent-racked tenantry of Ireland helped emphasize the land question, and the labor people accepted Mr. George and his notions. Mr. George was also well known in Newspaper Row, and he was by long odds the most available candidate for mayor the Labor party could find. Dr. McGlynn's fight with his church has since kept the pot boiling, and whoever originated the Anti-Poverty Society, with McGlynn at the top, had a shrewd head. The reason so many Infidels are connected with the movement is because they all liked a political campaign with ideas in it; they hoped that the movement would be a training-school for voters, so that through peaceful means a change for the better in society might be brought around. They believe in progress; they work for reform; they are about the only honest friends of the poor, that is, themselvs; they are not bound by custom nor tradition; they are free to think, and do think; they hav the courage of their convictions, and will vote as they talk. In every movement which even promises to help humanity the Infidels are always at the front. They may be mistaken and misplace their confidence, but their zeal for the right, their enthusiasm for progress, their love of justice, lead them into social as well as religions reformations. That is the reason why many of the associates of Dr. McGlynn are Infidels—not because they are publicans and sinners trying to exhume a buried phase of a religion which from the year of our Lord 1 to 1887 has been a hindrance to the world in all its phases.

THE order of the War department to restore to all the states, including those that were in rebellion, the flags captured in the late civil war, has led to a big rumpus, and the president has rescinded the order. General Fairchild, of Wisconsin, was the first to violently attract public attention to the order. He addressed a G. A. R. post, and during his speech invoked this malediction:

"May God palsy the hand that wrote the order! May God palsy the brain that conceived it, and may God palsy the tongue that dictated it!"

The Grand Army of the Republic all over the country took the matter up, and Ohio veterans engaged lawyers in Washington to obtain an injunction restraining the War department from carrying out the order. As a sample of the sentiment animating the war veterans, the following stanzas from a song sung at a G. A. R. meeting in Des Moines, Iowa, will do:

"We will never harm the man who rules this mighty land,
Though he gave us open insult with an open hand,
But he never can review the dear old army grand,
When we go marching in Dixie.

"We are for the Union still—the starry flag so true—
We can stand the grays on deck if they'll let us wear the blue
And consent that we were right when we licked the rebel crew
As we went marching in Dixie.

"Hurrah! hurrah! we'll meet the rebel crew,
Hurrah! hurrah! just as we used to do,
And we'll stand by Tuttle till we see him safely through,
While he goes marching in Dixie."

This incident of the flags has put the complete reconciliation of the two sections back about a decade. It shows that the North still keeps the war memories warm, and this knowledge will further embitter the South, and she will draw back the hand extended for peace. The order was ill conceived, for the patriotic sentiments of the men who saved the Union should be respected, but it looks rather small for the magnificent Army of the Republic to make such a fuss after the order was issued. On the narrow ground of sectionalism, even, the North could afford to let the flags go, and if the return of the banners would hav brought the two portions of the country nearer in sentiment, the act would hav borne the richest fruit possible. Humanity is one, and good feeling among brethren is worth more than all the war sentiment in the world. "Patriotism," said Dr. Johnson, "is the last resort of the scoundrel," and the "patriotism" that would keep alive sectional enmity in this country was never better described.

Letters from Friends.

SAN JOSE, CAL., June 1, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Has John L. Brooks accepted the offer made him by C. J. Curtis, of Bradford, Pa., of $100 to get up a real, tangible spirit, that could be felt of, handled, etc.? Curtis has got him there, I think? SAMOS PARSONS.

STELLA, WASH. T., May 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed in this please find $5—three for the renewal of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the rest for inclosed order of books. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from its first copy; I like the paper and its principles; I am interested in the cause of Liberalism and am ready to help to support it as far as I am able. F. C. SCHARNHORST.

SIOUX FALLS, D. T., June 6, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: The books sent for are received. Inclosed find draft to pay for them, also $1 for the American Secular Union, and $2 for the Defense Fund of Elmina. I believe every Liberal, rich or poor, should do something, according to his means, for her defense, no matter how little. I am comparativly a poor man, but if it be necessary she can draw on me for as much more—two or three dollars. When will there be an end to this Comstock inquisition?

N. S. JOHNSON.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., May 31, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Does not this foolish persecution of Mr. Reynolds and the noble Mrs. Slenker show that the church and its teachings do make either Christian or criminal of every person in the land? The state has no right to force anyone to be either Christian or criminal, and we would be a thousand times better off without either one. Is it not strange that God cannot take care of his blasphemers yet without the help of men, and bad men at that? CHAS. SACH.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., May 31, 287.

MR. EDITOR: My blood boils when I think of Elmina Slenker's case. I shall send for some of her books if that will help her any, and all who call themselvs Liberals should do so, if it is only a small amount.

We like your suggestions as regards Ingersoll for the presidential candidate. The Liberals would vote for him to a man, woman, and child. The Republicans would follow suit; the temperance party and one-half the Knights of Labor and many Democrats would do likewise. He will, without a doubt, be the strongest man that can possibly be put in the field. Should he be elected, then we will see those "piping times of peace" that we hav heard of so many years but never realized. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

SEWARD, NEB., May 23, 287.

MR. EDITOR: We hav a town of over two thousand inhabitants, and seven or eight churches, as near as I can guess. Preaching is done in all of them all the time, yet the Liberal element holds good. I was strongly solicited a few days since to donate for another gospel edifice. I declined, giving the deacon my reason for declining. First, I had no religion, never had, neither did I want any. In the second place, it was teaching absurdities to the youth, such as devils, gods, ghosts, angels, etc., which no living being knows anything about, nor ever will. In the third place, it is a fraud on our government to put our property into a church where it is exempt from taxation. I am worth one thousand dollars; it is assessed to help run our institutions and government. If I put the thousand dollars in a gospel shop, where is the revenue?

The above were my reasons. He left. H. L. BOYES.

HORNITOS, CAL., May 2, E.M. 287.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for two years' subscription. We expect a boom in this county soon. It is generally believed that the great Fremont grant is about to change hands. The names of the purchasers are a sufficient guarantee that it will be worked, when some of the richest mines in the state will again be opened. Owing to litigation, they hav been lying idle about twenty years. When the change takes place, there will be a rush back of many of the old residents, besides new-comers. Then I will make an effort to obtain new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Freethought journals. The pictures are splendid, and are read by many who do not read English, but hav them explained. I think that if the pictures were put in book form each year, with short explanations and appropriate verses from the good book, they would readily sell. With best wishes to THE TRUTH SEEKER and all its friends, I remain, Very truly yours, R. W. BARCROFT.

EUREKA, May 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to pay for your valuable paper for two more years. It has become one of the family necessities with us. I would hav been more prompt, but hav changed locations, and waited to make a permanent settlement before renewing. I would be more than glad to get subscribers for your paper, but genuin Liberals are hard to find in our vicinity.

Those pictures are good for dyspepsia—better than allopathic pills! Long liv Watson Heston! We are puzzled to understand why the monkey is represented in so many of the pictures. I think Sarai was too generous to hold out, by the expression of her countenance in the last picture.

Now, to put aside joking, I think every true Liberal should awake to the dangers that are threatening all who do not bow to some creed. Why cannot some one who has influence and opportunity place Colonel Ingersoll's name before the public as a candidate for the presidency at the coming election? I do not think there is a man in the United States more capable than he is of filling the position of president. Brother-Liberals, let us unite before it is forever too late to save ourselvs from a tyrant a thousand times worse than death! I scatter my papers, in hopes of doing some good in that way; for whoever sees the pictures will be obliged to think in spite of themselvs, and hasten the day when superstition's reign shall be over. W. V. COPE.

EUBANKS, KY., May 21, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I take this method, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, to return thanks for the receipt of sample copies of the following Liberal papers: Monroe's Ironclad Age, Indianapolis, Indiana; the Open Court, Chicago, Ill.; the Liberal, Nashville, Tenn., Ella E. Gibson, editor; the American Nonconformist, Winfield, Kan.; Lucifer, Valley Falls, Kan.; Liberty, Boston, Mass.; Secular Thought, Toronto, Ont. We hav received also a printed circular from C. Garwood, Baltimore, Md., asking contributions to "Elmina," a lady who is "in jail" awaiting a trial on the charge of circulating obscene matter in the mails. I am not wealthy, but liberal to unfortunate cases. E. C. Walker and Lillian Harman ask contributions to aid in rebellion against the civil laws of Kansas. They set up self-law on marriage, and bid defiance to state authorities. We are liberal, but we do not propose to be so liberal as to aid and comfort those who imprudently get into such unnecessary extremes of breaking civil laws and bidding defiance to constituted authorities. We know not the guilt or innocence of Elmina, what she put in the mails, nor whether she meant "lewdness" or had "lewd motivs." Neither can we tell the lady's condition that necessitated her labor in the field of sexual physiology. I take the firm stand that civil laws, passed by the law-making powers of our republic, though within themselvs they may be impolitic and unjust, should be respected by all persons until they are repealed by the power that made them; and, while I feel for any lady "in jail" for any crime, I retain, as my chief political duty, supreme regard for our republican form of government. W. BAKER, M.D.

ST. LOUIS, MO., May 17, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is a weekly visitor at my house, and is read with great interest by all. Mr. Heston's pictures add a great deal to the value of the paper. They are an index to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and cannot escape the Christians' eyes. Besides, it would take a volume to express the idea of each picture by words.

St. Louis is not far behind in the ranks of Liberalism and Freethought. A year ago we organized "The Society for Ethical Culture of St. Louis," with a membership of ninety activ members, which has increased since to two hundred. We hav a permanent lecturer in Mr. W. L. Sheldon (a student of Professor Adler, of New York), who delivers his addresses every Sunday morning in one of the finest halls in the city. A Sunday-school for the children has also been organized, and is in a flourishing condition. Christians are admitted free to both lecture and Sunday-school.

The Germans hav also a Freethought society (Freie Gemeinde) here, which was organized many years ago by the pioneer Freethought lecturer and writer Edward Schroeter, of Sauk City, Wis. They hav a fine hall, and the society is doing good work.

With regret I read in the last TRUTH SEEKER that the hands of Comstock hav made another Freethought martyr. But I hope the Freethinkers will come forward and defend an aged and deserving woman in the hour of need. Mrs. Slenker has always defended our cause, and is worthy of assistance. Inclosed find $2 for the Slenker Defense Fund, and $3 to pay the fare of THE TRUTH SEEKER from New York to St. Louis for another year. G. H. SCHEEL.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., May 25, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: You will remember that some time since I took the liberty to to write a short article for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER in regard to strikes, etc., that were occurring in different cities throughout the Union. About that time it seems that certain parties had taken exceptions to what I said, consequently I hav received a number of letter from different ones, some of them quite threatening; but the writers do not giv their names, so I cannot reply to them direct. This is my apology for penning these lines for your paper.

If any one has anything to say in answer to what I hav said or may say or write, I think it would be wise for them to date their letters and sign their names to them. Some do not comprehend what I said in my letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Feb. 19, 1887. Now, I wish to say just a few words more, and I will try and say them so plain that the wayfaring man, though a fool, cannot err therein; then every one will know just where I stand.

First, as my last letter in your paper would indicate, I recognize the right of every one, both men and women, to decide for themselvs, without dictation or interference, when they shall work or cease to work, where they shall work, and for what wages they shall work. I also recognize the absolute right of any employer to decide for himself, without interference from any source whatsoever, whom he shall employ or discharge; also the right to regulate and manage his business with perfect freedom in all particulars, provided, only, that he deal lawfully and justly with all men. I recognize the right of every father or guardian to hav his son or ward (respectivly) learn any lawful trade, also the right to learn to write and read or any other branch of education; and he should be subject to regulation only by the laws of the land.

Now, I wish to request that if any one has anything to say to me in answer to this letter, he will say it to me boldly by signing his name and residence, so that I can reply to him if I wish to, as I do not wish to burden your paper with it.

Mr. Putnam has been here and given two of his grand lectures. He has gone to the Yosemite Valley this week; will lecture here again next Sunday evening, May 29th; will leave for Oregon the last of next week. I had the pleasure of having Mr. Putnam with me while in this city. I found him to be a genial and a whole-souled gentleman, and his lectures were all that could be asked for. He is a good speaker and perfectly at home on the platform.

N. D. GOODELL.

AYER, MASS., May 30, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Will you hav the kindness to send me pamphlets, etc., to fill the inclosed order?

I am a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope by the aid of its inspiration to keep abreast of the world of thought and that freedom for which our forefathers so nobly fought, and vouchsafed to us by a Constitution without a God to hamper our joy in this world and forestall our happiness in the future life.

I watch with a great deal of interest the conflict between truth and error, church and Freethought. And I often ask, When will the pure light of heaven shine forth to enlighten the blind?

The illustrations of the encroachment of the church by the far-seeing prophet, Heston, I trust are seasonable warnings to all lovers of liberty—nay, freedom is the better word.

And I am left to ask, Is it possible that this splendid government, the best that ever blessed this green and beautiful earth, can again permit those it was designed to protect to be taken by the throat by usurping priests? And shall that emblem of individual sovereignty which the heroic Thomas Paine said should make every man a king be trampled in the dust as a despised and worthless thing?

This is the conflict to-day—between the church power, with its numbers and wealth, on the one hand, and truth, freedom, and a world of happiness and joy on the other. If the advocates of freedom cannot all keep step to the same tune, let us keep abreast and in solid columns, and spend no strength on divisions and jealousies, remembering that every victory over an insidious and powerful foe will insure new supports. I hav confidence that the fruit of this great struggle will fall on the human side—the side of freedom, progress, love.

Look at the priest-ridden countries, and then at the one country whose very ensign is freedom, "divinely bestowed upon man," and choose this day which we will serve and accept service from.

Keep up these illustrated prophetic warnings, remembering to be forewarned is to be forearmed. ELIJAH MYRICK.

VINELAND, N. J., June 10, 1887.

DEAR EDITOR AND READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Trusting you approve the appeal of the Defense Association for Mrs. Slenker, in the issue of June 4th, I wish to urge that the general sympathy and substantial aid be so generous as to enable the defense to strongly meet the "straight issue" of individual rights in protection of sealed matter by mail, and to obtain reliant decisions from highest courts that will end the contemptibly fraudulent decoy's interference. While that is privileged, with both use and control of courts, secret originating of matter solely for its purpose will be continuous, and the innocent be thereby tortured.

Probably no mind doubts Mrs. Slenker's good motivs, or right to conscientious correspondence, and friends of justice should sustain its cause, however they differ on the benefits of her special object, which non-acceptance could soon settle. C. L. James does well to giv his views. Liberals will do well to heed them. Some years ago he showed in a published article that church encroachments on legal rights were continually increasing, and more readily enlisting official assistance. The Defense Association is our only practical resisting power; it has done what has yet been accomplished. Had it organized twenty years ago, and taken the firm stand now proposed, the decoy's bills to extend acts might not hav been passed, and obsolete Blue laws might not hav been revived. But since their availability has made plain the whole inquisition plan, and secured official might to rivet chains, turn dungeon keys, and cut gallows ropes, making formal dislodgment of the Constitution unnecessary, let the unpretentious defense counsel be sustained by such patriotism as our sires exemplified only a century since.

Fangs of greed and bigotry are edged anew by gold recently drawn from the bars of Kansas and New Jersey. Success in damaging a zealous, intelligent woman will strengthen the daring that is doubtless collecting items for evidence against others. The entire animus of popular sentiment is the ignorance and slavish submission of woman, which provides material for what afflicts and convulses the world. Yet, strange to note, otherwise bright people take on the dulness that caters to the sentiment, and sell the liberty they hav evolved to a belief in. Facts of to-day should dismantle of that dulness the somnolence of despotic fascination. M. E. TILLOTSON.

TOLEDO, O., June 18, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: A short time since a meek and lowly follower of Jesus wanted me to giv my soul to God, when the following conversation ensued:

"Do you believe in your Bible?"

"Oh, yes; that is God's word and revelation to man."

"Well, God says in his word, 'All souls are mine;' my soul must be included, and would I not be a scoundrel to try to giv away that not belonging to me?"

"But you must believe in the Lord Jesus Christ in order to be saved; no matter how good you may be, or how sorry you may be for past sins; if you do not believe, you will be damned."

"Well, we will take the parable of the fatted calf, which was as innocent of evil intent as calves generally are. Now, in order for the prodigal to come home to his father, after feeding with the swine, and spending all his portion in fast living, did he hav to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ in order to be welcomed home by his father, and gorge himself on that poor innocent calf, which had been murdered for his sake? The old man was his father all the same, even when the prodigal was far away and very bad. You can't destroy kinships by bad actions or wanderings. Now, suppose a child after being turned out to play with nice, clean clothes, face, and hands, falls into a mud-hole, and comes back to ma in a terrible plight, weeping and dirty, what will she do?—disown the child? or will she clean it up and let it take another chance at the mud-pie business? She loves the child when it is clean, doesn't she? Well, does she love it because she washed it, or does she wash it because she loves it? If there is a God, he is as good as a kind father or mother; if he is not, I do not wish to hear about him, for if he is unkind he is evil, and I prefer a good, plain, decent devil, knowing what to expect from him, to a hypocrit, who has the name of being good, and is not even respectable."

"I am afraid you are lost."

"Well, 'olive oil,' as the French say."

CHARLES FRANKLIN.

SAN JOSÉ, CAL., May 26, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell you something of the impression that Mr. Putnam made in our "garden city." First of all I will say he has left behind him kind remembrances in the hearts of our people, and will be warmly welcomed whenever he returns to San José. He seems to be the right man in the right place; as a man, cordial and genial, with an utter absence of the egotism that is so often noticeable among speakers. As a lecturer he is logical and eloquent. Mr. Schwartz and myself, accompanied by Dr. York, met him at the depot with our carriage, the same carriage and the same persons that met friend Bennett when he last visited this city. It was our pleasure to be one of the number who entertained him at that time, and it has again been our pleasure to entertain Mr. Putnam. Our hearts and home are ever open to true workers in the Liberal field. For some months before Mr. Putnam's advent among us, Messrs. Schwartz, Magenheimer, and Parsons labored unceasingly to awaken and keep awake an interest in the coming event. Mr. Parsons, living out of town, kept his pen busy. Messrs. Schwartz and Magenheimer raised by subscription a sufficient sum to cover all expenses, the Turners, as you know, donating the use of their beautiful hall. The press, too, deserve especial credit for the kindness and generosity manifested throughout. Dr. York could not remain long, but ran up from San Francisco to help work up things and meet Mr. Putnam. The result of all this was that Mr. Putnam spoke two nights to large and enthusiastic audiences, especially the second night, when the subject was "The New Heaven and Earth." Had he spoken a third time we feel assured that every seat in that vast hall would hav been occupied. Could he hav come a month later he would hav found a bewildering mass of flowers—flowers from every clime, of every hue and variety. Our late floral fair was one of the most beautiful scenes I ever saw. Every conceivable design was produced in flowers. It is beyond my powers of description, therefore I shall not attempt it, but I will tell you of a ship composed of twenty varieties of roses raised on one stalk, the rigging of smilax.

Ere this reaches you you will hav heard of Mr. Putnam's treatment at the hands of a Ukiah Christian—still another proof of the necessity of the spread of Freethought; but we must be careful not to overtax our workers. Mr. Putnam, for instance, is working too hard; lecturing three and four times per week where he should speak but once; his extensiv correspondence, besides his regular letters home; visitors to entertain; invitations to accept; he is expected to write up the country wherever he goes—why, he actually has to plow and prepare the ground for the seed, and then plant it before he passes on to the next. From early morn till late at eve, even while traveling, is his pen (and consequently his brain) hard at work. He should not be allowed to wear himself out. We need such workers.

With your permission I wish to refer to Mrs. Slenker's imprisonment. I know nothing of the matter mailed by her, yet I do know that it is an outrage. I would not change places with Anthony Comstock and his allies for all the wealth this world contains. Ingersoll once said, in speaking of a certain low set of men, "What dirty angels they will make!" I know of no class of men that this applies to as well as to the above-mentioned Comstock and his allies. Just think of it, a woman (who has no voice in our laws, classed, as all women are, among children and idiots) of her age and standing, whose gray hairs entitle her to respect, dragged to a prison, treated as a criminal, for sending to a supposed investigator a private letter containing expressions which a few designate as obscene, and this, too, while the Bible, so full of disgusting obscenity, is sent at will over land and sea. Let them purify their Bible before they condemn the writings of others. One need not be surprised after hearing such sermons as a certain Mr. Christian, of Sacramento, preached here a few evenings since, and the papers expatiated on his eloquence, told how he melted his audience to tears. (I sat there taking notes, and not a tear dimmed my eyes.) He said: "I believe in a hell. I do not know what it is, whether it be a literal fire or a state or condition; whatever it is, I believe in it. There are a great many people that you and I would not like to liv with forever. Why, there are some women I would not like to liv with forever," etc. I thought, "There are some men that I would not like to liv with forever, and the Rev. Mr. Christian is one of those men." Still, I do not desire a hell for him. If this were the spirit of Freethought I would not be a Freethinker. No wonder helpless women are dragged to prison, and Freethought speakers assailed with coal-oil lamps. This is the Christian spirit, and we must work on until it is crushed out. So I say, All hail to the Secular Union! and bid it good speed. Let every Liberal and every Spiritualist in the land join hands and help the work along. I did not mean to say so much when I began this letter. If you knew how much more I wanted to say you would certainly excuse its length. MRS. R. H. SCHWARTZ.

KENT, O., June 13, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly allow me space in your paper of reform to say a word to G. E. Macdonald, the writer of the article in your issue of June 11th headed, "The Liquor Law and Sunday?" While I wish to respect his opinions, and do not expect to convert him at once into the true path of reform, I do hope to show him that, to my mind, he overlooks the true question of cause and effect. If we find a man beside the road, with visible marks of murder, we naturally try to find out who was the murderer, the cause of the same, and the manner by which it was done. If we learn that the murderer was a lunatic, the punishment is not "meted out" to the murderer, as it would be to a man of sane mind. If we learn that the murderer was a man of sound mind, who,' from whatever cause, procured a gun and shot his victim, we trace the facts to where he got the gun. If found the seller of the gun knew the buyer was in a rage or passion, or of unsound mind, and was likely to put the gun to some bad use, would not and should not he, the seller, be held as a party to the act, as he was one of the causes of the murder? If a druggist sells me the poison to poison my fellowman, knowing (or not certain of the purpose for which it is bought) that I am buying and he selling the poison for some bad use, is he not a party to the act? Does not our law compel all sellers of poisons to know as far as possible the purpose for which the poison is bought; also to put the skull and cross-bones with the word "Poison!" on the package of poison sold?

Now, let me ask one more question, and one which I think runs parallel to these already asked. If you are a seller of strong drink, selling the same, as all sellers do, for the profit there is in it, and I come to you to buy liquor in an intoxicated condition (and every seller should know when he sees a man whether he is drunk or not), and you sell me the "finishing touch" of "hell-fire" that deprives me of what little reason I had before, and in this condition I commit a dastardly crime, which would really be the more to blame, the seller who had all his faculties of mind and only sold the "devil" for the profit there was in it, or the buyer, who had not the strength of mind, urged on by a damning appetite, that he had formed in an unguarded past, to resist the temptation of "one more" drink? While I am a Liberal, and believe it the right of every man, woman, and child to take all the privileges and comforts possible, so they do not trespass on the rights or others, either directly or indirectly, I do not believe it right to allow anyone, merely for "profit," to set snares to catch the unwary, who, from lack of good sense, good bringing up, or other cause, is careless and falls a victim to the snares that may be strewn in his pathway of life. Many a kind parent's heart has been made to bleed for the actions of their child who has been led astray by a neighbor's desire to make money by selling alcohol.

As regards the using of the Sabbath for pleasure and recreation, I cay say, "So mote it be," if used in a manner becoming to good citizenship, good breeding; orderly, and to the mutual benefit of all. I believe this an age of progression, an age of advancement in the arts and sciences, in morality, in religion—in fact, in nearly everything that man has anything to do with. Superstition and bigotry are being driven from the minds of the mass of the people; the churches themselvs are dropping their old dogmas of unfounded belief; and why should not intemperance in everything be lessened and one more step be made in the ladder that marks the difference or space between man and the lower order of his kingdom, keeping uppermost in our minds that man can only stand at the head of the animal class only as he subdues his animal nature and elevates himself in the scale of knowledge and morality? I do not wish to hinder anyone from killing himself with strong drink, if he so desires and does not cause or encourage its use by others. I do not nor cannot say just how to battle with this subject of intemperance, neither do I care how the monster is destroyed so it is done to the mutual benefit of mankind. There are many things to be taken into consideration when we wish to produce a reformation in any evil that besets us. And if there is anything that can be said in favor of strong drink, as a beverage, send it along so everyone can see it. Don't use the dead languages or unknown tongues to talk to live people. While I may know a little of Latin and Greek, learned in my school-days, I do think best to talk so every one can understand it, even a child. Giv us fair play, and reform in all things. A. D. SWAN.

DENVER, COL., June 8, 1887.

MR. EDITOR: It is some time since I hav noticed a communication in your columns from a citizen of Denver. Our friend Putnam's bright, vivacious, and genial mind drove his pen into writing pleasant lines of those engaged in the interests of Secularism, and many hopeful words for the local cause here. Well, Putnam can't help it, for he is as full of hope in the cause to which he is giving his energies as is a fond father to the future of his only boy. The people like Putnam, and whether he be eastward or westward bound, he leaves us in a high state of inspiration.

I hav been tempted on several occasions to drop you a few lines, when I note how difficult it appears to be for many of your readers to follow your explanation respecting your position on the Chicago Anarchist's matter. Not that I think your editorials lack clearness in statement, but from a general mental disposition, I suppose, for an interested reader to put his oar in, and assist in propelling the idea against the opposing current.

Last evening, Dr. J. L. York and wife, in company with several friends, were nicely entertained by a genial Liberal family, residing in the section of our city known as "Capitol Hill." During the evening, the editorials of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in respect to their attitude toward the Anarchists, became one of the subjects of conversation. One friend feels that you are pleading the cause of Anarchy and dynamite.

I do not know, Mr. Editor, whether further comment will be of any avail in justification of your position. I will admit that as I heard your first editorial read I shook my head and made remarks in opposition to the attitude, and thought that perhaps an undue amount of influence or sympathy, or a failure at proper discrimination, had caused the view of the matter you printed. At this time, my only source of information had been the Associated Press reports and local newspaper comments. From that day to this, just in proportion as I hav been enabled to become more familiar with the facts presented to the court at the trial of the Chicago Anarchists, has the injustice of the proceedings and the verdict become more manifest. There is not a particle of Socialism yet developed in my mental constitution. I am an individualist to the core, at the present writing. I love order, but I love liberty more than the order which comes of quiet submission to the present forms and methods of religious, social, and political orthodoxy.

I love free thought, because without it there can be no free speech, and without this latter the but partially-developed tree of liberty must wither and decay, and justice die. An answer may be deemed pertinent that expresses, "I, too, love liberty as I love the apple of my eye, and because of this love, and for the reason that I would hav the lives and property of all protected, it is better and just that these Anarchists should be hung." I most emphatically say, that if upon trial it is shown by undeniable evidence that any one or all of the Chicago Anarchists were intentionally connected with the throwing of the bomb at the Haymarket, which carried death in its train, then let the hand of justice fall upon them as upon other murderers. Do not let us assent to their being deprived of life because they are Anarchists, because they are cranks or fanatics. Let us demand that they hav trial after trial, until every judicial means at command has been exhausted in the attempt to prove them guilty of the capital crime of which they stand condemned. Beware how we sharpen the knife that may sever the head from the shoulders of some noble brother who may champion the cause of universal mental liberty, or the sister who may be doing a duty to humanity—a duty as dear to her and more demanding than life itself. Who are the fanatics? We can not name those who are to be. We can find upon the historic page what kind of people that term was applied to during the past. Darwin tells us how a thousand of them a year for two hundred years were dealt with by the Inquisition. Example after example crowds your memory, reader, extending throughout historic time. It is well for us to demand that justice shall sit supreme in every case, but especially in these cases where the dungeon door is to close on, or the gallows rope to encircle the neck of the man who utters his honest thought.

Liberty, equality, and justice viewed in the abstract embody sentiments we all profoundly revere, but how varied are our differences in their application to human relations of any specific order. We know, Mr. Editor, how difficult a task it is to dislodge mental prepossessions or prejudices. To apply the Spencerian law, as soon as the term "Chicago Anarchists" is uttered, the states of consciousness which follow are the same that hav followed upon each occasion the like sounds hav been heard, or "along the line of least resistance."

I took my seat at the "writer" to giv you a few lines in respect to our visit from Dr. York. I am glad friends in the East are to meet and hear him. He is a man of strong individuality. He has something to say to the people and he knows how to express it effectivly. He held his audience of a thousand people or more for nigh two hours last Sunday evening. None of the friends need hesitate to arrange with him to speak for them for fear he will leave them loaded with debt—that is, if they will take advice from the doctor. His extended experience in the management of lectures can be profitably employed by our societies. Of course he feels that he cannot crowd his methods upon local societies, feeling that in each community there are those residing who know the peculiarities incident to that locality. Our society had adjourned, as we all thought, for the summer, when some of the members received word of the doctor of his Eastward journey. We had been doing a fairly vigorous work during the preceding eight months, had spent all the money the friends could put into the work for this year, and it fell upon me to write to the doctor. He says the letter sent a chill all over him.

Of course, if I had anticipated such a result, I would hav couched my letter to him in different language. I wrote to him what so frequently makes up a letter to our itinerancy: "No money in the treasury." Well, the doctor was bound for Denver, as his tickets were purchased before he received my letter. We are all rejoicing now that this was the case. It is seldom that we hav been treated to such radical thought. He is a born rostrum speaker. He aims his blows straight at superstition, ghosts and all, and hammers out a well-rounded discourse. He should speak more than once wherever he is engaged. I do believe that all along the line the societies can afford to hear him. He is an American Liberal. His platform is broad enough for all who believe in the Nine Demands to stand upon. Don't think you are getting a seance speaker in the doctor. His eyes are wide open, as also his mind. As I hav said, he is a man of strong individuality, and he cannot well be compared to anyone; of much inspiration; bold, forceful, and clear in every expression. Every society engaging him will hav just cause to feel glad. The radicals will be disappointed, and so will the seance-goers. The doctor's Spiritualism is much attenuated. He does not like the Materialist to tie to a stone and throw overboard phenomena which yet are unexplained.

Our Flag Above the Cross.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, My Esteemed Friend: After reading your able article entitled "Our Flag Above the Cross," I cannot refrain from writing a few lines on the subject.

Truly, the suggestions you hav made are worthy the consideration of all Freethinkers, and if followed would be a great help toward implanting in the minds of the rising generation those thoughts and ideas which alone can make them great and learned men and women.

The church cares naught for our principles of liberty and justice, and hence it is the duty of every Freethinker to work with renewed energy in order that we may keep the torch of liberty lighted to shed its glorious rays over this broad and fruitful land.

Let its rays be so strong, so bright, that it will disclose to the world those hidden treasures, those principles of justice which for hundreds of years hav been held from the gaze of humanity by the shrewdness of priest and preacher.

The age in which we liv demands expression upon all the great questions which involve the safety of our country, and if by righting the wrong, if by giving help to the needy, and making glad the hearts of the young, we offend God almighty, his beasts, and the virgin men who surround him, why, my dear reader, let it be so. Surely we, who hav stood the hatred and oppression of the priest and his followers, can bravely bear the tortures of gods and devils.

So let us join hands in this great work; let us gladden the hearts of our boys and girls on the Fourth of July, as in former days we hav done on the 25th of December, and instill into their minds a love for the principles of truth and justice; let us picture to them the glorious deeds of those who died for freedom's cause, or risked their lives on the bloody field of battle in order that we might enjoy liberty and happiness.

And as, one by one, we giv praise unto these noble men, let us head our roll of honor with the name of one whose whole life was devoted to the cause of freedom, and whose every thought was for the advancement of humanity; who, fearless alike of imprisonment and death, gave to the world that powerful document, "The Age of Reason."

For where, in the annals of history, could we find a more loyal patriot than our immortal hero, Thomas Paine?

Sincerely yours, KATIE KEHM.

Ottumwa, Ia.

[We cheerfully commend the above letter from a brave and fearless thinker to the attention of all, and hope that the suggestions it contains may be carried out until the nation's holiday shall become, in every sense, the great holiday and holy day of the all year, when the flag shall proudly float triumphant above the cross and all its attendant shams and myths—the Fourth of July becoming a patriotic gift-making season rivaling all other times and seasons known—the glorious deeds of its founders glowing with a fire and enthusiasm inspiring and unquenchable.—ED. C. C.]

Our Puzzle Box.

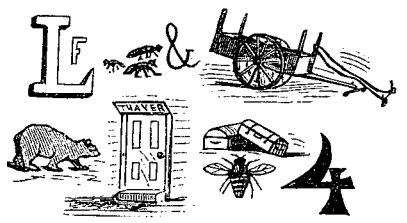
1.—PICTURE OF AN OX AND HIS DRIVER.



Where is the driver?

2.— M / — / D — A LETTER REBUS.

This is an "atom ultimate,"
Of which great scientists must prate.
Eternity, unbounded space,
Are much too great for me to trace.
Further and further still afar
We measure on from star to star,
And when our telescopes grow blind,
We still project the flying mind
Till, like old Noah's wearied dove,
We leave the unwinged space above.
But if the greatness of designs,
Baffles alike all human minds;
Repeated subdivisions show
That things may be too small to know.
The mountain's solid body shakes,
And into massiv boulders breaks;
And these go crashing o'er the land
Till we behold the finest sand;
And this we subdivide by arts,
Reducing still to finer parts,
Until the dust gets in our eyes,
Or, vaporized, ascends the skies;
And then we query what might be
If we could only do and see;
Then from the infinitly small
Back to our homes on earth we crawl.
Perhaps indeed the "ultimate"
The primal germs may indicate;
But, all unknown to mortal eyes,
Beyond the knowable it lies.
Perhaps, in cycling ages vast,
All nature into chaos past,
A new creation may arise—
A new-made earth, moon, sun, and skies;
The last analysis of time,
End in a synthesis sublime.
The philosophical disease
Infectious spreads on every breeze!
Even as I write this simple strain,
The madness rushes to my brain;
But till creation's wreck be come,
Science must sit in silence dumb—
Till the last crash of world shall burst
And show us how the last is first.

Correspondence.

INGALLS, KAN., June 5, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would attempt to write a letter for the Children's Corner. I am twelve years old. Father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for six years, and I read the Corner. Our school was out last Friday. I study reading, spelling, grammar, geography, and arithmetic. My sister Nellie and I take music lessons, and I am taking painting lessons. I think it would be nice to get up a paper of our own, and call it the Children's Freethought Paper, and hav the children write essays and letters, and hav a nice picture on one side of a leaf to draw from. I got a nice album on the Christmas-tree, and would like to hav your picture to put in it. Please send me "Little Lessons for Little Folks." Yours truly,

JESSIE BUTTERFIELD.

ONTARIO, CAL., June 9, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am going to write you a few lines. Papa says he wants me to write to you, so I will begin. I hav started to write a great many times, but hav never finished my letter. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we like it very much. I almost always read the letters in the Children's Corner, and the pieces. I like the pictures. Papa went to Los Angeles to hear Mr. Putnam lecture, and he liked his lectures. But he has been sick ever since. I am ten years old, and read in the Third Reader. I study geography, reading, spelling, grammar, and arithmetic. I hav writing and drawing every other day. I am going into the Fourth Reader next term.

Hoping my letter will be printed, I will close. Your little Freethinker friend,

MAY AUGUSTA JOHNS.

LINKVILLE, OR., June 4, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will try to write to you and tell you about Linkville. My father keeps a hotel and a store. A gentleman friend of ours is taking THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner and look at the pictures. I am a little girl nine years of age. Yours truly,

GENEVIEVE JENNIE SMITH.

THREE RIVERS, MICH., June 6, 1887.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been a subscriber and devoted reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER from its first output in Paris, Ill. I was pleased when the Children's Corner was introduced as a part and parcel of the paper's contents. Inclosed find a little poem entitled "A Swarm of B's," which may meet your approval; if so, please accept it as a small donation to the Corner you edit, and may you liv long to conduct the same wisely and splendidly, as you hav done heretofore, is the best wish of your friend,

E. D. BLAKEMAN,

Author of 200 Riddles (published by the Truth Seeker Company), from which I would like to hav a few transferred to the Children's Corner. I hav written a poem on "Beautiful Flowers." Would you like it?

[We thank our good friend for his excellent contribution, and for his kind wishes. If the "Beautiful Flowers" are as fine in quality as the beautiful B's, and no doubt they are, we would be pleased to hav them adorn the Corner, and may the author of them "liv long and prosper."—ED. C. C.]

CHAT WITH CORRESPONDENTS.

KATIE K.—We heartily indorse all your ideas as expressed.

DAGMAR M.—Please let us know your opinion of A in L when convenient.

ANGELO.—Yes, we are friendly to S. P. P., and believe he is doing brave campaign work. He has remarkable genius, and great versatility.

W. E. B.—No, there is no need to worry about how to die. Learn to liv well and properly, and you can die well enough when you've nothing else to do.

T. S. Co.—Many thanks for note paper and envelopes—"The flag above the cross" motto. It is pretty in design, and should be in general use by Liberal-minded people.

BERTIE.—We think Sam Newton must be in Havana, Cuba, but we hav had no tidings from him in a long time. The forgetfulness you mention is probably only in seeming and not in being.

ANNA C.—Don't worry about such matters. Keep cool and be calm. All will come out right, and nobody and no cause will be dishonored or disgraced by any such transactions as you name.
